tionate recollection. It will be a long time before another form like his will be seen in our midst, a veritable pillar, in truth, bearing and sustaining the church which he loved. When in health, who so prompt in his place at all the meetings? Who so ready to bear his part of the burdens, nor quibbling as to what that portion should be!

We can never forget his figure as he rose in his place to sing God's praise. He was ever the first up and he had little sympathy with the slack, laggard ways sometimes seen in worship. Nor can we forget the years of care that he and his wife gave to the adornment of the pulpit, that the lovely flowers, God's good gifts to us, might fittingly set forth the spoken word. His life was a realization of all that a grand, sturdy New England man may be, and his death has proved the glory and the truth of the Christian religion. With surviving friends, we of Grace Church join our sorrow and with them look forward to a glad, happy life beyond.

Again the flag over G. A. R. Hall has been at half-mast. Another Massachusetts soldier has passed his last muster and is now with the majority on the other side. Comrade Munroe was born in Bristol, R. I., and enlisted from this city, January 5, 1864, in the 10th Massachusetts Battery, Light Artillery. This was Sleeper's Battery, the one whose history was recently written by Past Department Commander Billings of Cambridge. On account of being disabled he was transferred to Co. F, 20th Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps.

On his way home from the war, he stopped in Newark, N. J., and there married Miss Sarah B. McCall. Some years afterward he came to this city and lately has resided at 3 Rodney Street, where, aged forty-eight, he died from pneumonia, Friday morning, November 20th. He was a painter by trade, an industrious and capable workman, striving diligently to support and educate his family, consisting of his wife and children, John F., in his Senior year in the High School, Hattie A. and Marion J. He leaves also, a sister, Mrs. F. E. Abbott of William Street.

For years, he has not been in robust health and so was unable to withstand acute disease. His funeral was held at his late residence, Tuesday at 11 a.m. the Rev. Alexander C. Childs, temporarily at Central Church officiating. Excellent music was rendered by a quartette from this church where our comrade in life, had worshipped. They sang "Beloved" and "Gone Before." Many neighbors and friends assembled to sympathize with the family and to view, for the last time, the familiar face. Floral tributes covered the casket. The bearers from Post to were George A. Carpenter, Simon B. Sargent, Joseph Midgley, Nathan L. Rev're, Samuel H. Fuller and John B. Wesson. The body was placed, for the present, in the tomb at Hope cemetery. Among the friends present were James A. Logan, John S. Brigham, Alfred S. Roc and Joseph C. Barrett.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known American writers are given here.
To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent.
Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Nov. 28,

The Epworth League of Grace Church is to hold a social next Tuesday evening at which the Backwoods chorus will give a rehearsal.

The next annual convention of the New England District Epworth League is to be held in Worcester in October 1892, and it is necessary at this early date to begin preparations for it.
Committees are to be chosen from all the Leagues in the city to have charge of all arrangements, and active work will begin at once.
Nearly 600 delegates met at Portland this year; and we should be prepared to entertain 1,000 next year, for Worcester is centrally situated and easily accessible from all parts of New England. We look for a large and enthusiastic meeting at that time.

The Methodists of the city have established a mission at Lake View, in Wesley Hall, corner of Coburn Avenue and Anna Street. Rev. Dr. J. D. Pickles of Trinity delivered the first sermon. Services will be held Sunday afternoons and evenings and Tuesday and Friday evenings. A Sunday School has also been organized.

George Eliot's ROMOLA.

Have you read this interesting romance? It is a brilliant story of life in Florence, Italy, in the latter part of the fifteenth century, which was marked by Savonarola's career and martyrdom. George Eliot is admitted by thoughtful persons to have been endowed with one of the greatest minds of this century, and perhaps, the greatest of feminine intellects. Romola is one of the most popular of her books; and for it she was paid $40,000 by a London publisher. The inspiring and spirited career of Savonarola forms a part of the plot of Romola; the situations are very dramatic and there isn't an uninteresting portion in the whole story. An eminent authority says, "Romola stands the test of a great novel."

Like many other notable works Romola has never been issued in an economical edition. It has remained for the Syndicate to issue editions of Romola, Lorna Doone, Anna Karenina, and John Halifax, Gentleman, at prices that have never been approached and that are within the reach of the lightest purse.

We commend Romola, as a book, to all who relish fine reading. The price—15c—opens another avenue of good literature for the benefit of thousands. Bound neatly in cloth, well printed, and uniform with the other 3 books above named—all 15c each.

Society of Antiquity.

Though Worcester is the seat of the American Antiquarian Society, one of the most notable associations of its kind in the land, there was long a feeling that a certain kind of local historical work might and ought to be done, that the older body did not touch. Not all the Worcester genius for the ancient and antique was found among those who were members of the Society founded by Isaiah Thomas. Accordingly, a few gentlemen, with true love for books and reminders of the past, met from time to time in their respective homes for the purpose of talking about congenial matters and the inspection of books and papers which they had collected. January 23, 1875, the society was organized with four members. Samuel E. Staples, who was a prime mover in the organizing, was its first president. The others present were Richard O'Flynn, John G. Smith and Franklin P. Rice. With the exception of Mr. Smith, these gentlemen are still active members. Daniel Seagrave was the first Secretary and he continued to hold the office till 1880. After him Henry Shumway, then of the Gazette, now of the Boston Herald, was Secretary for four years. Then in 1884, Wm. F. Abbott took the office and still holds it.

The charter of the society bears date, March 22, 1877 and the names borne on it are, in addition to those already given, Daniel Seagrave, H. D. Barber, Henry F. Stedman, Rev. Albert Tyler, Wm. Macready, O. L. Merriam, H. H. Thompson, E. H. Marshall, James A. Smith, W. A. Sheldon, Wm. B. Howe, Charles R. Johnson, Augustus Stone, E. R. Lawrence, Clark Jilison, Henry Phelps, A. A. Lovell, E. B. Crane, Augustus Coolidge, Rev. Thomas E. St. John, E. I. Comins, T. M. Lamb, Dwight A. Davis, B. J. Dodge, I. N. Metcalf, George Sumner, Dr. Joseph N. Bates, A. C. Munroe and Charles W. Estabrook. Not all these gentlemen are members now, for some have resigned, others have died.

Mr. Staples continued to be president till 1879, when he was succeeded by Hon. Clark Jilison who held the office two years and was followed by the present incumbent, Ex-Alderman Ellery B. Crane. James A. Smith was treasurer till 1882 when Henry F. Stedman took the office and continues in it at this date. John G. Smith was the first librarian, though his duties were not very heavy, for when, early in 1877, the society took up its abode in the Foster Street Bank Building, it possessed but one book, viz., Worcester in the Revolution, compiled and presented by Albert A. Lovell. To Mr. Smith in 1878, Albert A. Lovell succeeded and he continued in office till 1881, beginning a card catalogue system, continued by his successors, S. E. Staples 1882 and Thomas A. Dickinson to date. That collection of one book has grown to a library of above 40,000 titles of books and pamphlets.

Naturally, the membership is largely local, including a large number of those who love and revere the antique. Among these are several who, also, belong to the Antiquarian Society. Life membership may be had by the payment of $25 at one time and many have availed themselves of this opportunity. Where all have had so much interest in the society, it might seem invidious to select any particular names for mention, but it may not be amiss to note the early wisdom and energy of Samuel E. Staples and the Hon. Clark Jilison who, in many ways, contributed to the well being of the body. Albert A. Lovell was a tower of strength and his successor, Mr. Dickinson has been invaluable in his services. Secretaries Seagrave and Abbot, and Treasurers Smith and Stedman have done much work and carried heavy burdens; but over and above all others, must be named President Crane and Mr. Franklin P. Rice. To the former, we owe without doubt, the fine building into which the society moves this week, for without his work and devotion it would not be. Mr. Rice by his printing of the Proceedings of the Society and the Records of Worcester has given the organization a reputation as wide as the country.

For fourteen years the rooms were occupied on Foster Street. In these two rooms were stored immense collections of books, papers and relics till further crowding seemed impossible. Save the purchase of the library of the late Rev. George Allen, effected by the active aid of the Hon. Geo. F. Hoar and some others, the collections were almost wholly from gifts and exchange. In this emergency, in October 1889, Mr. Stephen Salisbury gave to the society a lot of land at the North end and supplemented this gift with a generous subscription toward the building fund.

The building is complete. The cut shows what it is exteriorly, and the public is welcome to enter and to behold its interior arrangements. Its cost is not far from $25,000, and the society is justly proud of it and of the purposes to which it will be put. It adds another to the structures that are clustering around Lincoln Square, affording good company for the City Hall which at no distant date must stand near it.

The Opening.

At 3.15 p. m., Tuesday, the 24th, the building was opened by exercises in Salisbury Hall. In the audience, completely filling the hall, were many of Worcester's most substantial and respected citizens. The platform was decorated with ferns and in addition to the President there were seated with him Mayor Harrington, Senator Hoar, Rev. Carlton A. Staples of Lexington, Stephen Salisbury and Hon. Amos Perry, secretary of the Rhode Island Historical society. The remarks of President Crane were exceedingly happy, referring to the early days of the Society, its way upward, through tribulation, to its present condition. While his words were largely reminiscent, he said: "The work of the society is to encourage, cultivate and develop love for historical studies and research; to preserve for ourselves and future generations such historical data as may be gathered, and for this purpose a library and museum have been established."

He alluded to the location of the building as being near scenes of Indian depredations, going back to the very earliest date in Worcester's history. Hard by was the home of Capt. Wing where Capt. Howe and his soldiers found shelter the night before discovering the murdered body of Diggory Sargent on Sagatabscot Hill.

Mayor Francis A. Harrington was introduced as one of the few mayors of Worcester who were natives of the town. Mayor Harrington, in responding, said he was not only a native of Worcester, but his homestead had been in the possession of his ancestors for 160 years. He highly commended the work of the society, and congratulated the members upon their possession of an elegant building, which would prove a valuable addition to the educational facilities of the city.

Senator George F. Hoar was introduced and he spoke, as he ever does, most entertainingly concerning the purposes of the Society, making a passing contrast between this organization and its neighbor, The American Antiquarian Society. The charms of home life were extolled. "I hope the reputation of the great men of Worcester, of the past and the future, is to be safe in your hands, that it will ever find here, subject always to the supreme and transcendent duty of absolute truth, a champion and a defender. One of the most noble conceptions of medieval chivalry is Wilkie Collins' story of the jewel which was taken by the English conquerors from the eye of the statue of the Hindoo deity. You remember how the four Hindoo gentlemen of highest caste and noblest blood devoted their lives to the recovery of this ornament of their temple. The reputation of a great man is the jewel in the eye of the city.

Let us not deal with our history as if it were the story of a mean or an ignoble people.

From the day when the three famous Cromwellian soldiers planted this town in the wilderness and gave it a name which should forever recall that crowning mercy in the great struggle for constitutional liberty, down to the time when Charles Allen summoned her young mechanics to the rescue from slavery of the great territory which lies between the Mississippi and the Pacific down to the day when Charles Devens went to his honored grave, the annals of Worcester have been crowded with generosity and with heroism.

We also are of the Saxon strain. In our halls is hung armor of the invincible knights of old. The temple, in which Worcester is no mean chapel, covers a continent and its portals are upon both the seas. Our young men are not ashamed, if need be, to speak with the enemy at the gate."

The Rev. Carlton A. Staples of Lexington brought greetings from the Historical Society of that interesting town and spoke of the relations existing between Lexington and Worcester.

Mr. Stephen Salisbury, the generous benefactor of the society extended congratulations from the American Antiquarian Society of which he is president and felicitated the younger body upon its successful growth and prospects. He also thanked the society for the honor done him in naming the hall for him.

The Hon. Amos Perry of the Rhode Island Historical Society closed the speaking with greetings from his society and with the highest compliments for what The Society of Antiquity has done and for the indications of future usefulness.

While the books are not yet in place, the rooms were thrown open to the inspection of the visitors who could not help expressing pleasure at the appointments and accommodations. In its new quarters, the society seems to have an opportunity for growth and great prosperity.

Description of Building.

The new building of the Worcester Society of Antiquity is located upon Salisbury St., near Grove, upon the site donated by St. Stephen Salisbury, who also generously contributed $5,000 to the building fund. It is situated in a very desirable locality, and in the immediate vicinity of three other modern public buildings: the Central Church, the State Armory and the Salisbury St., public school-house. The building is constructed of Greenfield, Mass., selected common brick, with Milford pink granite basement of broken ashlar, and trimmings of the same stone in brick walls above, and slated roof on main building and tower, with metal cornices.

It was the desire of the building committee to erect a plain substantial structure, with only a moderate amount of ornamentation on the exterior as is shown by illustration.

An important feature considered, was to have a structure comparatively safe from danger of destruction or damage by fire, to building or contents. No effort was made, owing to the great expense, of attempting to erect a strictly fire-proof building, but the idea to be carried out, was to have a building of what is termed "slow burning" construction, according to the best experience of the present time. The exterior walls are built with an air space, to prevent dampness, and admit of plastering directly upon walls, without wooden furring or laths, and the outer and inner walls are tied together with galvanized iron wall ties. The main partitions are of brick, also plastered directly upon wall. The few wooden partitions are made solid, with 2 x 4 studs filled in between by bricks to avoid having any spaces for fire to spread. The floors are constructed similar to the modern method of mill construction, with large hard pine timbers instead of small joists, and "2 x 4" spruce timber on top, spiked solid together, and asbestos paper under top floor. All these solid partitions and ceilings are covered with "sheathing laths," which consists of 7-8 matched boards with parallel dove-tail grooves, for holding mortar, and is a new material in this vicinity.

The basement contains the museum, also boiler room, with rear outside entrance and two store rooms, one provided with a water closet. On the first floor is the library 35 x 62 feet and 16 feet high, which is fitted up with iron book racks, with adjustable wooden shelves; the main entrance hall with stairs to basement and upper story,—these stairs being constructed upon open springs, with no concealed spaces,—and on left of entrance is librarian's room, 14½ x 16½ and small store room provided with water closet.

On the second floor is the auditorium to be called Salisbury Hall, in honor of the donor of the site, of the same size as library below and is finished open up to the roof, with exposed roof trusses, purlin plate and rafters. At each end of this hall, also on stair landing are stained glass windows, of very appropriate design for the purpose for which this building is intended, and also delineating some of Worcester's early history. At the right of the head of the stairs on this floor, is the reception room, 16½ x 25 feet and 12½ feet high, with ante room in tower, ladies toilet room stair, landing, men's toilet room opening out of stair case hall, and stairs to printing room in attic.

This attic room is to be used by Mr. F. P. Rice in printing the publications of the Society, and opening out of this room is a store room with stairs to upper part of tower. As small an amount of wood work as practicable, has been used in interior finish. The first story is finished in oak, also paneled oak ceiling for entrance porch, and all other finish is North Carolina pine, all finished in natural color of wood, and hard wood floors in all rooms and halls. All plumbing in the building is executed according to the best modern sanitary ideas, with fixtures open and exposed to view. Much attention has also been given to heating and ventilation, large brick flues being constructed for indirect steam heat to library, hall and museum, from brick warm air room in basement, with fresh air inlet from rear window opening to warm air room which contains radiator stacks, and flues from each room or hall, for exit of foul air.

The architects of the building are Barker & Nourse of this city, but much of the credit for the planning and construction is due to E. B. Crane, the president of the Society, who has devoted much time and thought to the successful completion of this addition to the city's public buildings. The contract for excavating and foundations was awarded to Peter Kenney, and completed in the Autumn of 1890, when work was suspended until the Spring of the present year. Addison Palmer, an old member of the Society, was the contractor for the superstructure, and the following are the various sub-contractors: brick work and plastering, Pellett Bros.; cut stone work, Burns & Loughlin; roofing and metal cornices, Geo. A. Barnard; window frames and interior finish, L. L. Clark & Co.; iron work, C. W. Walls & Co.; stained glass windows, Worcester Stained Glass works; plumbing, N. G. Tucker & Son; painting and hard wood finishing, McCarron & St. John.

Benedict Arnold.

John Fiske tells the old story of Benedict Arnold's treason, in an article of fascinating interest written for the Atlantic. The last years of Arnold in London were years of bitter remorse and self-reproach. The great name which he had so gallantly won and so wretchedly lost left him no repose by night or day. In the last sad days in June, 1801, the family tradition says, Arnold's mind kept reverting to his old friendship with Washington. He had always carefully preserved the American uniform which he wore on the day when he made his escape to the Vulture; and now as, broken in spirit and weary of life, he felt the last moments coming, he called for this uniform and put it on, and decorated himself with the epaulets and sword-knot which Washington had given him after the victory of Saratoga. "Let me die," said he, "in this old uniform in which I fought my battles. May God forgive me for ever putting on any other."

George S. Burnham of Albany is home for Thanksgiving, at No. 1 Howe Street.

"Oh! the little birds sang east,
And the little birds sang west,
And the air was full of merry tune
And the purple Autumn haze,
And the golden sunset rays
Pointed softly back again to June.

"Oh! the little birds sang east,
And the little birds sang west,
And the brown leaves fluttered slowly down;
And we could not make it seem
That in such a pleasant dream,
Winter had the heart to cast a frown.

Lo! No little birds sang east,
And no little birds sang west,
When the morrow dawned upon the world,
For the purple air was white,
And the brown leaves covered quite
And King Winter stood there, Monarch hold!

In Free Trade England.

In England the classes have always kept the masses under. It is a country of low wages, and the average working man is born in poverty and never gets out of it.

These figures from General Booth's book will show the results of a mistaken economic system. In England there are 700,000 criminals, 22,000 juvenile thieves.

There are 100,000 fallen women, and 500,000 drunkards.

The annual cost of liquors is $750,000,000. Suicides last year numbered 2,297, and 2,157 were found dead.

Last year 10,000 children died from violence or neglect.

Over 100,000 people are absolutely homeless, and 100,000 are out of work.

The workhouses shelter 100,000, and 3,000,000 people outside are so wretchedly poor that they are hardly civilized.

Heretofore it has been believed that much of this misery and poverty was caused by liquor and crime. The new theory is that misery and poverty drive people into crime and intemperance.

The active cause of all this is low wages. Life in England to the favored few who tread the primrose path, is one long holiday. But the toiling millions have to foot the bill in one way or another. They are ground down in the mire, and are paid so little for their work that a laborer is fortunate if he can afford meat on his table once a week. A Sunday suit of clothes is an impossibility. Dispair makes these people unthrifty, and drives them to seek forgetfulness in drink. Bolder spirits join the army of criminals. Others helplessly drift into vagrancy.

It is a bad economic system that is responsible for these evils. Good wages lessen both poverty and crime. They enable workmen to rise in the social scale, and save enough for a rainy day. Nor do the capitalists lose anything. The money paid to the working classes immediately gets into circulation, stimulates business and adds to the general prosperity.

In countries like England where the ruling classes make it their policy to keep the masses on the verge of starvation there is always danger of a social revolution. Men will not long remain peaceful and law abiding citizens if they cannot get what their labor is worth.—Atlanta Constitution.

Will D. B. Meade.

The portrait which accompanies this sketch presents a younger face than most of those which LIGHT has had the privilege of introducing to its readers. But it is a face which has become, during the past three years, very well known to Worcester people, particularly to the young men, and its owner has gained a host of friends, who regret exceedingly that he is to sever his connection with the Young Men's Christian Association and return to his home in Pittsfield. It was with the idea that many of these friends would be pleased to possess his portrait and a few facts about his life that his portrait and sketch were prepared.

Will D. B. Meade was born in Pittsfield, Mass. His father was and is still the leading carriage dealer in the city and the Meade family has lived in Pittsfield for several generations. Mr. Meade completed the regular grammar school course, entered the high school and was graduated therefrom, the valedictorian of his class, in 1887.

The young man became very early interested in Young Men's Christian Association work. October 15, 1885, during the third year of his high school course, he became assistant secretary of the Pittsfield Association and held the position until he came to Worcester, acting for four months of the period as general secretary.

At the International convention of Young Men's Christian Associations, held at Orange, N. J., in 1889, Mr. Meade met Mr. Samuel C. McConaughy, who was then general secretary of the Worcester Association and who was on the lookout for an assistant secretary for his association. The result of the meeting was that on his return, Mr. McConaughy recommended Mr. Meade to the board of directors as an excellent man for the vacant office, the board adopted his recommendation and Mr. Meade began his work here June 1, 1889. On his departure from Pittsfield, he was presented with a gold watch by the members of the association, indicating in what great esteem he was held by them.

Mr. Meade's work in this city has not been characterized by any single remarkable display of energy but rather by continuous and faithful hard work. During the first year he assisted Mr. McConaughy in the general planning of the work and had charge of the committee work, Mr. George Robbins, then an assistant secretary also, having charge of the tions and will probably accept the secretaryship of some other association. Tuesday evening, he was presented with a purse of money made up by members of the association as a testimonial of their regard for him and of their appreciation of his faithful work. Congratulations are offered in advance to whoever next secures his services for they will find in him a faithful, earnest and withal a willing worker, always obliging and always ready to help a struggling brother.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

A real treat is prepared for those who attend the fourth of the Young Mens Christian Association course of entertainments next Thursday evening, when Fred Emerson Brooks, the California poet-humorist, will read. Those who have already heard him will await with pleasant expectations his coming, while those who know him only by his reputation or his poems will be just as eager to hear him. He will be assisted Thursday evening by Sidney Woodward, the tenor soloist.

A soiree musicale will be given Tuesday evening, Dec. 1, at the studio of Mr. B. D. Allen, 173 Main Street, in which the participants will be Mrs. Margaret Holohan, soprano; Miss Alma Collins, contralto; Mr. B. D. Allen, pianist; Mr. W. S. Kennedy, accompanist.

Cherry Valley.

The Bakers Dozen Dramatic Club of Cherry Valley gave a pleasing entertainment in the vestry of the St. Thomas Episcopal Church, Tuesday evening, to a large and appreciative audience. They presented in a most acceptable manner the comic drama in two acts, "A Black Diamond," and the farce, "Wanted, a Male Cook." Large parties from Worcester, Leicester and neighboring towns were present at this the first of a series of dramatic performances to be given by the club.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"The Mask of Life," a drama picturing the life of the Nihilists in Russia, and replete with interesting situations, is the attraction at Lothrop's Pleasant Street Opera House this week. Miss Kate Glassford as Vera, a young woman who has many alluring temptations to forsake her husband, but who remains true to her wifely duties and noble character to the end, has a part in which she well displays those peculiar talents which have gained for her an enviable reputation as a studious and popular actress. Mr. Barringer as Leon, Count Vladimir, Vera's husband, is accorded an enthusiastic reception at every performance, clearly demonstrating the fact that he is the most popular actor in romantic roles in the Lothrop Companies. Mr. Herbert M. Colby, as Prince Khonich, a friend of Leon, who proves himself a traitor and scheming villain in his endeavor to rob the affections of his friend's wife, is admirably adapted to the character, his facial expression at times being so perfect as to evoke hisses from the tender-hearted portion of the audience.

Miss Ethel Tucker, as Chip, in "Fogg's Ferry," is booked for next week. "An Irish Stew," with the requisite fixings, will precede each performance.

membership work. From June 1 to Dec. 15, 1890, he was acting general secretary, doing the work which three men had done before, thus saving to the association the salary of two men for six months. General Secretary Gale came in December, 1890, and since then, Mr. Meade has been his assistant.

While Mr. Meade has been in Worcester he has had many excellent opportunities offered him by other associations but he has preferred to remain here. But when Mr. Gale came he introduced into the work some new methods in which Mr. Meade did not believe and he resigned. Many wished him to withdraw the resignation, but he thought it best that he should go and so insisted on its acceptance.

Mr. Meade returned this week to his home in Pittsfield to spend Thanksgiving there. He has under consideration several offers of posi-War Stories.

Most of you have no doubt read Bret Harte's famous poem, "John Burns of Gettysburg." In it you find the hero spoken of as if he were a farmer, while the truth is he was a shoemaker and had his shop very near the center of the town. So it was to his bench and last, not to his cows and sheep, that he returned after the battle. He was an old man at the time, fought with the One-hundred-and-fiftieth Pennsylvania Regiment, to which he offered his services, until he was wounded, and died a few years afterward in the place where he fought so bravely.

The first week in May, 1863, our army was defeated at a place in Virginia called Chancellorsville. After the defeat the soldiers were ordered to leave knapsacks and every thing that could be left and march rapidly. Two soldiers near the rear of the wing, tired and ravenously hungry, while passing through a small town saw some tempting pies displayed in a bakery window. The temptation was too great to be resisted, and the hungry couple slipped out of the ranks and were soon devouring pie. When they came out of the bakery the last of the army had just disappeared. Hurrying to catch up with them, they were horrified to see a sentry in the road some distance ahead, which showed that the regiment had gone into camp for the night, and they did not know the countersign! To go and present themselves to the sentry meant that they would be put in the guard-house and perhaps severely dealt with. They retired into some bushes at the road-side to consult as to what they should do, and while there saw a party of officers coming along the road toward the camp. Quick as a flash one of the culprits saw his opportunity, and stepping to center of the road cried, "Halt, and give the counter sign."

The officers, thinking him a sentry posted at this point, did as requested, and passed on. This gave the magic word to the piouss, if not pious, soldiers, who were soon with their mates in camp relating their adventure.

A strange coincidence occurred on Culp's Hill, two months later, during the battle of Gettysburg. A Union soldier came to his officer and asked permission to go out beyond the lines. It was night, and he knew he could do so safely.

"Why do you wish to go?"

"To get a knapsack. I have lost mine, and lots of dead Johnnies just over the earthworks have good knapsacks on."

"Well," said the officer, "you can't go; but if I don't happen to see you its all right."

As he obligingly turned his back the soldier disappeared and soon returned bearing a knapsack.

"It looks like a good one," said the officer.

"Yes, it is," said the soldier, "and what more, it is my own," and he displayed his name on it as he spoke.

"How did that happen?"

"Why, it is the one I had to leave when we retreated from Chancellorsville. That man must have found and worn it until I took it just now from his dead body."

This incident was told in our hearing by the officer himself at Spangler's Spring, near which place the incident occurred. During the first day's battle at Gettysburg this incident occurred which is told by General Abner Doubleday in his account of the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. Every one who reads it will be glad, I am sure, that the gallant colonel was not killed. Colonel Wheelock, of the Ninety-seventh New York, was cut off during the retreat of Robinson's division, and took refuge in a house. A rebel lieutenant entered and called upon him to surrender his sword. This he declined to do, whereupon the lieutenant called in several of his men, formed them in line, took out his watch and said to the colonel: "You are an old, gray-headed man, and I dislike to kill you; but if you don't give up that sword in five minutes I shall order these men to blow your brains out." When the time was up the colonel still refused to surrender. A sudden tumult at the door, caused by some prisoners attempting to escape, called the lieutenant off for a moment. When he returned the colonel had given his sword to a girl in the house who had asked him for it, and she secreted it between two mattresses. He was then marched to the rear, but being negligently guarded escaped the same night and returned to his regiment.—Christian Advocate.

In boyhood, LIGHT knew Col. Wheelock very well and had not the exigencies of living compelled a removal, possibly the grand old veteran would have been our colonel. The story is characteristic.

Miss Ada Carter of Framingham Normal School called at LIGHT office a week since and showed some most excellent pictures made by her of the Wayside Inn in Sudbury and of the Normal School. A pleasant diversion and most admirable souvenirs.

Hawthorne at a "Blow."

It is related by a writer in the New England Magazine for December that although Hawthorne at college took part in the "blows," and much as he enjoyed being present at these festal scenes, "he never told a story nor sang a song. His voice was never heard in any shout of merriment; but the silent beaming smile would testify to his keen appreciation of the scene, and to his enjoyment of the wit. He would sit for a whole evening with head gently inclined to one side, hearing every word, seeing every gesture, and yet scarcely a word would pass his lips."

Hope for Him.

"I don't know that you will be able to do much with him," said a father to a principal of school, to whom he had brought his son as a pupil, "he is so full of mischief."

"Does he tell the truth?" asked the principal.

"Can I always depend upon his word?"

"Oh, yes," said the father, "he is honest; he will tell the truth, even when it is against himself; you may depend on that."

"Then we can manage him," said the principal. "He will make a reliable, manly man."

Dorothy.

Asleep she lies, the fairest flower unbent;
Grave Rest has claimed my wee one for his own,
And in his halls of harmony divine,
The courtiest dreams shall bend at her sweet shrine.

For her eyes are mirrors, clear as perfect day,
Which reflect the blueness of violets in May,
And the light of Innocence, that dearest grace
Of all that childhood's cherished years embrace.

And Dorothy is fair, her baby glance
Is like unto the star-gleam, that plays across O'er the pearls of a rose; and her silver hair
Has all the burnished gold of the sun-lit air.

And her voice is sweeter far than the thrush's note,
Or even blue-bell-chimes, or the sea's softest
And darkest clouds are powerless to chill
Her heart's art-glow, or shadow joy with ill.

But now, so lushed, I wonder what will be Your life's long dream, my babe, my Dorothy,
Will homage yet be thine, in the after-time?
Will the years roll by as one sweet, unbroken rhyme?

No voice replies, but a robin lingering near
My window, sings in tones so blithe and clear,
That my dreaming one awakes, and I murmur low,
The dearest truth that heart can ever know.

Eating and Religion.

The remarks of the Rev. L. C. Stewardson of this city at the Episcopal Congress in Washington with reference to the turning of every church into an eating saloon were extremely happy. He depreciates "Bean Suppers," "Pink Teas," etc., as not means conducive to grace. May his words spread and be effectual.

One of the latest novelties in rubber goods is the storm rubber. Until recently ladies have had a monopoly of this very necessary Winter article of comfort, but now it is possible for gentlemen to obtain the rubber at the well-known store of the Worcester Rubber Company, 324 Main Street. Ladies and gentlemen who wish comfort along with fashion will do well to examine this rubber before purchasing elsewhere. Mr. Aaron S. Taft, the proprietor, is prepared to furnish everything desirable in the line of fashionable rubber clothing.

Killed by Cigar tte Smoking.

The vice paper cigarette was the cause of the premature death of another bright youth yesterday. The lad's name was Fred G. Miller, aged fourteen years. He lived with his aunt, Mrs. Krone, who owns a large bakery at Fourth Street and Vernon Avenue, Long Island City. He contracted the habit of cigarette smoking several years ago, and became such an incessant smoker that he smoked peripatetic to his death three and four packs a day. Soon after he was taken sick he became delirious, and when physicians were called in he was beyond help and died of heart failure, undoubtedly caused by the cigarettes. He was a bright and promising scholar in the public school. New York Times, Nov. 20th.

"SCHEPP'S PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE WORLD."

THE GREATEST BOOK ON EARTH.

COSTING $100,000

NEW, NOVEL, STRIKING.

A Wonderful Collection of Photographs. Everyone Seeing it Will Want a Copy.

We take great pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to one of the most daring, if not the most marvellous achievement, that has yet been accomplished in the publishing world. We refer to a new and most valuable publication, entitled "Schepp's Photographs of the World" representing renowned picture scene scenery, historic castles, views of cities, avenues, buildings, monuments, copies of celebrated paintings and artistic statuary, collected from every corner of the world.

It includes every thing of any interest through Great Britain, from the Blarney Castle to the Giant's Causeway in Ireland, and from the Hills of Scotland to the South Coast of England; through Europe, from Gibraltar and Italy, in the South to Hammerfest in Norway—the most northern town in the world—and to Constantinople and the Russian Mines in Siberia in the far East.

Through Africa, from the Suez Canal, Egypt and the Nile in the East to Cape of Good Hope in the South and life among the Natives in the interior, West and North; through Asia and the Orient, from the Holy Land, Arabia and Persia in the West to India, China, Japan, Australia, and the Islands of the Pacific in the South and East.

Through Spanish South America, from Terra del Fuego to Panama; through the Central American States and Mexico—land of the Aztecs; through Alaska, Greenland, British North America and Canada.

Through the United States, from the Golden Gate in the West to the Rocky Mountains in the North to the Cotton States in the South, forming one of the finest, rarest, wealthiest, and most beautiful, interesting and historic collections of Photographs ever seen.

The Photographs representing master paintings and works of art, taken from the French Salon, Louvre, Luxembourg, Versailles, Dresden, Uffizi, Pitti and Vatican Galleries, are direct and accurate reproductions of the famous originals. Their value is so great that the wealth of nations could not buy them. No collection like this has ever before been found between the lids of any book.

Every Photograph is carefully explained in from four to six lines printed matter, in an accurate, concise and most interesting manner. So great has been the demand for this book already, that the publishers immediately translated the English explanations into Swedish and German, printing the book in three languages within four weeks, and we understand that a Spanish edition is now in course of preparation.

The work is issued by the Globe Bible Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, Penn. The publishers, who are wide awake, and know how to meet the wants of the masses, have placed the retail prices marvellously low, ranging from $5.25 to $7.00, according to the style of binding, giving every one an opportunity to purchase a copy.

Mr. E. H. Chamberlain, 3 Clarence Street, is the local representative for this community, and we trust that this announcement to our many readers may prepare every one to receive him cordially. A postal card to his address will receive early attention.

New and True, by Mary Wiley Staver, Boston. Lee & Shepard, $2.00.

"Rhythms and rhythms and histories droil For boys and girls from pole to pole."

To begin with, the cover is attractive. Two little folks are looking away from the lower part of the cover to a most benign moon which beams down upon them from the upper and remotest corner. The little people are standing just above "Bob" Burdett's sentiment concerning the volume which is, "Eighty Degrees in the Shade above all the Rhyming Juveniles for several Seasons." Many a childish soul will be happy as "New and True" is drawn from the suspended stocking, for my copies must find their way there. The illustrations by Lavina Effinghansen, Jessie Wilcox Smith, Jessie McDermott, J. Augustus Beck and Herman Faber and they have done their part admirably. Here are 136 pages of verse and nearly as many pictures as pages. There are babies in all phases of happiness and who would not be happy in looking at them? Santa Claus comes in for a goodly amount of attention, for is it not a Christmas book? Here are old stories, newly told, old friends in new dresses, but we can make them out in spite of the disguises. Where is the boy who will not sympathize with Tim, who is learning the multiplication table while visions of everything else rush before his mind. It's Oh! to be a child again when such beautiful books are made for the pleasure of childhood. That happy period is past all too quickly. For sale by Putnam, Davis, & Co.

Over the Bounding Waves of Life. Illustrated by Frederick Marshall. Published by DeWolf, Fiske & Co., Boston. $2.00.

Seldom do artist and publisher unite to present a more attractive volume than this which is put forth, thus early, for holiday season. She will be hard to please, whose heart will not exult when a copy of this book, from a lover's hand, finds its way into her possession. With the artist's freest touch, life is symbolized in old Ocean's phases. Ship and shore, waves, sails and creaking cordage are made to represent the variations, the pleasures and privations of every one's life voyage. Fitting verbal accompaniment is found in the words of Bayard Taylor, Charles Dibdin, Thomas K. Hervey, Lord Byron, George Wither, George P. Morris, Shakespeare, Percival, Coleridge, Pope, Whittier, Tennyson, Mrs. Stowe, Paul H. Hayne and many more, possibly, less known to fame. Or should it be said that the words came first and then the artist's realization of what the poet thought followed? In either event, pen and pencil have wrought in unison and most happy is the result. Every page is a choice study of the best work of the printers as well as that of the artist. Such a book finds its appropriate place among the artistic gems that cover the center table or are ever near at hand for ready reference. The old will see in it traces of the storms that they have weathered, the middle aged, recognize the sea over which they are sailing, while the young look along the way and wonder what waves and waters they are to encounter. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

With Wind and Tide.—Homeward Bound, by G. W. Beneman. From De Wolf, Fiske & Co., Boston, $2.00

This is an excellent companion piece to "Over the Waves of Life," and pictures in a similar manner the voyage of Life. From Father Neptune, who with crown and trident looks from the first page to the coming in of the ship, on the last, in the same genial style of art, the delineator pictures what life may be.

"Outward or homeward bound,

Free or deep—laid;

Like ghosts without a sound

When the west is faded;

Cleaving the moonshine-track,

Where the white stripes

Bar the dark waters back—

God save the ships!"

Charles Kingsley, Sir Walter Scott, Lord Byron, Clough, Thomas Moore, Walter Mitchell, Barry Cromwell, Byron Walter Proctor, Charles Dibdin, Robert Buchanan, Longfellow, Thackeray, Bayard Taylor, Sarah Doubney, William Sharp, Shelley, Dowden, Joaquin Miller, Caroline Southey and others furnish the text. What a diversity of scene the pages present. There are storm and calm; the sailor in the shrouds and the happy fellow blowing his pipe amidst 'fo' castle comfort. The reader who has gone down to the sea will acknowledge the masterly truthfulness of every stroke of the artist's pencil. One pleasing effect in the pictures, is the border of rope or cable tied in the various knots that only sailors know. Many a boy will gain a love of the sea through the pictures and words of this book and he might do worse than be one of those who yield themselves subjects to Neptune's sway. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

D. C. Heath & Co. will publish shortly Racine's "Esther," edited by Prof. I. H. B. Spicers of the William Penn Charter School, Philadelphia.

The tragedy of "Esther" is not only one of the masterpieces of the Augustan Age of French Literature, but it is the easiest and also the shortest of these. Hence it is a particularly good text to put into the hands of moderately advanced students of the French language, who can thus early be made acquainted with the very best that French writers have produced.

For such students, whether at school or college, the present edition has been carefully prepared. The text has been modernized throughout. The introduction briefly summarizes the life of Racine, the development of French tragedy, and lastly the history and chief excellences of the play of "Esther." The notes and appendices are intended to make clear such matters of history or grammar as offer any difficulty, or to emphasize that which may be especially instructive from a literary, historical, or grammatical point of view.

The Magazine of New England History. Notes and Queries, Reprints, a medium of intercommunication for historical and genealogical students. R. H. Tilley, editor and publisher, Newport, R. I.

This excellent publication has reached the end of its first year. Of the next year, the following is sent. For the next volume many original papers have already been prepared Dr. L. E. Holmes, of Butte, Montana, contributes an article on John Holmes, of Jefferson, N. H., and his descendants. Mr. Wm. T. Wallace Tooker, of Sag Harbor, Long Island, a paper entitled "Analysis of the claims of Southold, L. I., for priority of settlement over Southampton, L. I., and how they are disproved by the early records and contemporary manuscripts." This article will be of interest to many New England families. Articles on the Easton, Greene and Wickes families, are in our hands. Papers on certain branches of the Adams, Casey, Ellery and Weaver families have been promised. The interesting and valuable records of Samuel Hubbard, and the marriage record (1750-1800) of Rev. Gardner Thurston, of Newport, R. I., will be continued.

A limited number of copies of volume one, with title page, and index to names, can be furnished to new subscribers only. Single copies are not sold. New subscribers should send their orders at once, as the first volume will soon be out of print, and we desire to know how many of the January, 1892, number (to be issued early in December 1891) to print. Quarterly, $2.00 a year.

A Ward of the Golden Gate. A novel by Bret Harte. Riverside Paper Series. 50 cents. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

This is another of Mr. Harte's Californian stories, told with the skill which he possesses in so marked a degree. The "ward" is a child left in charge of trustees by a mysterious woman, the city of San Francisco being one of the trustees. The unknown child is, almost by accident, named "Verba Buena," and she is educated and grows up handsome, and fascinating to such a degree that the youngest of the trustees falls in love with her. The story is carried to a satisfying conclusion, and is, like all of Mr. Harte's stories, exceedingly readable. No writer is more happy in his titles for his story and a title is fully one half. From his "Iliad of Sandy Bar" to this latest tale, there is an attractiveness in the heading that few other books possess. This takes us to that wonderful land locked water that the Californians are justly proud of.

"First come, first served" applies in matters literary as well as others. As usual, Ballou's Monthly arrives first of all the December magazines. The stories are good and the bits of history and geography in "Old Ironside's" and "A French Convict Colony in the South Pacific" are instructive as well as interesting. The magazine always affords a few hours of pleasant reading.

Babyland. Baby's delight and mother's relief.

Gay jingles, sweet little stories, dainty pictures will make Babyland for 1892 a charming magazine for the little ones. Among the many good things will be Nurse Karen's Norway Tales—stories told by a Norwegian nurse to little Americans—by Emelie Poulsen, whose "Finger Plays" and "Toy Closet Stories" have made her our fairy godmother.

The Sweetheart Stories, by Bella D. Clark, a new friend, but one who knows all about baby folk.

The Tiptoe Twins, and their doings, will be described by Margaret Johnson, whose "Toddlekittens" and "Boofer Kitten" have never been forgotten. Only 50 cents a year. D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

The Abandoned Chalm, by Flora Haines Leaghead, author of The Man Who Was Guilty. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, Mass.

The father of the family is stricken with paralysis and taken to the hospital. Three children are left with no one to care for them and very little money to provide them a home. They have promised to keep together and the school teacher to whom they apply for advice tells them to take up land and make a home in the West. The oldest boy is fifteen and the youngest, a girl, is only ten. The energy and pluck of these three is well shown and the difficulties that constantly rise and the way they surmount them form a tale of no ordinary merit. Their claim is disputed and only by bringing the father to the Home Ranch can they hold the land, but he is brought and in the bright atmosphere and with the loving care and happiness all about him he actually gets better and is able to move about. Dr. John is a rather mysterious character but so good to the children that we are glad when he turns out all that we wished he might. That the young people will all enjoy the story goes without saying and as a holiday gift we could not ask a nicer, cleaner book to give into the hands of our children. Price $1.10 at The Boston Store.

Sherman's Letters.

The letters of General Sherman, now being published in the Cosmopolitan, are unique; in fact, so far as the writer knows, they are the only letters ever written in the midst of hostilities by a great general to his daughter. We have the brief letters of Napoleon to Josephine, but there is nothing at all resembling the Sherman letters to be found in the literature of war. They not only throw a new light upon the character of the great man himself, but upon the operations then in process of being carried out. The second and last paper, which appears in the December Cosmopolitan, is unique in another respect,—that it is illustrated by a man who sat at Sherman's mess table during the campaigns of which he writes to his daughter. This most famous of war artists, Theodore R. Davis, is still alive, and supplements the Sherman letters by a very interesting paper of his own and a great number of sketches which he made at the time.

Witchcraft.

An interesting series of papers, "Stories of Salem Witchcraft," by Winfield S. Nevins, is begun in the December New England Magazine. The first article gives an account of the witchcraft cases in New England previous to 1692; the outbreak in Salem village; the court and places of trial; a full history of the trials of accused persons, and copious quotations from the remarkable testimony in the court files are given, and the article is embellished with many portraits and drawings now published for the first time, and made specially for this series. The article is particularly interesting at this time, as the two hundredth anniversary of this remarkable delusion is approaching.

The Measure of Our Days.

In all our walks, in all our ways,
Think not the measure of our days
Is gauged by figures and by rules;
As erst was taught as in the schools;
But, as we help a brother's needs
By noble acts and generous deeds
By giving comfort where we may,
By lighting up a mourner's way;
The sum of means that we employ
To turn a fellow's ills to joy—
This is the measure of our days.

A veteran in the wars of life,
A prisoned soldier in the strife
Of soul with stingy, envious Time
Is he who makes his actions rhyme
To universal brotherhood.
Though long or short hath been his road,
Centuries or decades his abode
Among his kind, it matters least
So follows by him have been blest.
His life is measured of his plan
Of dealing with his fellow man.
This is the measure of his days.

And much methinks of time he gains,
For all his labors, all his pains,
For reaching outward far and dear
To succor want and shelter fear.
No stingy padlock hems him in
To mean desires or groveling sin,
A widow's blessing, him avails,
An orphan's prayer, some good entails,
While stretching outward over man
He converse holds with Nature's plan,
And solving life's deep mysteries,
He grasps eternal worth—
This is the measure of his days.

All the Way From Switzerland.

Charles P. Haselden will be remembered by many as the president of the last graduating class at the High School. It will, also, be recalled that he left Worcester during the Summer to take up his residence in Basle, Switzerland for the purpose of studying dentistry with his uncle. LIGHT was recently favored with an excellent letter from him, bearing date of Nov. 1st. It sets forth, in graphic manner, the vicissitudes of travel, but, as he entirely escaped sea sickness, he hardly had his share of variety. Ten days were occupied in passing over the Atlantic and then came Flushing and Antwerp where he saw the cathedral and its wonders. Sunday processions astonished him as they always do Americans. He thinks the cathedral ought to be in Worcester. From Napoleon, who compared the spire of the edifice to lace work, down to the present time, every one has admired this beautiful specimen of architecture. As to art, the traveller thinks he prefers the Doric pictures in London. From Belgium, he had a ten days visit in Britain's capital, finding the latter a wonderful collection of history, art, legend and architecture. From England, he passed over the Strait of Dover to Ostende and thence rode to Switzerland's most wealthy city, Basle, or as some call it, Basil. There he has settled down to the somewhat prosaic occupation of dentistry in the midst of history that must be wonderfully attractive. Through the city flows the blue Rhine with its centuries of lore. In its northern borders was fought, in 1444, the battle of St. Jacob's, one of the contests that settled the independence of Switzerland and on the site arises a stately monument, commemorating Swiss powers. Basle was the home of Erasmus and a tablet to his memory is found in the cloisters of the great church. So, aside from work, our friend can find much to store away in memory for use at some future time.

Max O'Rell.

How He Tells a Part of His Life Story.

CHAPTER I.

I was born on the—
But this is scarcely a 'recollection' of mine. At fifteen I was passionately fond of music, and declared to my father that I had made up my mind to be an artist.

My father was a man of great common sense and few words; he administered to me a sound thrashing, which had the desired effect of restoring my attentions to Cicero and Thucydides.

It did not, however, altogether cure me of a certain yearning after literary glory.

For many months I devoted the leisure, left me by Greek version and Latin verse, to the production of a drama in five acts and twelve tableaux.

For that matter I was no exception to the rule. Every French schoolboy has written now, or will write, a play.

My drama was a highly moral one of the sensational class. Blood-curdling, horrible, terrible, savage, weird, human, fiendish, fascinating, irresistible—it was all that. I showed how, even in this world, crime, treachery, and falsehood, though triumphant for a time, must in the long run have their day of reckoning. Never did a modern Drury Lane audience see virtue more triumphant and vice more utterly confounded than the Parisians would have in my play, if only the theatrical directors had not been so stupid as to refuse my chef d'oeuvre.

For it was refused, inconceivable as it seemed to me at the time.

The directors of the French Theatres are accustomed to send criticisms of the plays which they regret to be unable to accept.

The criticism I received from the director of the Ambigu Theater was, I thought, highly encouraging.

'My play,' it appeared, 'showed no experience of the stage; but it was full of well-conceived scenes and happy mots, and was written in excellent French. Horrors, however, were too piled up, and I seemed to have forgotten that spectators should be allowed time to take breath and wipe away their tears.'

I was advised not to kill all of my dramatis personae in my next dramatic production, as it was customary for one of them to come forward and announce the name of the author at the end of the first performance.

Although this final little bit of advice appeared to me not altogether free from satire, there was in the letter more praise than I had expected, and I felt proud and happy. The letter was passed round in the class-room, commented upon in the playground, and I was so excited that I can perfectly well remember how I forgot to learn my repetition that day and how I forgot forty lines of the Ars Poetica to write out five times.

What a task down, this imposition upon a budding dramatic author!

Examinations to prepare compelled me for some time to postpone all idea of astonishing the Paris playgoers with a 'new and original' drama.

I took my B. A. at the end of that year, and my B. Sc. at the end of the following one. Three years later I was leaving the military school with the rank of sub-lieutenant.

My uniform was lovely; and if I had only had as much gold in my pockets as on my shoulders, sleeves, and breast, I think I ought to have been the happiest being on earth.

The proudest day of a young French officer's life is the day on which he goes out in the street for the first time with all his ironmongery on, his moustache curled up, his cap on his right ear, his sabre in his left hand. The soldiers he meets salute him, the ladies seem to smile approvingly upon him; he feels like the conquering hero of the day; all is bright before him; battles only suggest to him victories and promotions.

On this first day, his mother generally asks to accompany him, and take his arm. Which is the prouder of the two, the young warrior full of confidence and hope, or the dear old lady who looks at the passers-by with an air that says: 'This is my son, ladies and gentlemen. As for you, young ladies, he can't have all of you, my know.'

Poor young officer! dear old mother! They little knew, in 1869, that in a few months one would be lying in a military hospital on a bed of torture, and the other would be wondering for five mortal months whether her dear and only child was dead, or prisoner in some German fortress.

On the 19th of July, 1870, my regiment left Versailles for the Eastern frontier.

As in these pages I simply intend to say how I came to make the acquaintance of English schoolboys, it would be out of place if not somewhat pretentious, to make use of my recollections of the Franco-Prussian War.

Yet I cannot pass over two episodes of those troublous times.

I was twelve years of age when I struck up a friendship with a young Pole, named Gajekski, who was in the same class with me. We became inseparable chums. Year after year we got promoted at the same time. We took our degrees on the same days, entered the military school in the same year, and received our commissions in the same regiment.

We took a small appartement de garçon at Versailles, and I shall never forget the delightful evenings we spent together while in garrison there. He was a splendid violinist, and I was a little of a pianist.

Short, fair, and almost beardless, Gajekski was called the 'Petit Lieutenant' by the soldiers, who all idolized him.

At the battle of Wörth, after holding our ground from nine in the morning till five in the evening, against masses of Prussian troops six times as numerous as our own, we were ordered to charge the enemy, with some other cavalry regiments, in order to protect the retreat of the bulk of the enemy.

A glance at the hill opposite convinced us that we were ordered to go to certain death. My friend grasped my hand, as he said with a sad smile: 'We shall be lucky if we get our bones out of this, old fellow.'

Down the hill we went like the wind, through a shower of bullets and mitraille. Two minutes later about two-thirds of the regiment reached the opposite ascent. We were immediately engaged in a desperate hand-to-hand fight. A scene of hellish confusion it was. But there, amidst the awful din of battle, I heard Gajekski's death-cry, as he fell from his horse three or four yards from me, and I saw a horrible gash on his fair young head.

The poor boy had paid France for the hospitality she had extended to his father.

I fought like a madman, seeing nothing but that dear mutilated face before my eyes. I say, 'like a madman,' for it was not through courage or bravery. In a mêlée you fight like a madman—like a savage.

I had no brother, but he had been more than a brother to me. I had no other companion or friend, but he was a friend of a thousand.

Poor fellow!
I had been in captivity in a stronghold on the Rhine for five months, when the preliminaries of peace were signed between France and Germany in January, 1871, and the French prisoners were sent back to their country.

About five hundred of us were embarked at Hamburg on board one of the steamers of the Compagnie Trans-atlantique, and landed at Cherbourg.

Finding myself near home, I immediately asked the general in command of the district for a few days' leave, to go and see my mother.

Since the day I had been taken prisoner at Sedan (end of September, 1870), I had not received a single letter from her, as communications were cut off between the east and west of France; and I learned later on that she had not received any of the numerous letters I had written to her from Germany.

This part of Normandy had been fortunate enough to escape the horrors of war, but for months, the inhabitants had to lodge soldiers and mobiles.

At five o'clock on a cool February morning, clothed, or rather covered, in my dirty, half-ragged uniform, I rang the bell at my mother's house.

Our old servant appeared at the attic window, and inquired what I wanted.

'Open the door,' 'I am dying of cold.'
'We can't lodge you here,' she replied; 'we have as many soldiers as we can accommodate—there is no room for you.'

Go to the maître; they will tell you we are full.'

'Sapristi, my good Fanchette,' I shouted, 'don't you know me? How is mother?'

'Ah! c'est monsieur!' she screamed. And she rushed down, filling the house with her cries: Madame, madame, c'est monsieur! oui, je t'ai vu, il m'a parlé; c'est monsieur! A minute after I was in mother's arms.

Was it a dream?

She looked at me wildly, touching my head to make sure I was by her side, in reality, alive; when she realized the truth she burst into tears, and remained speechless for some time. Such scenes are more easily imagined than described, and I would rather leave it to the reader to supply all the exclamations and interrogations that followed.

I could only spend two days at home, as my regiment was being reorganized in Paris, and I had to rejoin it.

On the 19th of March, 1872, the people of Paris, in possession of all the armament that had been placed in their hands to defend the French capital against the Prussians, proclaimed the Commune, and, probably out of a habit just lately got into by the French army, retreated to Versailles, leaving Paris at the mercy of the Revolutionists.

This is not the place to account for this revolution.

An explanation of it, which always struck me as somewhat forcible, is the one given by a Communist prisoner to a captain, a friend of mine, who was at the time acting as judge d'instruction to one of the Versailles court-martials.

'Why did you join the Commune?' he asked a young and intelligent-looking fellow who had been taken prisoner behind some barricade.

'Well, captain, I can hardly tell you. We were very excited in Paris; in fact, of our heads with rage at having been unable to save Paris. We had considerable number of cannon and ammunition, which we were not allowed to use against the Prussians. We felt like a sportsman who, after a whole day's wandering through the country, has not had an opportunity of discharging his gun at any game, and who, out of spite, shoots his dog, just to be able to say on returning home that he has killed something.'

On the 14th of April, 1871, my regiment received the order to attack the Neuilly bridge, a formidable position held by the Communists.

What the Prussians had not done, some compatriot of mine succeeded in doing. I fell severely wounded.

After my spending five months in the Versailles military hospital, and three more at home in convalescence, the army surgeons declared that I should no longer be able to use my right arm for military purposes, and I was granted a lieutenant's pension, which would have been just sufficient to keep me in cigars if I had been a smoker.

But of this I do not complain. Poor France! she had enough to pay!

At the end of the year of grace, 1871, my position was very much like that of my beloved country; all seemed lost, hors l'honneur.

Through my friends, however, I was soon offered a choice between two 'social positions.'

The first was a colonel's commission in the Egyptian army (it seemed that the state of my right arm was no objection).

I was to draw a very good salary. My friends in Cairo, however, warned me that salaries were not always paid very regular, but sometimes allowed to run on till cash came into the Treasury. It was during the good times of Ismail Pacha. This made me a little suspicious that my salary might perhaps run on so fast that I should not be able to catch it.

The other post offered me was that of London correspondent to an important Parisian newspaper.

I had enough of military 'glory' by this time. Yet the prospect of an adventurous life is always more or less fascinating at twenty-three years of age.

Being an only child of a good widowed mother I thought I would take her valuable advice on the subject.

I am fortunate in having a mother full of common sense. With her French provincial ideas, she was rather startled to hear that a disabled lieutenant could all at once become an active colonel. She thought that somehow the promotion was too rapid.

'Alas! she, too, had enough of military 'glory.'

Her advice was to be followed, for it was formulated thus. 'You speak English pretty well; we have a good many friends in England; accept the humbler offer and go to England to earn an honest living.'

This is how I was not with Arabi Pacha on the wrong side at Tel-el Kebir, and how it became my lot to make one day the acquaintance of the British schoolboy, of whom I shall have more to say by-and-by.

On the 8th of July, 1872, I took the London train at the Gare du Nord, Paris.

Many relations and friends came to the station to see me off. Some had been in England, but all seemed to know a great deal about it. Advice, cautions, suggestions, were poured into my ears.

'Be sure you go and see Madame Tussaud's, tomorrow said one.

'Now,' said another, 'when you get to Charing Cross don't fail to try and catch hold of a fellow-passenger's coat, and hold fast till you get to your hotel. The fog is so thick in the evening that the lamp-lights are of no use, you know.'

All information is valuable when you start for a foreign country. But I could not listen to more. Time was up.

I shook hands with my friends, and kissed my relations, including an uncle and two cousins, of the sterner sex. This will sound strange to English ears. Well, it sounds just as strange to mine now.

I do not know that a long residence in England has greatly improved me (although my English friends say it has), but what I do know is that I could not now kiss a man, even if he were a bequeathing uncle ready to leave me all his money.

MRS. STOWE IN NEW ENGLAND.

Her Pies Were Abominable.

Mrs Stowe used to go through the streets of Brunswick with a brown paper bundle and a new bought broom,—the picture of the womanly independence you desire for the author of Uncle Tom's Cabin. But in a recent after-dinner speech in the town hall, a friend of "Freddy" Stowe's, when the Stowe's lived in Brunswick, said that although Mrs. Stowe had written a book to thrill the world, her pies and cakes were abominable. One is inclined to think that the economical and skillful Mrs. Stowe could have made good cake and pie if she had wanted to; but realizing how bad they were at best, she gloried in their weight and sour flour, because the hungry boy, once fed with them, would desire no more.—From Brunswick and Bowdoin College, by Charles Lewis Slater, in New England Magazine for December.

"Will you take me for better or worse?" he inquired jocularly. She, perhaps, didn't mean it in that way, but she blushing replied, she, of course, would take him for better, because he couldn't be worse.—Philadelphia Times.

[THE GREAT ARTIST.]

Giant of science, doomed the wreath to win,
Embodiment of Hogarth and Poussin,
On bright Perfection's greatly envied throne
Reign—but thou dost—high, unapproached, alone
Grandeur and sweetness from thy pencil rise
Emphatic as the light from orient seas.
Chiefest of Art! a task laborer still,
Remained for thee, beyond artistic skill,
Unfettered vice, like Typhon waded his brand
In fenishish ire, to devastate the land.
Keen were his thrusts, now 'low and far between"
Since thy debut on the contested scene.
(How last thou stormed the towers of Alhambra!
As erst our legions the Crimean wall
Nor cease, dear Victor, till thy sons of shame
Kneel in the dust to bless thy hallowed name.

Autumn Reveries.

"Nothing new under the sun," we say, as if we needed to perplex ourselves for some diversion that was quite out of reach. Thoreau gives us an admirable antidote, close at hand; simply this, to make friendship with the seasons. "Ah yes," we say, "Summer was our particular friend." 'Twas because she stole away our hearts that we have no room for friendship with the grey sky and the pattering rain. Grown a little older, stepping maybe a little higher on this ladder, reaching heavenward, we are very glad that nature is in such a fluid state; that her summer beauties are such dissolving views. We envy the boy who sleeps in the old time garret, lulled to sleep by the pattering of the rain on the roof, and the Æolian music of the winds that whistle in the casement; wiser, we have outgrown the fear of ghosts that peopled every cranny and creaking stairway under the old roof.

Nature sings in a very sweet way, only, because we do not always understand her language, we forget that the gloom, if there is any, is in our own hearts; that she, herself, has never a melancholy mood, say what we will about "these melancholy days, the saddest of the year." Lucretius gives a very pretty rendering of a rainy day, thus, "The rains die when father Æther has tumbled them in the lap of mother Earth; in consequence, the crops spring, the birds sing, herds gambol, intoxicating with the pure new milk. The wintry snows and rains will have new meaning to us, if we take into account the processes that are going on, by which Nature is laying away a stock of good things for all her summer guests. Be it as it may, out of the same stuff, a little dirt and water percolating through it, she prepares all manner of dainty dishes; for never had a country inn such a spread of viands as nature's supply for summer's carnival, or for mid-winter's feast. We cannot mistake the signs of the times, the flowing tops of the maples; a sudden whirl of dry leaves; a gust of cold air from some unlooked-for quarter; the gypsy woman, hung round about with queer-looking basket work; all tell us that cold days are near at hand. We really have no need and we respectfully decline the proffered baskets; nothing daunted, the younger, olive hued, black eyed maiden makes a more tempting offer. "Have your fortune, madam?" "What was there in the mysticism of fortune that was so much more effective than the offer in basketwork? The young woman understands her art; she touches a tender chord; the string vibrates just a little. Quick as thought she adds, "Let me tell you a little, it shan't cost you anything." With this entering wedge, Dora and Ellen beckon her in. "I never tell anything before others," she adroitly remarks. Thereupon Ellen takes the stranger aside. With all the artfulness of her wild race, the dark eyed woman opens the mystery hidden in the palm of that fair hand; she sees a great deal; assures the young lady that a great change is waiting her, "Had you been looking for it?" and money; and a journey. Then with the sweetest artifice, having led her subject into the vestibule of the secret chamber, she suggests, "Dear lady, I would like to tell you more, shall I?" But here is sufficient food for thought, so Ellen retires in favor of Dora. She, by a singular coincidence, is likewise to meet "a great change." With a few pennies for her trouble and a good natured smile, the dusky trio move down the street, the yellow leaves whirling an accompaniment.

I like that sentiment in the theology of Islam in which "mercy to a beast is counted to man for righteousness" and that "the merciful do, in a special way, obtain mercy." When a colored boy, as reported by the morning papers, has, within our own Christian states, fiendishly tortured to death four horses by punching sticks into their bodies, we feel an individual obligation to lend an individual protest against any single form of cruelty to our dumb animals; a protest against the cruel check rein; against docking horses; overworking them; against bird killing; vivisection and cruelty of every sort whatever to any living creature, human or dumb. "We are eight together" is the singular remark found in the old Norse laws, "and the dog is the ninth." In many a family the trusted dog has his place, as definite and abiding as the old house servant. There, it is "me and my dog." Very pathetic is the manner in which the dog clings to his master, through good and evil report, not deserting one even in peril and death. We understood so little the working of occult science, we cannot tell in what manner and to what extent the inferior rises to the superior order of life. Darwin lays it down as a universal law that there is a continual evolution and that from natural causes. Why should it seem improbable that two such close friends should be united in "some equal sky hereafter"; if, according to the theory of the evolutionist, the spark of instinct in the lowest form of animal life is the same in kind as human reason, differing only in quantity; and who say nay? All through the eastern religions we find this belief current, that whoever is cruel, or unjust, shall have his punishment in the future life by being reincarnated in some lower order of animal life. Often has this very idea come to us. We have speculated by how many possible changes our equine or canine friend may be ultimately led up to the freedom and joyousness of a thinking man.

We are glad for the good work being done under the auspices of the humane society, by sending out "gems of humane literature," pictures, songs and stories for the youth, that they may learn that by every kind word they speak, or by every kind act they do, they make their own lives happier and themselves better prepared for what may come after. As Cowper says

"It is mine of mine
May stand between an animal and woe,
And teach one tyrant, pity for his drudge," so would that our influence might interpose to hasten the coming of the time, when a spirit of humanity shall prevent crime, protect the defenceless and introduce peace and good will to every living creature, both human and dumb; when we shall give, not unnecessary pain to any man, but study the happiness of all.

We wait with no small measure of interest the decision of the question, whether the world's fair at Chicago is to be opened on Sunday, in behalf of the interests of our large population, or whether the voice of the people is to be silenced by that small favored class, who, it may be, may never have the real blessedness of selfhood. If only we could really appreciate this universal law of growth from weaker to stronger, higher and more perfect conditions, might we not see that we cannot, even if we wish, cling to the old blue laws of the Puritan Sunday; for those were the times, when, as Sir Philip Sydney said of Ireland in the 16th century, "Truly, learning goeth very bare." The law of growth, how can it but carry us out of the old ruts. We have outgrown the teachings of the old catechism, saturated with the doctrines of

"Providence, foreknowledge, will and fate, Fixed fate free will foreknowledge absolute."

Who thinks we have retrograded, if we no longer have our boys and girls spend all of Saturday evening preparatory to going to church on the next Lord's day, be it "rain or snow or thunder and lightning," there to stand in the aisles in their Sabbath day clothes, to make their obeisance and answer questions as to "the chief end of man" and with trembling to answer verbatim, et lecturing et punctuating.

The old time Sabbath that allowed no recreation and work, only of necessity and mercy, served its ends and if, instead, we can now buy medicine, bread, soda water and newspapers, and the boot black can be allowed to shine our boots for us, and ferry boats and horse cars can be run, and ministers are no longer censured if they go home on a Sunday train, have we less religion in our hearts? Consistency is a jewel. Two ministers might, under the old law, travel on foot or drive in their one horse chaise to exchange pulpits in a neighboring town. So it was that, on a bright Sunday morning, our country minister chanced to meet a teamster with a load of goods on his way from Boston, the same having been belated by a storm of the previous day. Naturally and of necessity, the reverend gentleman chided the laboring man for working on the Lord's day. "But," said the teamster, "I am only going out of town to exchange with a fellow teamster." It is not difficult to make the application.

A similar blue code of laws was that, in parts of bonnie Scotland, where you'd "daurna whistle on the Sabbath; the dogs daurna bark; the cows daurna low and the cock is confined beneath a barrel to prevent him from giving expression to his independence." Are we not beginning to see that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the day; that acts of mercy are acts of benevolence. But what is benevolence but that attribute which delights in the happiness of others, so that, after all, 'tis the old blue law still, only our fathers unfortunately saw not how wide a field of saving, loving ministrations, mercy takes in.

Christmas Work.

Ribbon Markers.

Take several twenty-four inch lengths of half inch corded ribbons in bright colors, either plain, hand-painted or embroidered; fold each in two, gather the lower end into a point finished off with tassels, twist the top in a coil, suspend it to the handle formed of an inch wadded roll covered with faille or galon, and add to it a cord describing a drooping loop, button-holed over with silk twist.

A set of "toilet mats" of white Turkish toweling, cut square or oval, the edges being finished with two rows of shells in fine red wool, are very nice, and possess, besides, the merit of being "just as nice as ever" after they have visited the domains of soap and warm water, provided you put a good big pinch of borax in the water.

A Convenient Little Work-Box.

To make a holder for buttons, tapes, hooks and eyes and those various small necessities which always intertangle so vexatiously in the free play of the work-basket, six small drug-gist's powder-boxes are needed, the kind that slip into a case of white enamel finish. These have the mark of what is within arranged as shown, to act as a kind of handle; it is easy enough to tack the buttons, safety-pins etc., through the pasteboard by a few strong stitches. Place the boxes one above the other in a double tier of three each, and pass a firm band of broad tape or muslin around, joined tightly at one of the lower corners by a close overcasting. A broad pretty ribbon is tied about over this with a bow and loops on top. A broad piece of ribbon may be used instead of the muslin band if equally as convenient. This box is handy enough, and its value will be appreciated when it has been given its place for awhile on the corner of the table, or tucked into the travelling trunk, where it holds fast its contents, and is ever ready to fill all demands made upon it.—Housewife.

Prepared for a Threshing.

When Major — was a boy, he went to the Boys' Latin School and one day he and Fred H—d were convicted of some mischief. Principal Charles Thurber told the boys to be ready for a cow hiding in the afternoon. They came prepared. One had put on all the extra clothing that the house afforded and the other had gone to the neighbors for a supply, so that when the bell rang for all to go in, the lads marched in looking much as Arctic travellers appeared when arrayed for zero weather. As the boys took their seats, Mr. Thurber saw them and having a keen sense of the ludicrous, he burst out laughing and instead of beating the scamps, allowed them to sit, all the hot June afternoon, in their padded array, sweating like men in the harvest field. They were of the opinion that their preparation had afflicted them more than the master's rawhide would have done if they had taken it, but Mr. Thurber had the fun.

"Oh college maid,
So bold in bakery,
Why thus afraid
Of common cookery."

To Dress Cold Haddock.—Cold boiled fish is very useful for making side dishes, and the haddock can be dressed a second time without losing any of its flavor. Take all the meat remaining carefully from the bones, without any of the skin, or breaking the flakes; then put into a stewpan two ounces of butter rubbed into two tablespoonfuls of cream; as soon as it is melted, add twelve oysters chopped small, a teaspoonful of salt, and half the quantity of white pepper; then stir gradually into a pint of cream, and when it is hot put in the fish; shake the pan, but do not stir with a spoon, and in ten minutes, when on the point of boiling, turn it out and serve with sippets of bread.

Broiled Sausages.

Split them in two, lengthwise, place them between a double wire broiler, and broil on the flat side first, and then turn and broil on the other. Turn a mound of hot apple sauce in the centre of a hot, flat dish, arrange the sausages upon it and serve.

Frizzled Beef and Eggs.—Soak a quarter of a pound of shaved dried beef in a pint of boiling water for ten minutes; then drain well. Beat four eggs with a fork. Put a generous tablespoonful of butter in a granite-ware dish and place over the fire. When the butter becomes hot, add the beef, and stir with a fork until the slices curl. Now place the dish over another of boiling water, and set all over the fire. Add the eggs and stir until they become thick and creamy. Serve at once. If one likes a very salty flavor the beef need not be soaked in water.

One often tries of lemon and vanilla flavoring, but if there is added to a teaspoonful of lemon extract a third of a teaspoonful of vanilla, it will seem as if a new flavor had been discovered.

The leaves of the peach tree, a few at a time, put into a boiling milk of a custard or blanc-mange, and removed before it cools into shape, give a delicate almond flavor.

To make bisque cream without liquor, make a rich ice cream, and flavor delicately with almonds, coffee, vanilla or caramels. Add one cupful of dried and sifted cake crumbs, either angel cake, sponge or fruit cake, dried meringues or kisses, cocoanut cake, or Graham wafers.

Nut Wafers.

One quarter cup butter, one cup sugar, one egg, one cup flour, one cup nut meats. Use walnuts or cream-nuts, or grated cocoanut. Drop on buttered tins and bake quickly.

Baked Pears.

Wash them, put them in a deep pan, strew over plenty of white or brown sugar, and pour very little water in the bottom of the pan. Put them in a moderate oven and let them cook slowly till the fruit is soft. Serve them with cream.

About Folks.

The recovery of Dr. Geo. H. Balcom of New Worcester is expected.

Miss L. Addie Farwell, a teacher in Ashland, spends her Thanksgiving vacation in this city.

Rev. James T. Canavan, assistant pastor of St. Mary's church, Milford, is in town early in the week.

Miss Jennie Bradford, of Dedham, is visiting her uncle, James Bradford, 39 King Street.

Frank Diemar has been appointed solicitor of the Germania Life Insurance Company for Worcester and vicinity.

Rev. Dr. George H. Gould and wife recently entertained the formers brother, Rev. E. S. Gould and wife, of Athol.

Otto Burton, the elevator conductor in the Burnside Building, recently laid off on account of injuries, has returned to his duties.

Senior Vice-department Commander J. K. Churchill attended the annual inspection of Gettysburg Post 191, G. A. R., at Boston, Friday evening.

George E. Aldrich, who is studying art in New York city, is at home, for our New England Day, with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Aldrich.

Harry P. Davis, class of '90, Worcester Polytechnic Institute, is seriously ill with malaria fever in Pittsburg, Pa. His mother, Mrs. Helen M. Davis, has gone to Pittsburg.

Dr. Mary W. Nichols, 271 Main street, is suffering from nervous prostration, and recently a consultation of doctors was held. Her condition is regarded as serious.

Hon. John D. Washburn is home from his Switzerland Mission. He has glowing accounts to give of the delights of that beautiful country; but there is no place like home.

The engagement is announced of Miss Theresa Davis, daughter of Hon. Edward L. Davis of this city, to Winsor Weld of Boston. Miss Davis is one of the debutantes of Boston society this season.

Mr. Ralph W. Abercrombie of this city was married in Plainville, last Sunday to Miss Isabel Staples of that town. Rev. Edward E. Abercrombie, a brother of the groom performed the ceremony.

Mr. and Mrs. Wright E. Burnham of Albany are in the City for Thanksgiving. The parents of both parties live in Worcester. They are Mr. and Mrs. Woodbridge Burnham and Mr. and Mrs. Warren J. Cutting.

"Are n't you ever going to grow old, like the rest of us?" asked a man of an acquaintance he hadn't seen for some time. "Well, not so long as I can purify my blood with Ayer's Sarsaparilla," was the apt reply. This man knew what he was talking about.

Congressman J. H. Walker left Monday evening for New York to consult with a committee of five from the chamber of commerce of that city, on their invitation. The committee consists of Carl Schurz, Abraham S. Hewitt, George S. Coe, John Sloan and Charles Smith.

Mrs. Edna I. Tyler of this city has received from Deadwood some excellent photographs of her father's statue recently erected there and of the bust of Wild Bill unveiled at about the same time. The artist, Reardon, has done a good work and the Black Hills are better for these memorials of the noted dead. They were the first buried in the cemetery. Reference was made, last week, to the dedication of the statue to the memory of the Rev. Henry Weston Smith.

Dr. Geo. A. Cook, who graduated at the Brooklyn Medical College and commenced practice in Southboro last spring, has accepted an advantageous offer to go to Boston as the associate of Dr. Whittier, the specialist in diseases of the eye, in Tremont Temple, to take charge of his general outside practice. Dr. Cook's friends in this city believe he has a successful and brilliant career ahead of him.—Marlboro Times.

Dr. Cook is a grandson of Dr. John A. Andrews, the oldest physician in Worcester, and a nephew of Mrs. F. G. Stiles.

There are few pupils of the public schools for the last fifteen years who will not recall Dennis J. O'Leary who for that time and longer has been employed in the care and repairing of school houses. He died Tuesday morning at his house, 45 John Street, aged 38 years. He was a member of the Veteran Firemen Association and the Light Infantry Veteran Association. His death resulted from pneumonia, superinduced by a severe cold contracted about ten days ago. Two brothers and one sister survive him. His father was killed at the battle of Petersburg. The funeral was held Thursday at St. Paul's Church.

Agricultural Society.

The annual meeting was held Tuesday and J. Lewis Ellsworth was re-elected president. In spite of the many arguments for removal, it was voted to stick to the old quarters.

Havener—Pendleton.

Only immediate friends of both families witnessed the marriage of Lud C. Havener of this city to Miss Rosina L. Pendleton of Searsmont, Me., last Saturday. Handsome presents were received by both parties and after a trip to Washington, they will reside at No. 26 William Street.

Women Voters.

The newly posted lists show a falling off of 159 names. There are now 200 names remaining. The time is far distant when suffrage will be extended to womankind unless greater advantage is taken of privileges already granted. Half a loaf is much better than no bread.

A Cure for Poverty that Cures,

[From the New Haven Palladium.]

Mr. Root's offer of apples galore to deserving poor people attracted much attention a month or more ago when made in The Palladium. Our friend has reached the conclusion he feared—there are very few such families in the world. There are many widows and orphans, poor and needy, entirely so through misfortunes beyond their control; but families, with men in them, destitute through no fault of their own, are very, very rare. We append a letter just received from the farm r philanthropist:

Editor of The Palladium:

On October 2, I had printed in The Palladium the following offer:

The subscriber will deliver free of expense fifty bushels of good apples during the month of October to deserving poor families providing the members of those families do not use intoxicating liquor or use tobacco or keep a dog.

No doubt thousands saw the notice and the editor's comments upon it. It was also copied in other papers. Some said I would be overrun with applicants but the truth is I have not been. I have had but four applications, by letter, one from Meriden; but many have applied through a third person. When I came to sift the applications out, all but nine failed to come under the terms of my offer. In all genuine cases I have promptly delivered the apples. I have had letters from two families expressing many thanks.

Now, does not this teach us a lesson? I believe there are some worthy poor, and I hoped my offer would reach some, and am thankful that it has; but I cannot help but come to the conclusion there is a very large majority brought to poverty directly through their own vicious habits.

Well, who is responsible for this state of things? I know of professed Christians and those having sons growing up who vote for the continuance of the saloon. I would ask them how they can consistently do it when they pray, "Thy kingdom come on earth as it is in Heaven;" and when the Bible tells us, "No drunkard can enter the kingdom of Heaven." I would ask the young to think of these things. They are the ones who soon will be called to guide the future of this nation; and how important it is that they should be pure and free from the taint of these vices. No person will ever become the victim of drink and tobacco if he lets it entirely alone. As one that has seen a great deal of misery and want in connection with the use of these things, I can take no other ground.

O. A. ROOT.

There's a great opportunity in Four Capes this week.

We haven't a garment of any kind to "mark down," or to "sacrifice" on.

And still "our" garments are sold at as low prices right along, as the "marked down" and "sacrifice" kinds.

Four Capes at bargain prices come to the front now.

A manufacturer finds himself with too many of them on hand, and so sends us one hundred to sell quick for a little money.

Japanese Seal Capes, formerly sold for $16 50, are now $12 50. We'll show you a 200 one, and it will trouble you to tell which is best.

French Seal Capes, that formerly cost $12, can now be had for $8.

French Concy Capes—not Russian Hare—formerly $8 50 and $10.00, can now be secured for $6 50.

Splendid Astrachan Capes, $16 50 to $18.50 qualities. Your choice from them for $12.50. Every one of these Four Capes are lined up in good shape, and we inclose them fully.

The Lines section has for you, ready for immediate use—

Pretty Tray Cloths, plain white, or with blue and pink border, 12 1-2c;

Or you can have a larger and better kind for 25c, 37 1-2c, 50 c and right along up to $5.00 each.

The Rebellion Relic.

The following note explains a matter referred to in last week's paper. Many thanks for the courtesy.

"The names on knife and fork, referred to on Page 283 of Nov. 21st LIGHT, are probably Lamson, Goodnow & Co., Millers Falls Works. I have a carving set that was purchased before my marriage, Dec. 1864, in that town. The knife faintly shows the words.
150 Pleasant St." MRS. F. C. MIXER.

Rebellion Relics.

The knife and fork, belonging to F. M. Morrison, Esq., relics of Andersonville, mentioned in LIGHT of Nov. 21, were no doubt made by Lamson, Goodnow & Co.

John Russell, of the old Green River Cutlery Works, at Greenfield, Mass., was the father of the business in America,—he was also the father of Hon. John E. Russell of Leicester, Mass.

Along in the thirties, 1837 or thereabouts, the elder Russell started his works on Green River, among his apprentices were two young men by the names of Lamson and Goodnow, who afterwards engaged in the same business for themselves. I have not the data at hand, but I think their first venture was at Turners Falls, three miles from Greenfield. They later established the well known cutlery manufactory at Shelburne Falls.

The inscription on the knife without doubt properly read "Lamson, Goodnow & Co., Turners Falls Works."

It might be well to state here, that the old Green River Works of Mr. Russell, at Greenfield, were afterwards abandoned and the business removed to Turners Falls, where it still carried on under the name of "The John Russell Cutlery Co." It was my fortune to be in the employ of Mr. Russell, during the closing months of his life and, although suffering much from the ravages of disease, he gave an interesting history of the beginning of this great industry on American soil.

The little folks in Mrs. Morgan's school enjoyed a treat last Saturday morning, when Miss Olf Krarer appeared before them and told of her life at home in Greenland. She is, herself, scarcely larger than the children, but she told them an interesting story of what they would do were they in her childhood's home. It was a practical lesson that will give Geography an additional zest for many a day. Mrs. Morgan deserves thanks from parents for the pleasure afforded the children.

Wellesley.

Nov. 5, Dr. A. J. Gordon gave a Bible reading upon the ages into which the world's history is divided. Nov. 8, Rev. Mr. North, of Middletown, Conn., preached in the chapel.

Nov. 11 the college was honored by a visit from Sir Edwin Arnold. The morning recitations for the last two periods gave way to a very interesting hour of reading by Mr. Arnold. The first selection was one as yet unpublished, a "Japanese Dance." This was followed by several other selections, one being from "In my Lady's Praise," and another "He and She".

Wellesley has been well represented at the National Temperance Convention in Boston. Prof. Morgan was one of the speakers, Nov. 14. Mrs. Weaver, Chairman of the Evangelistic work of the W. C. T. U. in N. Y., filled the pulpit Sunday morning and evening. This week several parties of the delegates have visited the college.

The "Wellesley Press Troubles", as they are called, have received much attention from the daily press, but in no case have been represented as they are. Since some of the Worcester papers have published these false reports, it is perhaps worth while to give a correct statement of the case as published by the Advertiser at the request of the Editor of the Prelude, our college paper.

"The editors of the Wellesley Prelude desire to correct certain erroneous statements which appeared in the Boston papers regarding their college and their college publication. It is true that the class of '92 will not be able to publish a "Legenda," this year, and also true that an editorial was blocked out of the Prelude. These two facts, however, bore no relation to one another. The editorial was written and published before the Academic council at the college had taken action upon the request of the Senior class for a "Legenda," and it was blocked out by the decision of the Prelude editors and not by order of the College authorities. The statement that there exists at Wellesley a censorship of the Press is quite untrue. It exists neither for the Prelude nor for articles contributed by students for other papers."

Monday evening, Nov. 16, a very fine concert was given by the Mold Chamber Music Club, assisted by Miss Emma S. Howe and Miss Lucie A. Tucker.

The class of '93 is very sorry to lose one of its members, Miss Alice Perry of Worcester, who is obliged to leave college for the remainder of the year because of illness at home.

Nov. 19.

Age and Way of Living of College Students.

The University of Michigan, having a larger attendance than any other university in the United States, and keeping pace with the best in developments, the reports of President Angell, where they touch facts of general application, are of importance. He says that under-graduates are younger by a full year or more on the average than they were twenty years ago, notwithstanding increased requirements for admission. The causes he assigns are, the preparatory schools are better than they were, and that parents are more prosperous, "making it less generally necessary than it was for youth to spend years in earning the means to gain college education." He finds evidence of the increased prosperity of the parents also in allowing a more generous style of living on the part of many students.

We doubt whether these circumstances promise as much as might be thought to the real advantage of students. If a boy is to enter general business, the sooner he gets through college and into business the better. Here, therefore, there is a distinct gain. The stunting frugality of old times ruined the health of some, but those who could bear it attained self-reliance, mental force and endurance. The luxurious style of living now common among students is neither favorable to mental, moral, nor physical tone. To enter college too early does not promise any more than to go too late. Slow, steady, unforced preparation, and an entrance upon a college course not earlier than sixteen—in many cases seventeen would be better—is to be preferred to entering at fifteen or younger, especially as the college courses more and more include questions that to be mastered in all their relations and made the foundation for subsequent public or semi-public careers should be studied under the influence of a serious spirit.

Having to earn money to get an education is not in itself a good, but most of those who have achieved it would not voluntarily lose the memory or the results of the experience.—Christian Advocate.

Boston University.

All the departments of the University closed Wednesday for a recess until next Monday.

Number Four of the University Beacon was out last Monday.

W. H. Jackson, '93, of Worcester has charge of the class in chest weights at the Boston Y. M. C. A. Gymnasium on Boylston Street.

Dr. William J. Rolfe addresses the Monday Club next Monday evening at the Copley Square Hotel. Subject, "Hamlet."

The Eta Chapter of Alpha Phi held their initiation at the residence of Miss Harriet S. Sawyer of Auburndale, Friday afternoon, Nov. 20th.

The Alpha Chapter of Delta Delta Delta held their initiation at the home of Miss C. E. Joslin, Chelsea, Friday, p.m. Ten candidates from the class of '95 were initiated. After the formal ceremonies were finished, refreshments were served. The following members responded to toasts: Emily F. Allen, '91; Carrie N. Tanner, '92; Christine E. Jansson, '93; Susie I. Sayre, '93; Carrie D. Beddor, '94; Esther D. Paul, '94; Grace Dickerman, '95.

Polytechnic.

As a result of a Faculty meeting last Monday, about fifteen students received notices to the effect that unless there was immediate improvement in their work, they would be dropped.

A large number of students of the mechanical department took part in a surprise party at the house of, and in honor of Mr. George Mitchell, the popular foreman of the iron-room in the shop. The occasion was Mr. Mitchell's forty-fifth birthday, and the eighteenth anniversary of his marriage. He was the recipient of a purse of forty-five silver dollars as a token of the former, and a handsome clock of the latter, both given by students and journeymen. Besides representatives of the Institute, there was present a large number of other friends, who also brought with them gifts, among others a fine silver tea-service. The party broke up at a late hour after a most enjoyable evening.

One of the funny things of the recent municipal campaign was that of the president of the Institute supporting the claims of a member of the board of trustees, for school-committee, against a member of the Faculty, and challenging the votes of students at the caucus.

Becker's College.

The merits of a business education were never more evident than in the remarkable prosperity that has attended Becker's College from the beginning. Starting in a very modest way, he has steadily progressed from that small attempt to his present very flattering position. Retaining old and tried instructors, securing new ones as their need has developed; remaining in his old quarters, only adding to them when compelled to do so, he has thoroughly adapted himself to prosperity. There are a few, a very few Worcester young people who think they must go away from home to secure a business education, but were they, first, to look in at this college and see the happy faces of the busy young people here, it is more than probable that they, too, would conclude that there is no place like home and would at once, throw in their part with Becker. For the study of Commercial Arithmetic, the acquirement of short hand and the art of type writing, and whatever else the best Business Colleges teach, Becker's institution offers unrivaled facilities.

The Shoemaker's Last.

Here is the last of a shoemaker, beyond which let no cobbler go.

A lady complaining that the soles of her shoes were too thick, the artful manufacturer said to her:

"Is that your only objection to them, Madam?"

"It is," the lady replied.

"Well then, Madam, if you take them, I think I can assure you that you will find that objection gradually wear away."—Journalist.

Entertainments.

In the way of a miscellaneous concert, nothing finer has been given in Worcester for some time than the two Schirmer-Mapleson concerts in Mechanics Hall, Thanksgiving evening, and it is to be regretted that there were so small audiences. Besides Mme. Mapleson, there took part in the program Herr Arthur Friedham, the great German pianist; Mr. G. A. Freeman, the well known tenor of New York; Dr. G. Rob Clark, the basso; Herr Bartschmid, the baritone. Nothing but the best standard music was rendered and it was thoroughly enjoyed by the small audiences. In the afternoon Madame Mapleson sang a new aria by Arditì (first time in America) and "In Distant Land," Taubert and "A Bird Was Singing," Henshaw Dana. She received very enthusiastic applause. In the evening she sang the scena from Hamlet by Ambrose Thomas and "Hungaria," Pease and "Memory," Bishop. She responded to encores with "Comin' Through the Rye" and "Down on the Swanee River." Dr. Clark was also a favorite as well as Herr Briedheim. Although Herr Bartschmid and Mr. Freeman sang excellently, yet on account of the superior work of the others their selections were not as prominent as they would otherwise have been.

Von Moltke as a Teacher.

One day Moltke stopped at a boarding school kept by a parson in a village near his Silesian country seat, and sat down to hear the teacher instruct the scholars—mostly young nobles preparing for the army—on the wars of France and Prussia. The clergyman being called away for a moment, Moltke asked to be allowed to take his place. Before long he asked one of the pupils: "Who do you think was Napoleon's best general?" "My granduncle, your excellency, Marshal Ney, prince of the Moskwa," was the answer. Turning to another boy, he asked: "And who was the bravest of Prussia's generals in the same war?" "My granduncle, Marshal Prince Blucher," said he. There was also a descendant of General Zieten among them. When the clergyman returned Moltke said, with a humorous glance at his own plain civilian dress: "Oh, my dear herr pastor, you should have told me before that I was to find such famous generals represented here." He invited all the boys to visit him at Kreisau, and gave them a most hospitable reception.—New York Sun.

Human Nature.

Ethel—I met your father at the door as I was coming in. He appeared to be very angry.
Maud—He was. I had just revealed a great truth to him.

Ethel—Yes?
Maud—He thinks he understands human nature thoroughly.

Ethel—How like my father.
Maud—But he forgets that exceptions are usually required to prove every rule according to the popular belief.

Ethel—Explain, dear.
Maud—You know how bitterly he is opposed to my engagement with Jack Labash?
Ethel—Yes. He wishes you to marry Mr. Dollerby.

Maud—Exactly. And his theory was that if he opposed Mr. Dollerby's suit and favored Jack's, I would go contrary to his expressed wishes, and in that way everything would end as he desires. Well, I understood enough about his nature and ideas of human nature to know that; and so, when he denounced Mr. Dollerby, and forbade him to call on me, and expressed himself in favor Jack, I surprised and completely disgusted him by cheerfully acquiescing.

Ethel—How clever you are! But I got out of a difficulty of the same kind on my father in a way that I enjoyed much more.

Maud—Tell me.
Ethel—He wishes me to marry Harry Cutless and I love George Prettiboy. I accepted

Household.

Here is a recipe for cleaning delicate laces, which an old lacemaker who has woven many a gossamer web for the great connoisseur and lover of laces, Mme. Moejeska, gave to her pupil and patron: Spread the lace out on paper, cover with calcined magnesia, place another paper over it, and put it away between the leaves of a book for two or three days. Then all it needs is a skillful little shake to scatter the powder, and its delicate threads are as fresh and clean as when first woven.

Rest is a great pain-killer; so too is sleep, and in all cases of suffering you should try to get your patient asleep by legitimate means. The house should, therefore, be kept quiet, for even a door slammed will effectually banish sleep.

Neuralgia of all kinds is greatly benefited by heat, by rest, and by sleep. But it should not be forgotten, that as a general rule the health is below par when one is afflicted with neuralgia. Tonics help to raise the standard of health, but I do assure you they are only a partial cure, a mere patch-up, and that pain of this kind is only removable by removing first and foremost any apparent cause—it might be a bad tooth, for example—and then trusting to a more generous diet, of which cod liver oil and extract of malt should form part, recreation, fresh air, baths, and above all, change of scene and atmosphere.

To clean brass fixtures rub them with slices of lemon, then wash in hot water.

Keep an oyster-shell in your tea kettle, and it will prevent the formation of a crust on the inside by attracting the stony particles to itself. It should be changed occasionally.

All sorts of vessels and utensils may be purified from long retained smells of any kind by rinsing them out well with powdered charcoal after they have been scoured with sand soap.

Put camphor gum with your new silverware, and it will never tarnish as long as the gum is there. Never wash silver in soapsuds as that gives it a white appearance.

Table linen will be dull if soaked from Sunday to Monday. Fine clothes, and especially table linen, requires only a few minutes' soaking. If linen and other soiled clothes are placed in the same tub to soak, as the dirt is loosened from the muslin it enters into the cleaner pieces, and turns the whole a gray color. I cannot think of anything that will make clothes more yellow, ruin the appearance so quickly, as long soaking.

During an epidemic of scarlet fever at Carbondale, good Mr. Raynor, addressing the children of the Sabbath-School, told them to pray that it might be God's will that they should escape the disease. Little Maggie C— completely upset the gravity of the school by saying in very distinct tones: "I don't have to pray; I wear a 'camphor bag' around my neck."—Wyoming Magazine.

Genius must find a focal distance within the actual horizon of human life.—George Eliot.

A clergyman preached from the text, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." (Eccles. 6:10.) A little boy, being asked next day to repeat the text, said: "Stop blowing, and go to work!"

Curious Corner.

An Unknown Tongue.

Those who have learned a foreign language with an approach to thoroughness often find in the dialects so many new languages to master. Almost any one who speaks English might be put down successively in half a dozen places where English is supposed to be the mother tongue, and hear as many dialects spoken, not one of which he would understand until it was interpreted.

An old Broughton worthy and an English lady were one day occupants of a railway carriage. The train had been waiting long at a certain station and there was no appearance of its starting, when the worthy remarked:

"They're a gly tanglesome lot here."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said the lady.

"Am sayin they're a gly daidltin lot here."

"I really beg your pardon, sir."

"Am observin they are a vera dreich lot here a night."

"I do not quite understand you."

"I'm wonderin if they're etlin to saunter here a night."

"Really I must again beg your pardon. I don't comprehend you."

"I was just trying to say that the train was late."

"Indeed, sir, it is very late," agreed the lady, and then collapsed.—Exchange.

"Polpus Fluscimus."

The great artist Meissonier, who painted the famous picture "1807," which was in the Stewart collection, and was sold for $63,000, was fond of gardening. His gardener was a really learned botanist, and try as he might and often did, Meissonier could not deceive him on the seeds of any plant. He always knew them. One day, however, Meissonier was sure he would succeed in throwing the gardener off his guard.

"This time I've got him," the artist remarked to a party of friends at the dinner table, and he showed them a small packet containing the dried root of herring. He sent for the gardener.

"Do you know this seed?" Meissonier inquired.

The gardener carefully scrutinized the grains, "Why not?" he said, at last. "They are the seeds of the polpus fluscimus, a very rare tropical plant."

"How long will they be in coming up?" Meissonier asked, with a chuckle of suppressed exultation.

"About a fortnight," was the reply.

Two weeks later the guests were again assembled at Meissonier's table, and after dinner the gardener was announced.

"M. Meissonier," the man said, "the seed has just come up."

"Ah! you surprise me," the artist exclaimed, as he rose and led the way into the garden to examine the botanical phenomenon.

The gardener lifted a glass shade and disclosed to view a small bed with three rows of pickled herrings' heads peeping out of the earth. Every body laughed. Meissonier dismissed the gardener on the spot, but took him on again the next day.

The boy is better unborn than untaught.—Gascogne.

DON'T DELAY TO

Stop that cough! Else the bronchial tubes will be enlarged and the delicate tissues of the lungs exposed to injury. No other medicine is so speedily operative in throat and lung troubles as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. A few doses have been known to break up an obstinate and distressing cough. Sufferers from asthma, bronchitis, croup, consumption, sore throat, and whooping cough find a sure relief in the use of this preparation. It soothes the inflamed membrane, promotes expectoration, and induces repose. Don't be without it in the house. Sallie E. Stone, Hurt's Station, Va., writes: "I have found, in my family, that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral was always a certain cure for colds and coughs."

"Five years ago I had a constant cough, night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, and had been given up by my physicians. I began to take Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and was completely cured."—Ange A. Lewis, Ricard, N. Y.

THE WARE-PRATT COMPANY.

Cold Weather Comforts. Defiance to Cold. Do You Know What's Here?

We wonder whether you know how good FLANNEL UNDERWEAR we have for you?

Are you the one who "talked it over the other day" with your fellow workmen at the bench?

Was it you who said that "Ware, Pratt & Co.'s goods were away up on the top of all that was good," and then added that "they cost so much a workingman could not afford to buy them?"

Of course it was hard on you when the question was asked: "Have you ever been in their store and ever bought anything from them?"

You had to say "No.," and you felt rather tame when you said that little "No.," didn't you?

Well, you need not worry overmuch about it now; of course it has been as much of a loss to you as to us, but if you'll come now and learn your mistake then it will be found hereafter.

Every man is thinking about warm Underwear. Winter is right at our doors; these pleasant days are simply a reprieve, and if you are not quite ready when the King comes you will feel his frosty power with a vengeance.

Let's begin with Flannel Working Shirts. There is no earthier use in your buying one made from SHODDY. You cannot afford to buy one of that kind at any price.

But a good flannel shirt is a good thing to have and that very kind we offer you. We have the kind that won't shrink, hard-wearing and serviceable Shirts, and all they cost $1 to $1.50.

Then there are the pure INDIGO BLUE SHIRTS, made splendidly. The single breasted cost $1.50, $1.75, $2.25, $2.50.

We have a single-breasted Shirt of very heavy flannel for $2.25, that we guarantee to be as perfect as can be made.

If you prefer the double-breasted, then the prices begin at $2. and from that up to $3 for the heaviest flannel Shirt you ever saw.

Extra large sizes in Cocheco flannel Shirts in browns and grays always to be found with us.

Everything that you may want in "furnishings" you can buy here to better advantage than you can think.

You would not expect to find "cheap goods" at so called "cheap prices" in this store. That sort ruins the workingman and we don't handle them.

If you want

Splendid Cardigan Jackets. Splendid Gloves for Winter. Splendid Stockings for Service.

Then it is more than likely you'll pay less for them here than elsewhere.

At this very moment we have a splendid stocking 35c a pair, or 3 pairs for a dollar, that you'll admit is the best sort of bargain, because the usual price for it everywhere we know is 50c a pair.

In COLLARS, CUFFS, NECKWEAR, SUSPENDERS, HANDBKERCHIEFS, or whatever you want, please see what we can do for you in good, stylish goods at fair prices before you buy.

NON-SECRET ENDOWMENT ORDER.--A Great Fraternity.

Do you believe in a system of co-operation in which the whole profit is divided among the members? Then join the Non-Secret Endowment Order. It pays a sick benefit of $20 a week; a death benefit of $400; an endowment benefit of $200; at COST.

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1891.

No. 14

Modern writers are the moons of literature; they shine with reflected light - with light borrowed from the ancients.—Dr. Johnson.

If Samuel the First had occasion to discourse thus one hundred years ago, what would be his words in this day of literary rehash and repetition?

Possibly, the later popular vernacular has so far departed from that pure diction that he was wont to employ that he would not accuse us moderns of imitation, but would say that we had produced a gibberish and manner all our own.

As to the borrowed light, it would be strange if we did not try to profit by what was done or said in the long ago, but what a fine time one of those immaculate ancients would have in trying to follow up a description of Edison's inventions? We certainly know something that the elders did not.

One might think that the No License fever so hotly inaugurated at the Y. M. C. A. some weeks since had caught a chill. So far as public notice is concerned, there is little doing. That the enemy is working, no one will doubt. But he never makes speeches. Mole like, he digs under ground. The Rink meetings are well attended considering the weather and zealous preachers and laymen have spoken under the auspices of the Reform Club.

If the city votes "No," it will be because of the constantly reiterated presentation of the arrests column in the Telegram and the sermons from the pulpit. Aside from the attitude of the Reform Club, it must be confessed that the business men of Worcester are not putting their shoulders to the wheel as they have done in former years. There is need enough of active, diligent labor.

Chicago has been doing it again. This time she has bought the old John Brown Fort at Harper's Ferry with the very earth on which it stood and has bundled the whole business off to Lake Michigan. How queer it all seems! The Lake City, somehow, seems like the school boy who lacked capacity. History, like the above quality, cannot be bought. How would the multitudes who make up the people of that teeming city treat John Brown were he to appear in their midst. Certain it is, that some things, tolerated there, would draw from him as stern reproof as ever he directed at Slavery.

Then again, is the World's Fair to be opened Sundays? There is a large element of our people who would like to know. There are exhibitors who would not display their goods, did they think that the grounds were to be open on the Day of Rest. It looks as though the managers wished to defer the announcement till the latest possible moment and then give us the Continental Sunday with all its riot and license. The plea of workingman's day is all nonsense. The laborer is not a Sabbath breaker if he does use his hands in toil. It is altogether, a scheme of the Sunday desecrators to Germanize the land. God forbid.

Amidst the Henry George Single Tax notions and other devices to equalize the burden of taxation, has it ever occurred to our law makers, that possibly the Swiss have long had about the best plan yet? There, the more a man has, the more it is worth to him and the more he must pay for it. In other words, increased possessions bring advanced tax rates. It is impossible, in that ancient republic, for a man to effectually lie out of his just taxes, for on death his estate is settled and if it appears that he has willfully withheld anything, the property is fined heavily. No millionaires, like those of New York, can swear to their having no taxable possessions, and so escape their lawful part of the burdens. The system is worthy Americans' careful study. We have not yet reached perfection by any means.

"There never was so much writing talent in the market as at the present time, says a writer in The Inland Printer for December. There is now an array of writers of notability. There is another and much greater array of the unknown, seeking notability, and of equal ability with those whose heads are a little above water. Were Horace Greeley, James Gordon Bennett, Sr., N. P. Willis and other writers and editors of former prominence to appear today and begin unknown in their old field of letters, they might not rise so readily amid the present enormous increase of literary competitors unless they brought an accession of business talent and force to strengthen their literary competency, which the first two named gentlemen did possess to an eminent degree."

Rev. John S. Scudder.

This gentleman is the subject of an extended article in Zions Herald, Nov. 25 th in connection with his charge of the People's Palace in Jersey City, an enterprise fraught with great possibilities for the poorer classes. Worcester and Shrewsbury readers will remember him as the highly successful pastor of the Orthodox church in the latter place, several years ago, whence he went to Minneapolis and now he finds his life work in Jersey City. The article is accompanied by an engraving of the preacher. The name of the enterprise suggests that of Walter Besant's in East London.

Dr. Cheever.

Rev. H. T. Cheever is advertised to give a memorial address at Washington, D. C. on the Life and Labors of his brother, the late Dr. George B. Cheever of the Church of the Puritans New York. It is on the occasion of placing in position at the Howard University library the admirable bust of the reformer executed by Andrew O'Connor of this city.

A significant review of the great moral war against slavery and intemperance may be expected. The address will be given Sunday the 13th next.

O'Connor's Curtis.

Recently, LIGHT referred, with no little pride and pleasure, to the fact that Andrew O'Connor's bust of Albert Curtis had been admitted to the exhibition of the National Academy in New York. There are but six pieces of sculpture in the collection and O'Connor's entry stands by the side of that of John Rogers. The New York Herald, of a recent date, refers to O'Connor's work as fine. Will not all art loving Worcester people take up the cause of this local artist, find out his merits and sound his praises as widely as may be?

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear," and without doubt committees are looking abroad, today, for talent that is right here at home. It should have a competitive chance at least.

Colton-Howe.

One week ago to-day in Webster in the church of the Reconciliation, Mr. Samuel Colton of this city was married to Miss Elizabeth Slater Howe, of Webster, a daughter of the late James H. Howe. Very many Worcester friends were present. There home will be on King Street in this city.

A British View of the American Tariff.

"The promoters of the McKinley tariff meant to push forward the policy of America for the Americans. One method of realizing it was to keep all work within their own dominions. The country was to be made self supplying; what could be produced at home was not to be bought abroad. That was the key-note of the McKinley scheme, and it is working out the idea of its designers with the precision and effectiveness of a Machine.—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

The engagement is announced of Herbert C. Stoddard to Miss Rena E. Hart, both of this city.

Mrs. E. Hedge of Everett was the guest of Dr. and Mrs. R. Edson, at their home 42 Lincoln Street last week.

Deacon Addison Palmer's many friends will wish him all possible pleasure during his Winter's stay in Florida, whither he started Tuesday night the 23th ult. During his absence, his son Charles O. will attend to his business.

"At last, I can eat a good square meal without its distressing me!" was the grateful exclamation of one whose appetite had been restored by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, after years of dyspeptic misery. A teaspoonful of the extract before each meal sharpens the appetite.

The Academe Again.

No visitor could be more welcome. Its familiar cover recalls many pleasant memories. One might suppose it had been issued right along instead of having been in "innocuous desuetude" for considerably more than two years. The most of the names, in the editorial corps, have the appearance of old friends. Then when the pages are turned the story seems like the one whose last refrain was heard in the Summer of 1889. The Academe has LIGHT's best wishes in every way possible.

The monthly calendar, issued by the Rev. T. J. Conaty of the Church of the Sacred Heart is, as was promised, an excellent Christmas number. From a very modest beginning it has steadily grown and improved, till now the editor promises, with the March issue, to make it a subscription magazine. It certainly has a field. While excellent in all respects LIGHT would specially commend the article on manners.

Mr. Frank D. Hickey, who receives the Democratic nomination for the school committee in Ward Five, is a High School graduate, class of '84. He is a book-keeper at Barnard & Sumner's and a son of police sergeant William Hickey. His brother, William, is a student in the seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris. Sergeant Hickey was, for many years, one of the city's most officers. That his constituents should select so young a man for their representative is indicative of confidence in his ability.

The Sons and Daughters of Vermont held their annual meeting in Horticultural Hall, Tuesday evening, when the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, H. W. Adams; vice-presidents, Mrs. Charles G. Parker, A. W. Edson and Ira G. Blake; secretary and treasurer, George Prichard; historian, Hon. Clark Jilison; executive committee, Mr. and Mrs. F. O. Bushnell, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Bliss, Mr. and Mrs. William L. Robinson and Charles G. Parker. It was voted to hold the annual reunion in Horticultural Hall, January 19, to make arrangements for which, a meeting of the officers will be held at the home of President Adams, 4 Dewey Street, next Friday evening.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a party of increased value will be given to that book which has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Dec. 5, 1891.

Nelson A. Miles.

How is this for Worcester County? Carter Harrison of Chicago suggests our Westminister General as a candidate for the presidency next year. We are all proud of the General but are sorry that he has not a better sponsor. He was the best of Indian fighters, and it begins to look as though his qualities were necessary in the presidential chair.

LIGHT has no recollection of ever seeing a finer array of photographs than those which Lawrence displays at the entrance to the Clark Block, Main Street. They are admirable. The artist has reason to be proud of his work.

Albert P. Perkins, son of the Rev. A. E. P. Perkins of this city, has been elected orator of his class at the Commencement Class Day.

Chamberlaid District.

Farmers' Club will meet on Thursday, the 10th, inst., at 7:30 p.m., at "The Poplars," Brattle Street, North Worcester, the residence of A. S. Lowell. Subject, "A Cruise on Wheels as a Farmer's Vacation," essay by B. W. Potter, Esq. S. A. BURGESS, Secretary.

The Free Church.

The Free Church, alluded to in the article on Colonel Higginson, was organized early in the fifties by certain people who were not satisfied with the attitude of the church, generally, on the slavery question. Dr. Oramel Martin was president, Mr. Caleb A. Wall made the first speech with reference to the organization and his sister was treasurer. Among the members were the late Adin and Perry Thayer, Martin Stowell and others. To Colonel Higginson as pastor, succeeded David A. Wasson, under whom the body drifted towards spiritualism and the association, now holding meetings in Continental Hall, may be deemed the legitimate successor of the Worcester Free Church of 1852. The meetings were first held in Horticultural Hall, where the organization was effected. Later they went to Washburn Hall

Society of Antiquity.

The annual meeting of the Society and the first regular meeting in the new building was held last Tuesday night with a good attendance. Ellery B. Crane was re-elected president; George Sumner and William H. Sawyer, vice-presidents; Walter Davidson, secretary in the place of William F. Abbot who declined a re-election; Henry F. Stedman, treasurer; Thomas A. Dickinson, librarian. Daniel A. Seagrave was elected a member of the standing committee on nomination.

The librarian's report showed the addition during November to be 12 bound volumes, 24 pamphlets and 58 papers, 94 articles in all, during the year, 170 bound volumes, 588 pamphlets, 459 papers and 40 miscellaneous articles. Two new members were voted in and nine new ones proposed. It was proposed to amend the constitution by raising the admission fee from $2 to $5, and life membership from $25 to $50, and the matter goes over to the next meeting in three weeks. The Society's outlook seems very flattering.

THE BEST OFFER YET!

You have all heard of Carl's Tour of Main Street. It was written years ago by Clarendon Wheelock, at least it is so claimed, and was printed and reprinted in the Palladium. Two or three years since, Sanford & Davis put it into book form, and sold it for $1.50 per copy. LIGHT is now prepared to offer it to new subscribers, along with the paper for $2.25. You can see that this is an admirable opportunity to get this most excellent history at considerably less than half its former price. As there is only a limited number of the books, the offer holds only till the stock is exhausted.

Christmas Opening and Sale!

The greatest, most varied and pleasing gathering of gifts, simple to elegant, cheap to costly, ever assembled together in Worcester is now ready under the Boston Store roof. The store is transformed into a bower of bliss and children's delight.

BOOKS

Moved to the left aisle.

Three times the former room. Plenty of elbow room, light and every convenience possible.

Nine-tenths of all the books sold in Worcester during the Holidays pass over the Boston Store book counters. We take every book published and sell it for from 20 to 25 per cent less than the price in any other book store. The book business was begun here on sound principles, and having been so continued, it has grown to be today a marvel in this section.

Our very low prices are due to the fact that the Syndicate buys a tremendous amount of books every year, and thus brings prices down very decidedly.

There are some of the richest gift books of the year, with prices:

- Thro' Woodland and Meadow, $1.75.
- The Poet's Year, $4.25.
- One Touch of Nature, $2.50.
- American Art, with 25 plat. 8, $7.
- The Golden Treasury, $1.50.
- The Harvest Fields, $2.25.
- The Day is Done, by Longfellow, $1.95.
- The Voice of the Child Heart, Phillips Brooks, 87 1/2c.
- Picturesque Washington, $1.50.
- Grandma's Memories, $1.37 1/2 and $1.25.
- Grandma's Attic Treasures, 95c and $1.37 1/2.
- Grandmother Grey, $1.50.
- Grandfather Grey, $1.50.
- Gems of Tennyson, 75c and 95c each.
- The Voice of the Sea, $1.95.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

Entertainments.

Class 14 of the First Universalist Church Sunday School is making preparations for its annual entertainment, which will take place early in January, probably during the first week. The entertainment will be a play entitled "Nevada or the Lost Mine." Weekly rehearsals are now being held, the cast being made up as follows: Nevada, the wanderer, Geo. E. Burr; Vermont, an old miner, Will Clark; Tom Carew, a young miner, Walter B. Cummings; Dandy Dick, a young miner, Harry Sawyer; Silas Steele, a missionary of health, Alfred Van Dusen; Jerden, a detective, J. H. Adams; Jube, a black miner, Chas. Chamberlain; Win Kye, a Chinaman, Louis Brennan; Mother Merton, Lottie M. Hubbard; Agnes Fairlee, Emma Hewitt; Moselle, a wife, Miss Emma Mills. The receipts from the entertainment will be given to the Sunday School.

Lothrop's Opera House.

Miss Ethel Tucker in "Fogg's Ferry" has been the attraction at the Pleasant Street Theatre this week. Each performance is preceded by a farce, entitled "An Irish Stew." To say that Miss Tucker is a great success in the character of Chip, the ferryman's daughter, is putting it rather mild. Mr. J. Francis Kirke as Jim Bolter, was well received.

Miss Katherine Rober, supported by Lothrop's Stock Company, will make her appearance next week in "Silver Age," a sensational drama, in which there are many thrilling situations. Miss Rober is always assured of an enthusiastic welcome. She is an actress of considerable versatility, seeming to adapt herself to the requirements of a character with an ease and grace which is possessed only by the true artist.

Crowded houses at both afternoon and evening performances is a rule well observed at this pleasant little place of amusement.

Manager Dale Armstrong has entirely recovered from his recent indisposition, and devotes all his time and energy to the welfare of his patrons.

"The Prodigal Son."

Sir Arthur Sullivan's oratorio of "The Prodigal Son" was given in Pilgrim Church Tuesday evening by a chorus of fifty voices and soloists, under the direction of J. Vernon Butler, the organist and director of the Pilgrim Church choir. The performance of the oratorio was preceded by a violin, harp and organ recital. The recital began with an organ solo, Grand Offertoire in D (St. Cecilia), Batiste, by J. Vernon Butler, followed by a harp solo, ballade, Parish-Alvares by Mr. Heinrich Schuëcker, the solo harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who recently made so favorable an impression at the Mms L'Esperance concert; violin solo, second polonaise, Wieniawski by Mr. Emanuel Fiedler; duo concertante for harp and violin, Charles Baudoit (first performance in America), Messrs Schuëcker and Fiedler; organ solo, vesper hymn, S. B. Whitney, Mr. Butler; trio for violin, harp and organ, "Hymn to St. Cecilia," Gounod, Messrs. Fiedler, Schuëcker and Butler. Everything, without an exception, was well played and though it was printed on the program, "The audience will kindly refrain from applause," each number received its well merited applause.

The solo parts of the oratorio were taken by the members of the Pilgrim Church quartet as follows: Mrs. J. W. Pitts, soprano; Mrs. J. H. Howell, contralto; Mr. George Ley Butler, tenor; Mr. J. H. Howell, baritone. Mr. George E. Brown was the organist and Miss Annie Gaunt, the pianist. The performance was highly creditable to the young conductor, Mr. Butler, the chorus work being particularly excellent. The soloists also did excellent work as well as the pianist, who had no small part to bear. The audience was very large and nearly everybody remained to the close, though the end was not until 10.15 o'clock.

Last Monday evening C. Milton Chase gave the second of the entertainments in course B, Mechanics Course. It was a magic and an entertainment. Next Monday evening, in course A, the Boston Rivals will give a concert, with the assistance of Mrs. Jessie Eldridge Southwick, who is so well known to Worcester audiences as one of the best of readers.

Y. M. C. A.

One of the finest entertainments of the season was the reading by Fred Emerson Brooks last Thursday evening. His humorous manner and the many really fine passages in his poems, all of which are original, mark his recitations as something out of the ordinary line. Some of the poems read were "Old Ace," "The miracle at Cana," "Sherman's March," composed for and read at the G. A. R. Encampment in Boston last year. Perhaps the most effective was the "Orthodox Team," which is printed in another column. Mr. Sydney Woodward, a colored tenor singer was well received, and responded to two encores. Gertrude L. March played the accompaniments. The hall was filled, many being obliged to stand, and we are sure that should they come to the city again, they would meet with a cordial reception.

E. N. Kirk Mears, son of Dr. D. O. Mears of this city, is one of the committee of arrangements at the next Class Day, Williams College.

That Trial.

The coming mock trial in Mechanics Hall under the auspices of Post 10, G. A. R. promises more amusement for one evening than any enterprise ever undertaken here. The hall should be crowded to its utmost and mirth should have full sway.

Colonel T. W. Higginson.

Though not a resident of Worcester, today, there was a time when Thomas Wentworth Higginson wielded a powerful influence in the Heart of the Commonwealth. Always a radical, it was natural that he should early be found in the Anti-Slavery cause, and since the war, his voice has been potent in the furtherance of other reforms, particularly in advancing the status of women. He is a native of Cambridge, a descendant of that Francis Higginson who was the first minister of the Salem Colony and whose portrait may be seen in our American Antiquarian Society's building. His father was Stephen, a merchant and from 1818 to 1834 steward of Harvard College. For many years, on account of his charitable deeds he was known as the "Man of Ross." Thomas Wentworth was born December 22, 1824, so we are getting pretty near to his sixty-eighth birthday. He was graduated at Harvard in 1841, one of forty-six young men who have, in the subsequent years, done well or less, according to circumstances. One classmate was the present Chief Justice Harris of the Sandwich Islands, and the last name in the list is that of our late respected Worcester physician, Dr. Rufus Woodward. It was not till 1847 that he was graduated from the theological department, having spent the intervening time in travelling and private study and in the same year, he was ordained pastor of the 1st Congregational Church in Newburyport, but his Anti-Slavery preaching was too strong for the fellow citizens of Caleb Cushing, so he resigned in 1850 and that year was the unsuccessful Free Soil candidate for Congress.

In 1852, his Worcester life began, for then he was invited hither as the pastor of the newly organized Free Church and in this capacity he continued till 1858, when he resigned to devote himself more fully to literary pursuits. Those Worcester years were fraught with interest. In 1854, arose the famous Anthony Burns case, so graphically told by our own fellow citizen, Charles E. Stevens, Esq. The Rev. Mr. Higginson was the popularly declared leader of the body of men who went down from Worcester to Boston to attempt the rescue of the imprisoned African. While a vast audience, in Faneuil Hall, was listening to Theodore Parker and others, Mr. Higginson and his followers all but succeeded in getting Burns out of the Court House. In the skirmish, a deputy marshal was killed and the Worcester clergyman was wounded. For this affair, with Wendell Phillips, Parker and several more, he was indicted for murder, but all escaped owing to a flaw in the indictment. It was natural for such a man to enter the army during the war and he became a captain in Col. A. B. R. Sprague's 51st Regiment; but soon after going South, he accepted the colonelcy of the 1st South Carolina, afterwards the 33d U. S. Colored Troops, the very first regiment of freed slaves to be mustered into the national service. "Army Life in a Black Regiment" was the literary result of this course and the poem "The Black Regiment" is familiar to all school children. It has been spoken in Worcester schools again and again. He was wounded, 1863, at Wiltown Bluff and in 1864, he resigned on account of disability.

There are few names in Capt. Higginson's Co. C that are not pretty well known in this city. They included John B. Goodell, Luther H. Bigelow, J. O. Bemis, the late Charles N. Hair, James E. Dennis, Charles A. Goddard, Edwin Brown, Benj. Carrico, Stephen C. Earle, S. H. Fuller, M. H. Lowe, Chas. F. Pierce, who has prepared a valuable memorial of the company, D. G. Tapley, Henry A. Winn and many others.

Mr. Higginson was married in 1847 to Mary Elizabeth Channing, a daughter of Walter Channing, M. D., of Boston, and thereby a niece of the famous Unitarian divine, Dr. William Ellery Channing. Though many years an invalid she received the ardent devotion of her husband to the end, their residence being, after the war, in Newport, R. I. Col. Higginson's second wife is Miss Thacher of West Newton and their Summer home is in Holden. The remainder of the year they live in Cambridge.

Coming back to his Worcester living, it may be stated that Mr. Higginson was devoted to all that tended to the bettering of mankind, whether it was in church, lyceum or gymnasium. Many Worcester men, today, are stronger and healthier for the prompting received a little less than forty years ago. Outdoor Papers, a book, published in 1863 pictures somewhat the years of his stay in this city. Since moving away, he has been only a casual visitor, though a few years since, he spoke before the Altheia Society at the High School on "Rebellion Memories."

His name appeared as a contributor to the first volume of the Atlantic Monthly and there have been few volumes since in which he is not found in some way. For years, his essays have been the most notable in Harper's Bazar. In a word, where scholarship, with clear expression, coupled with most exquisite fancy is wanted, then may Col. Higginson be found at his best.

Veteran soldiers will rejoice to know that to him was committed, some months since, the revision and full preparation of the Muster Roll of Massachusetts during the Rebellion, a fact which assures the correcting of the errors and blunders so painfully evident in the volumes now in existence.

Both Worcester and Colonel Higginson have changed much since he resided here, but it is altogether likely that both still cherish kind recollections of each other and for this reason, LIGHT offers this sketch and the portrait for the pleasure of Worcester readers, those people who rejoice in the present and past of our fair city.

O. U. A. M

Last Sunday evening, the Rev. C. H. Covell at Pilgrim Church preached an eloquent sermon before Commonwealth Council, No. 3 and Worcester Council No. 39 Order United American Mechanics, and Fidelity Council, No. 4, Daughters of Liberty. Upon the platform were American flags and the discourse was eminently patriotic.

Rev. James J. Donnelly, a High School boy, a graduate of Holy Cross and a student at Brighton Seminary, will be ordained to the priesthood, December 21st, in Springfield. He belongs to the parish of the Sacred Heart.

Miss Conway's Lecture.

The lecture of this lady before the Catholic Young Women's Society of the Sacred Heart Parish was a very pleasing affair. The lady is an associate editor of the Boston Pilot, and her address was replete in suggestion and comment as to "The Literature of Moral Loveliness." Dr. Conaty introduced the speaker. Before the lecture, a literary program was carried out by Miss Margaret Maloney, Miss Margaret E. Reidy, Miss Marcela T. Walsh, Miss Mary McCann, Miss Nellie Burke and Miss Julia W. Smith. Miss Julia A. Quinn, president of the society, presided, and delivered the opening address. A reception for Miss Conway followed her address and then came a guessing contest as to the weight of two pumpkins, big and little. The first prize, Boyle O'Reilly's book, "Moon-dyne," was won by Miss Kate Morrison, who guessed fifty-seven pounds. The second prize for the small pumpkin was won by Miss Liz-zie Hogan, who guessed one pound.

BOOKS AND BOOKMEN.

Scientific American.

Experiments are being conducted in France looking to the conveyance of messages by bees, but as yet no practical results have been attained. Rain making comes in for its share of correspondence both pro and con. One issue describes the whole process of butchering hogs and the marketing of pork. Much information is given regarding sponge fishing in the Bahamas, and among the inventions described this month is a new typewriter, so arranged as to clasp onto a book, and thus be used to record deeds, etc. Munn & Co., New York.

The Ladies' Home Journal, Curtis' Publishing Company, Philadelphia, Penn.

This is the Christmas number and is filled with everything pertaining to the holidays. The stories are good, and the essays on almost every subject are equally so. The first story is by a daughter of Charles Dickens. There are portraits of Mrs. Amelia Barr, Princess Bismarck and Winnie Davis, the Beecher family in a group, and a sketch accompanies each picture. Many short papers fill the number with so much that is good that we recommend all to purchase as it is only ten cents and doubtless within the reach of all. $1 per year.

St. Nicholas, conducted by Mary Mary Mapes Dodge, The Century Company, Union Square, New York.

"The Christmas Inn," an English story of olden times, goes with the frontispiece and is told by Ella F. Moseby. The first chapter of a continued story, "The Admiral's Caravan," is both amusing and interesting. Anything by J. T. Trowbridge is sure to be read with avidity by the young people and probably the older ones will read "The Corner of the Column." "The Long Hillside" is a Southern sketch of a hare hunt and has parts told in the peculiar dialect of the colored people. Several chapters of Tom Paulding finally leave Tom declaring that he is going to find the stolen money. Some of the strange corners of our country are described by Charles F. Lummis. A fairy story will tickle the younger ones in the family and "Honors to the Flag" will please the patriotic ones. "Afternoon Tea" is a charming tale and the "Escape of a Whole Managerie" is funny. Taking the poems, the illustrations, the correspondence, and we have with all the rest something to suit every one and the price too is satisfactory for twenty-five cents buys it all.

Lippincott's Magazine.

The December number is distinctly a Southern number, all the contributions dealing with Southern topics and written by Southern authors. The frontispiece is a very clear picture of T. C. De Leon, the writer of the novel of the month. Miss Sara M. Handy writes of Negro Superstitions, of Voodoo doctors, their charms and incantations. Literature in the South since the War is almost as comprehensive as an encyclopaedia article, and in it we find the names of all Southern writers of any note. Col. John R. Fellows is quoted on the New Orleans lynching. During the course of this interesting interview, he passes some severe strictures upon the manner in which newspapers criticise the judiciary thus lessening public respect for the bench.

Poems are contributed by R. T. W. Duke, Jr., Wm H. Hayne, and Charles Washington Coleman. J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia $3.00 a year.

Herbert D. Ward, the young husband of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, who is making such a good name for himself with his short stories, contributes a story to the New England Magazine for December. It is called "Only An Incident," and is finely illustrated by Jo. H. Hatfield, who is rapidly coming to the front as an illustrator.

Bookmaking in the South in the War Period.

The difficulties which beset a publisher during that period may be imagined from those attending the issue of Les Misérables, which West & Johnson brought out in 1864. In the first place, a copy could not be obtained within the Southern Confederacy; so a blockade-runner was commissioned to secure one. Then, all the scholars being in the army, or else engaged in nursing the wounded, or taking care of their children, the only translator that could be found was a vagrant captain, who cheerfully undertook the task, stipulating, however, that his first payment should be in advance and should be in gold. This installment, which was thirty dollars, and was equivalent to twelve hundred dollar of Confederate money, having been, after much trouble, secured and paid him, he bowed himself out, and as the publisher subsequently had reason to suppose, kept on until he was beyond the limits of the Confederacy. The publisher thereupon fell back on a reprint published in New York which he was so fortunate as to secure, and, eschewing further translation, set to work with a pencil and scissors, and, having a due regard to the scarcity of paper and to the impropriety of republishing over his name in the Confederate capital such sentiments as that stating John Brown to have been greater than Washington. Brought forth on greenish paper manufactured from raw cotton an expurgated copy which Victor Hugo would hardly have recognized, and which shortly became known by the name Lee's Misérables.—December Lippincott's.

WORCESTER, MASS., December 1, 1891.

MY DEAR SIR: The Annual Dinner of the Alumni Association of the College of the Holy Cross will be held at the Parker House, Boston, on the evening of January 14, 1892, at 8 o'clock. Reception at 7 30 o'clock.

The success of our Dinners in the past has been mainly due to the increased attendance of its members. It is the desire of the Board of Government that the January Dinner surpass all others in attendance and royal good fellowship.

Let your presence testify your interest in the Association and in your Alma Mater. Full details and programme of the Dinner will be mailed you in January.

Yours very truly,

RICHARD H. MOONEY,
Secretary.

Box 549.

Mrs. Morgan's School.

If there is a happier lot of little folks in Worcester than those who daily assemble in the Y. M. C. A. building, then they must be in almost a beatific condition. Radiant faces are those that cluster around Mrs. Morgan. There are many readers of LIGHT who will be glad to know that Miss Kilham, who on account of illness was compelled to go home, is improving and has hope of complete recovery.

The teacher who recently took the members of her school to visit the articles of historic interest in the upper halls of the old State House, set an example which it would be well for others of that profession to follow.—Boston Traveller.

Amherst.

Pratt Field was the scene, Saturday, the 21st, of the fiercest and most evenly contested game of foot-ball that has been played in Amherst this year. The championship of the League would fall to the winning team, and both Amherst and Williams strained every nerve to win the game. For two hours the game was closely contested and finally resulted in a draw 0—0, neither side having been at any time in any imminent danger of scoring. The results of the game were briefly these; a hold-over championship for Williams but no pennant, twenty-two dirty, muddy men, 900 exhausted "yellers" and $375 of gate receipts in the manager's pocket. Only one man was injured.

About 300 men went from Amherst to the Springfield game and cheered for Yale.

President Gates recently announced gifts of the value of $55,000, and the establishment of courses of lectures on Greek art and political economy. The Bolwood estate, bordering the college grounds on the north, has been presented to the college by an alumnus.

The School and the Flag.

So it makes a difference as to the donor of a flag! It would seem so after the late meeting of the School Committee. The flag of our country is not a variable quantity. It matters not who gives it. The stars and the stripes there are not contingent on the society to which the donors belong. The young people who study beneath it will gain just as much good from their school, with the flag a gift from a society of mechanics of whatever nationality, as they would were it purchased by the city. Moreover, in accepting it, the city is not bound to any class, sect or nation. The anxiety of certain easy talkers in the committee was decidedly far fetched. The flag floats for all. Let all try to be equally worthy of its protection. It is pleasing to know that the flag was accepted and that the Order of United American Mechanics was not snubbed.

High School.

Once more there is to be a paper published in the interest of the school. After an interval of two years, the school committee has granted permission to publish the favorite paper, with the scholars, the Academe, but with the understanding that it shall not be sold in or about the school building. It seems to have a very efficient corps of editors and has started on strictly business methods. All that is now wanting is the generous patronage of the school, which it no doubt will receive.

The W. H. S. Foot Ball Team is the strongest that the school has ever known. Although having won but two out of eight games played, they have played interesting games. The players have shown just the right spirit throughout all the games which is a great credit to themselves, and the school. "If first you don't succeed try, try again" boys.

It seems a great pity and a loss of time for the school to be obliged to climb the long flights of stairs, once or twice a week, simply to be viewed by the principal and to hear a notice or two. The pupils have never made any disturbance over the matter, but they miss the good old days, when some fact of interest was brought before the school and given the pupils; something to think over and remember. Would that we might have some of those days repeated or some change from the present condition.

Many familiar faces are seen about the corridors during the recesses. Some of them are those who have graduated, others are those who have once been connected with the school but have been obliged to leave for various reasons. We hope this custom will continue, for both pupils and teachers are at liberty then and are always happy to see and meet former members of the school.

W. L. P.

Miss Lucia F. Upham, the latest appointed teacher in the High School, is a Worcester girl, resident on George Street, a daughter of the late Harvey G. Upham. She was valedictorian of her class, '87, W. H. S. and in Wellesley, whence she was graduated in '91, she took high rank in Latin and Greek, branches that she will teach in the school. It is noteworthy that Mr. Wallace Turner, already a teacher there was salutatorian of the same High School Class with Miss Upham.

Polytechnic.

Prof. George E. Gladwin is preparing a book of sketches from his travels in the North, South and East, which will soon be published.

This afternoon and evening, the Camera Club gives its third annual exhibition in the Salisbury Laboratories, beginning at 3 p. m. It promises to be the best and largest ever arranged. The print exhibit, which is divided into fifteen separate classes including instantaneous, portraits, etc., is to be put upon the walls of Prof. Alden's recitation and reading room on the first floor. Several large panels of pictures by honorary members will also be entered. On the second floor in Prof. Kimball's lecture room, the lantern slide exhibit will be held, commencing at about 8 30 p. m. Nearly 150 lantern slides will be shown in this exhibit. The judges are Prof. A. S. Kimball, J. Chauncey Lyford and A. S. Roe. The private slides displayed will represent the Summer's work of the members, everyone of whom has entered some, so that a large and varied collection is assured.

One of the most important things, from a social point of view at least, which has taken place at the Institute for a number of years, is the proposed establishment of its first Greek Letter Fraternity. The society earliest in the field is the Phi Gamma Delta, a society which numbers forty-eight different chapters in as many different colleges, especially through the middle states, and which claims a membership of graduates and undergraduates of about twenty-eight thousand, including such men as President Harrison, James G. Blaine and Chauncey M. Depew. The fraternity is particular where and under what conditions it founds chapters, no less a college than Amherst having been several times refused a charter because of the large number of societies already established there, the last corner of course having but few students from which to choose. In fact it was largely through the influence of Archibald McCullagh Jr., of this city, a member of the society and a student at the University of Pennsylvania, that Worcester was successful.

The local chapter is to be known as the Pi Iota—Polytechnic Institute, and will have rooms and be in running order in a short time. There are twelve charter members, eight of whom were initiated last Saturday evening at the Institute of Technology chapter, Boston. The chapter was organized with the consent of the faculty and will hold its meetings Saturday evenings to avoid conflict with school work.

The foot-ball outlook for next season steadily grows brighter. Last Tuesday a letter was received by a student, from Ray Hernandez of Cornell, an ex-player on the 'Varsity eleven, saying he would come here next month and enter the mechanical course. In closing he writes; "Never mind foot-ball now, wait until next Fall and we will surprise some teams."

Lake's room-mate is authority for the statement that owing to Harvard's defeat, the famous half-back will not come back here next Fall as stated in some of the local dailies.

I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain, what I consider the most available of all titles, the character of an honest man.—George Washington.—Moral Maxims.

At the Feast.

No happier group gathered around a fire-side than the fourteen who assembled at the home of E. D. McFarland, at 117 Thomas Street on Thanksgiving Day, but even here there were sad memories of the larger numbers who once responded. The King of Shadows is ever depleting our ranks. In addition to the home group were Mr. Edward Dean and family, Mr. Wm. A. Wheeler and family and Mrs. Adams and daughter of North Hadley. Mr. Wheeler read for the pleasure of all the following original poem:

Welcome, welcome festal day!
Gladly do we gather here,
The earth is clad in garments grey,
Time honored day, we there revere.

We meet around this festal board,
Where each heart beats fondly true
To partake thy cherished food,
Whilst hours and minutes flow.

The clouds may darken fairest sky,
Unbidden falls the tear;
We cannot fail to breathe a sigh,
For those who once were with us here.

We talk tonight of days of yore,
When each of us was young;
To test the fruits the old farm bore,
To sing the songs we sung.

With faces bright we meet tonight,
Those of us who are gathered here,
Around this board a welcome sight,
As met we were last year.

How vivid come th' se days long past,
When all were gathered there,
No sorrowing hearts a shadow cast
On sadly waning chair.

Fond memories cling to the old home
To father, mother dear,
Before we had commenced to roam,
Those who are still left here.

Thanksgiving pie our mother made,
How you and I did eat!
The turkey on the altar laid,
A sacrifice most sweet.

Our mother's table always groined
With the bounty round us spread,
How oft have we in fullness moaned,
When we were put to bed.

It often was my boyhood's lot,
To bring in the dryest wood,
To heat that old brick oven hot,
That in the kitchen stood.

How sadly looked the mother hen,
When, sent to rob her nest,
I searched each nook and hidden gen,
That I might find the nest.

Nuts and apples, and cedar too,
Before leetalsal came!
The straws we used to suck it through—
Wonder if 't would taste the same!

The children in a room alone,
Played blind man's bluff or hide and seek,
While tallow candle dimly shone,
And made the darkness more complete.

But the partings always come at last,
As ga hereed round to say "Good Bye,"
Each and all of us were there,
While tears of joy filled every eye.

Gathered in this home tonight
Those of us who still are left,
Have hearts as true yet not as light
For all have been bereft.

In the silent, dim beyond,
Land no mortal eye can see,
Knit to us with strongest bond,
Place, we call eternity.

Eternal joys we feel are theirs,
Joys no mortal eye hath seen.

Freed from all their earthly cares,
Where the fields are ever green.

Live they there, where none grow old,
Joyous will the meeting be,
To have those arms of love enfold
In that land beyond the sea.

Let each tonight his tribute bring,
And each the other cheer,
And fondly still may we all cling,
To what is left us here.

We sorrow at our broken ranks,
At our circle small this year,
And yet we offer heartfelt thanks,
For the number who are here,

And pledge ourselves, with voice and hand,
To meet again next year,
A small but happy little band
Those of us who are here.

Antiquity Blow Out.

Had the new building been filled with good old fashioned fire places only, there could have been no suspension of heat, such as afflicted the denizens of Salisbury Hall last Monday. But it was through no fault of the antiques themselves that the steam plug of the Royal Steam Heater blew out and caloric disappeared. The engineer was from the firm that put the apparatus in, and it was his overconfidence that led to the mischief. The trouble was soon remedied and the preservation of "Ye ancient" was again as usual.

Olaf Kræter.

A writer in the Greenfield Gazette says that Olaf was born in a Greenland village 1,000 miles north of Iceland. This place, Equieckna, is where the people have only one day and one night in the year and she was in her fifteenth year when she went with her parents to Iceland, where she received her education. Then she came to America and some Worcester folks have seen her. Though a full sized Esquimaux, she is no taller than our little folks of four years.

Merry Making.

At the home of Mrs. J. Edwin Smith, No. 10 Ashland Street, one week ago last night, the first of a series of four cotillions was given. Music was furnished, under the direction of John J. Heron, by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Decorations, simple though beautiful, abounded.

George A. Stearns, Jr., led the cotillion with Miss Clarissa Smith, daughter of the hostess. Several new fantastic forms characterized the favors.

Among those present were Miss Josephine Smith, Miss Mildred Crompton, Miss Christine Rice, Miss Fanny Clarke, Miss Mabel Gage, Miss Carrie Tiffany, Miss Dickey, Miss Helene Leighton, Rochester; Miss Eliza Knowlton, Upton; Miss Whitman, Miss Wymann, Miss Bessie Hopkins, Miss Margaret Earle, Miss Mary Eaton, Miss Alice Clarke, Miss Brewer, Miss Lou Throop, Miss George Stone, Miss Louie Nelson, Charles F. Aldrich, Harry W. Smith, George S. Taft, A. B. Wood, Ernest H. Wood, Harry W. Doe, D. Osborne Earle, John Nelson, E. Hopkins, Newton Darling, Dr. George Moore, Charles Grinnell, Charles Thayer, Dr. W. F. Gilman, Albert Bard of Providence; Charles Ranlet and E. A. Forrest of Hartford.

Why Don't the Schools Teach It?

"One day of the present week, meeting a business man of Boston, whose experience as a traveller in foreign lands has been very extended, as he has made eighteen steamship voyages, I asked him what was his impression of the movement we are considering on this occasion. Growing enthusiastic with almost the first words he uttered, the gentleman referred to said he had many times, when on the ocean, had cause for being ashamed of the American people, who were his fellow passengers, as when occasion required it, only about two thirds of them could sing the 'Star Spangled Banner,' simply because they never had been taught the words, and in many cases he stated, that natives of our own country had felt obliged to apologize for their ignorance with reference to this national song, the rendering of which has thrilled so many thousand of hearts. 'Yes,' said he, 'it is time we had more of these object lessons in patriotism furnished us, and I am heartily thankful for this method of emphasizing the need of more loyalty to our country.'—E.

Don't Eat so Much.

"Nearly everybody eats far more than is necessary," says a leading physician. "Among my patients those who eat the least get over their mull-grubs the quickest, while those who eat the heaviest are ill the oftensest. My experience shows that half the ailments of life are brought about by overeating or drinking. I myself take a light breakfast, perhaps eggs with toast, or fish with potatoes, or a bit of cold chicken, or something of the kind, and a cup of coffee. At noon I take milk, with a few crackers, or else some fruit. At six I have a hearty, but not heavy dinner, with soup, fish, meat, vegetables, bread, and a few glasses of light wine. I do not eat over a pound and a half of solid food a day, though I am more robust than most men, and am never troubled with any of the hundred complaints that are the result of overeating. I advise you to eat lightly, be careful of what you eat, and take your time in eating. This looks like commonplace advice, but my fee for it, without any pills, is ten dollars."

Attention, Ladies!

Oft-times we see the otherwise attractive and beautiful face of a lady marred by the unsightly and unnatural appearance of moles or superfluous hair. The time is not far distant when the removal of such obnoxious disfigurement was attended by considerable inconvenience and even danger to life itself. Electricity is the science by which Dr. B. F. Longstreet, A. M., Physician and Surgeon, safely and permanently removes moles and superfluous hair. Persons so afflicted will be well repaid by a careful perusal of the doctor's advertisement on another page, and paying him a visit at his main No. 17, in the Clarke Building, No. 492 Main Street, where every modern convenience known to medical science is at the disposal of the doctor's patients. Dr. Longstreet is well-known to the citizens of Worcester and surrounding towns as a physician and surgeon of learning and pronounced ability, his reputation being a sufficient guarantee of his accomplishing whatever he promises.

Books and Bookmen

The December number of the Educational Review completes the second volume of that journal, and is strong in scholarly and practical articles. President Seth Low of Columbia has a suggestive paper on James Russell Lowell as an educator; Principal W. C. Collar of the Roxbury (Mass.) Latin School, studies the action of the colleges on the schools of both institutions; Prof. Joseph Jastrow contributes an interesting psychological study of the processes of memory and association; while Dr. D. A. Sargent of Harvard, in a paper that will attract wide attention, discusses the subject of college athletics and heart disease.

Mr. Thomas Davidson traces fully the development of the so-called Seven Liberal Arts. Other articles are by Col. Francis W. Parker, Principal E. H. Russell of the Worcester (Mass.) Normal School, and Superintendent T. H. Balliet of Springfield, Mass.

The well-known English educator, Dr. J. G. Fitch, in his letter from London, tells of the educational topics that are interesting Great Britain. An article by Prof. S. A. Laurie of Edinburgh, touches upon the secondary school curriculum and the question of Greek in colleges and universities.

The editorial contributions are timely and among the noteworthy book reviews are those by Prof. J. G. Schurman of Cornell, Prof. T. H. Safford of Williams, and Henry S. Pan coast of Philadelphia.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, will soon publish Business Law, prepared with much care by Alonzo P. Weed, a well-known attorney.

This is not only a useful text-book for business colleges and the business courses of schools and academies, but is no less desirable for the desk of the business man. It treats briefly but very clearly of just the topics about which an active business man is in every day need of information: such as contracts, negotiable paper, agency, partnership, the transportation of goods, deeds, mortgages, leases, collection laws, interest, patents, etc. Especial attention is given to differences in the different state laws relating to the same subject. Teachers will also find the questions and exercises contained in this volume a most important help in their work. These are not merely the usual questions on the text, which any intelligent teacher might frame for himself as well, if not better; but actual cases are stated, calling for a practical application of the principles learned by the student. The book is conveniently arranged for ready reference and will prove an excellent text-book for school use and an invaluable aid for business men.

Decisive Events in American History. The Battle of Gettysburg, 1863, by Samuel Adams Drake, Boston. Lee and Shepard, 1892, 50 cents.

Within less than 175 pages of a small 12 mo. the main facts of this great event in history are compressed. Of course, it cannot be a well wrought study, but it is an admirable hand book that every Gettysburg pilgrim will do well to put in his pocket when he starts and to read well during the journey and to have in hand as he walks over the field. Very accurate diagrams make the relative positions of the rival forces during the three days perfectly clear. Add to these, the well known directness and forbearance of Mr. Drake as a writer and it may be concluded that this little volume is a positive addition to the War literature of the day. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

The New World and the New Book, with kindred essays by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Boston. Lee & Shepard, 1892. $1.50.

The essay which gives a name to this volume was read by the writer before the Nineteenth Century Club in New York City January 15, 1891. In it Col. Higginson sets forth the development of our literature from Irving's day to the present, paying passing tribute to many writers but finding most to admire in Howells. The other essays, twenty-seven in number, were, in the main, first printed in the Century, the Independent, the Christian Union and Harper's Bazar. They are, all, pertinent to the day and the hour and some will be recognized as old friends. Col. Higginson is a profound reader of human nature and, withal, a devoted American, so it will not be surprising to find that he gives his American readers abundant cause to think well of themselves. There is not a dull sentence in the entire volume and, in this Worcester, where the writer once lived, there should be many interested readers. Perhaps they will not retain their interest, twenty years hence, but today, there is nothing more entertaining to him who knows sought of literature and literary doings. As a writer of a brief essay, crowded full of fact, fancy and interest, Colonel Higginson has no American rival and only Andrew Lang in England can be mentioned with him. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

Poems by Emily Dickinson, edited by two of her friends, T. W. Higginson and Mabel Loomis Todd, Second Series. Boston, Roberts Brothers, 1891. $1.25.

No volume of verse, in many a day, has called forth the interest and admiration that the first series of Emily Dickinson's evoked. Edition after edition was exhausted and still the call came for more. To this second series there are prefixed a fac-simile of Renunciation, printed in the first volume, and a preface which to a limited extent acquaints us with the writer herself. A remarkable being she was, unquestionably, divinely touched by the spirit of song. There is nothing of the perfectly metered and rhymed verses that conform to the rule of poesy, nor is there any of the strange assemblages that have given to Walt Whitman his fame, but from "I'm nobody! Who are you!" to "Lay this laurel on the one Too intrinsic for renown.

Laurel! veil your deathless tree,— Him you chasten, that is he!"

the reader feels that he is dealing with no ordinary poetaster. Condensation is one of the writer's merits. Like Poe she does not believe in the long poem. A stanza, a line, a word present vivid pictures. Like the humming-bird which she so vividly describes in the first series, she goes from thought to thought; just a sip here and a dip there, the reader, all the time, admiring the implied thought, the scene just hinted at. An epic would weary her; perhaps it would be an impossibility, but in aptness of expression, she has had few equals. In "Compensation" she says:

"For each ecstatic instant,
We must an anguish pay
In keen and quivering raptures
To the ecstasy."

One is prompted to quote the whole book, for every thought is a gem but then there would be no temptation to buy and possess the volume, for all favorable book reviews should have a stimulating end in mind. Selection might be made at random with no danger of failure, so here is

The Railway Train.

"I like to see it lap the miles,
And lick the valleys up,

And stop to feed itself at tanks;
And then prodigious, step

Around a pile of mountains,
And, supercilious, peer
In shanties by the side of roads;
And then a quarry pace

To fit its sides, and crawl between,
Complaining all the while
In horrid, hoating stanza;
Then chase it off down hill,

And neigh like Boomerangs;
Then, punctual as a star,
Stop—docile and omnipotent—
At its own stable door."

The arrangement of the collection is under four heads, first Life, then Love, next Nature and finally Time and Eternity, and the progress from the first to the last is admirable. In all there are 166 selections, not much in quantity but more in quality than many a more ambitious array. She has imitated no one, has invaded no one's domain. She found a world, a small one, all her own, and how completely, perfectly has she occupied it!

Hildegarde's Holiday, a sequel to Queen Hildegarde, by Laura E. Richards. Illustrated, Boston, Estes and Lauriat, $1.25.

A book for young people, in large type, with several expressive pictures. It is a healthful, helpful story of country life in midsummer. Rose is an invalid recovering; Hildegarde is her friend and helper. They visit cousin Welly in the rural districts and the breezy little book tells of their adventures "away down in Maine." Zerubbabel is Rose's brother and, boy like, he contributes no little to the interest of the outing. In short, it is a story of good people who do good deeds and have a very happy time in thus doing. Nothing harrowing nor blood curdling in it. It conveys a good lesson. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

Princess Girilkin or the Fairy Thimble by Ida Preston Nichols, and other fairy tales by Mary De Morgan, Illustrated, New York, E. F. Dutton & Co., 1892. $2.00.

When did not childhood delight in Fairy Tales? From the Arabian Nights and Grimm's Tales to these and other later fancies, the youthful mind has revelled in a realm where nothing so prosy as facts has any place. Then too the pictures are so exquisite! They are in the engraver's choicest style and they catch not only the eyes of the children but those of their elders as well. In brightest red and gold, with the shiniest of gilt edges, the book is a delight to the eye and then when the story begins and kings and queens, with limitless wealth and all that heart can ask or wish for appear, happiness sits enthroned on the youthful brow. "Once on a Time" is near enough for dates and mountains and valleys come and go by the wizard's touch. Princess Girilkin is such a beauty and the Old Man on the North Pole is so queer! The owner of this book will read it over and over. The stories will not grow old. The diamond "On a Pin Cushion" will be refugent always, Siegfried and Handa will continue to outwit the terrible old man. Glorious, happy childhood! Void of care, with life in the future, what pleasure it may take in the scenes woven in fancy! And blessed is he who in any way ministers to the delights of the young. Fairy Lure. Translated from the German by Carrie Norris Horwitz. 12 mo. $1.50. Boston, D. Lothrop Co.

Miss Horwitz showed herself a born "adapter" in the collection of fairy tales translated and compiled by her two years ago under the title of "Swanhide." Her new volume to which she has given the attractive title "Fairy Lure" is fully as entertaining and fully as scholarly an example of adaptation as was her earlier volume. "Fairy Lure" is compiled from German and Swedish originals and has all the mystery and all the fascination that the wonder tales and fairy stories of those matchless story-tellers of Northern lands. In the Arabic and European settings to these tales of marvel, beautiful princesses, noble knights, tyrannical kings, cruel step-mothers, fairies, dragons, witches, elves and all the fanciful and impalpable delights of fairy love find life and action, and no child but will devour with eager eyes and absorbing interest the whole book from cover to cover. This book itself is a marvel of dainty and beautiful workmanship. Issued as an unformed volume to "Swanhide," it is of exceptional appearance alike in paper, type and binding, while the characteristic outline illustrations, made to fit the text by L. J. Bridgman, one of our best pen-illustrators, are printed in sepia and add interest, picturesqueness and beauty to this altogether charming volume. "Fairy Lure" will easily lead among the gem holiday gifts for children of all ages.

"Fen Pictures of the Bosphorus" is the curiosity provoking title of an article by Alfred D. F. Hamlin of the New York School of Mines, contributed to the December New England Magazine. It is a clever and interesting account of an impressionist's views of this charming corner of the East, and is finely illustrated with drawings by the author, and other pencil and pen and ink artists.

Robert J. Burdette, the humorist, is to go into the editorial harness again. With January 1st, he will become a salaried editor on the staff of The Ladies' Home Journal, and will conduct a regular department in each issue of that periodical.

Our Little Men and Women, for youngest readers at home and in school. Bright short stories, natural history papers, "pieces to speak," jingles and beautiful pictures, will appear in every number, besides the following serials: "A Boy and a Girl," by Elizabeth Cummings. "The Doings of the Studio Dolls" by E. S. Tucker, pretty, funny, quaint. These dolls live in a "painter-lady's studio. The fun will set little men and women laughing everywhere. "Joker and His Relations," by Mary C. Crowley—the tale of a monkey, the adventures he had, and the relations he met. "All About Things," by Annie L. Hannah—what you want to know about "Raisins" "Paper," etc.

"Talks by Queer Folks," by Mary E. Bamford—animals' accounts of themselves from their own point of view. $1. a year. D. Lothrop Co., publishers, Boston.

Lowell Met His Match.

As a young man Lowell visited the White Mountains, and he used to relate this anecdote as one of his experiences there: "I was walking through the Franconia Notch and stopped to chat with a hermit who fed with gradual logs the unwearied teeth of a saw mill. I asked him the best point of view for the Old Man of the Mountains. 'Dun no—never see it.' Too young and too happy either to feel or affect the juvenalian indifference, I was sincerely astonished, and I expressed it. The log-compelling man attempted no justification, but after a little while he asked: 'Come from Bawsn?' 'Yes' (with peculiar pride). 'Goodie to see in the vicinity of Bawsn.' 'Oh, yes!' I said. 'I should like, 'awl. I should lik' to stan' on Bunker-Hill. You've been there often likely?' 'No-o,' unwillingly seeing 'the little end of the horn' in clear vision at the terminus of this Socratic perspective. 'Awl, my young frien' you've larned now that wut a man kin see any day for nothin,' children half price, he never does see. 'Nawthin' pay, nawthin' vally.'—New England Magazine.

Give Before You Die.

"Mr. T. O. H. Perry Burnham, the well-known bookseller, who died last week, left an estate valued at about $1,000,000. Among the public bequests are $40,000 to his native town of Essex, $20,000 to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and sums varying from $500 to $10,000 to various well known charitable and other institutions in and around Boston, these bequests aggregating nearly $500,000. Tufts College receives $10,000 and the Massachusetts Agricultural College $500, Perkins Institution and Massachusetts Asylum for the Blind $5000, Massachusetts Society for Aiding Discharged Convicts $2000, Massachusetts School for Idiotic and Feeble Minded Children $5000, Boston Asylum and Farm School for Indigent Boys $5000, Washington Home, Boston, $5000."

If the active, vigilant, thin-voiced gentleman, so long known in the Boston book world had disposed of his possessions before his death, his relatives, now, would not dispute and contest his will. Anyone, who ever asked Mr. Burnham for a book among his thousands and recalls with what readiness he answered as to having or not having it, and, if it were in his lot, with what alacrity he found its deservable volume, will scout the idea of his not being in a proper condition to make a proper disposition of his estate. He was a clear headed old man, one who liked his own notions and clung to them. For years he persisted in maintaining his store at the corner of School and Fremont Streets, though the Parker House proprietors were willing to pay a fabulous sum for the site, because he was unwilling that rum should be sold over land once held by him. More Burnhams in the world would be no detriment.

The Atlantic Monthly for December, 1891. Contents: The Chaperon, in two parts, Part Second, Henry James; Joseph Severn and his Correspondents, William Sharp; London and Oxford: Three Sonnets; A Torch Bearer, Harriet Waters Preston and Louise Dodge; The Unreported Incident, Harriet Lewis Bradley; The Transition in New England Theology, Alexander V. G. Allen; The Most Ancient Shrine in Japan, Lafcadio Hearn; The Frauds of Westphalia, The Repplier; The Modern Art of Painting in France, Charles H. Moore; Shakespeare's Richard III, James Russell Lowell; American Characters in German Novels, Lida von Krockow; Recent Dante Literature; Recent Poetry; Mr. James's American on the London Stage; Comment on New Books; The Contributors' Club.

The December Atlantic comes, in form considerably more portly than usual, indicating that advertisers wish to get their wares before the Atlantic readers in time for the Christmas trade. The magazine proper is full of matter calculated to please a wide range. A novel by Henry James has its admirers. An essay by William Sharp is attractive. "The Transition in New England Theology" ought to have a wide reading here in Massachusetts. "The Praises of War" is a well selected compilation. We are favored with another unpublished essay by James Russell Lowell. "American Studies in German Novels" is a very painstaking study, while editorial comments are as valuable as ever. The Atlantic has its own peculiar field and fills it well.

The New England Magazine for December makes its appearance in a delicate white cover, with gilt lettering. It is particularly well illustrated, and all the articles are interesting, without being slavishly Christmasy. The stories are better than those in some of the bigger magazines, which run to names and names only; and one by Herbert D. Ward, called "Only an Incident," is as true and pathetic as anything by Gogol or Tolstoy. It is an analysis of emotions under the influence of peculiar circumstances. A number of new artists are finding a channel for their talent in this progressive magazine, and they are making it the equal of any magazine on the newstands in this respect.

A Glimpse of the "Mill" in 1812.

AMOS A. PARKER, CLASS OF 1813.

The customary out-door exercises of the students in 1812, as I remember them, were playing ball and walking. Our ball yard was at the south end of the college building, and consisted of both cricket and base ball grounds. We practiced so much that some of us became adepts at the game. I was quick of hand and foot and generally stood behind the batter. I acquired such skill that I could catch the ball before the bat could strike it, if I chose, and the batter acted unfairly. Sometimes half a dozen of us would take a boat and visit Juniper Island, spending an hour or more in strolling over it and enjoying the lake breeze. When pleasant weather, our favorite walks were to Winoski Falls and the high bridge beyond, and then down the lane, by the Goff place, to the banks of the river. In many of the rarest sports of the students, however, I had no part, for, aside from other considerations, I had determined not to enter into any fun that savored too strongly of mischief. I remember well the following:

A farmer, who lived distant half a mile or more, on the Williston road, was in the habit of turning his flock of sheep into the highway, although he knew they would stray off to the College Green, where grew the best grass. At mid-day, when the sun was hot, they would come into the shade of the college, bringing flies, and annoying by their bleating. The attention of the students was soon called to the matter, and they decided to see what could be done to induce the farmer to keep his sheep at home.

My room was in the third story, near the center of the building, facing the College Green, the village and the lake. A more delightful prospect could not be imagined than my front windows afforded, for I could see not only down the middle street to the lake shore, but the steamboats and other vessels on the water, and the long ridge of mountains beyond in the state of New York.

One morning I was awakened by a terrific racket. On looking out I saw in the middle of the green a flock of sheep, perhaps twenty in number, all tied together by the neck in a circle, heads facing inward, and in a terrible commotion. All were anxious to go somewhere, but could not, except by common consent, and that was not to be obtained because the larger portion must move backward. Each thought some other at fault for his confinement, and all were decidedly mad, hopping, pulling, butting, bleating, and making altogether so great a hubbub as to be heard a mile away, even down to the lake shore. Soon the people of the village began to assemble, and in a short time, more than a thousand men, women and children had gathered to witness the ludicrous antics of the affrighted sheep. At this stage of the proceedings the owner appeared. He seemed at first a little disconcerted, but, soon regaining his composure, he quietly entered the frantic, struggling mass of mutton, and, releasing the sheep one by one, sent them bounding off homeward at full speed. When he had untied the last one, he coolly coiled up the rope, and, turning to the college, where the students were gathered enjoying the scene, with a loud voice and a tone of mock solemnity, said: "I wish to thank you, students, in behalf of this vast multitude, for the fine show which you have so successfully arranged for their amusement, and on my own behalf for this good rope which will doubtless prove useful on the farm." With a low bow he thereupon followed his sheep home.

The students, not a little chagrined at having the joke thus completely turned, determined on something more effectual, in case they were again troubled.

They had not long to wait, for a few days later, as we were returning from dinner, behold the sheep, again huddled together in the shade of the college walls. In a trice, one of them was seized, hurried into the building, up stairs and on to the bell deck. So frightened was the poor animal that it immediately set up a loud bleating, which undoubtedly attracted the attention of the owner, whose house was in sight from the top of the building, for he soon appeared before the college in his wagon. Just previous to his arrival, however, the bell was rung, and the sheep, in terror, leaped over the railing. How to recover the animal was now the question, for the bell deck was fully eight feet above the surrounding roof. At length, the owner hired two of the students to remove their shoes and venture out after him. But Sir Sheep was not to be caught; his pointed hoofs stuck into the shingles, securing him a firm footing, and he was much more at home than his would-be captors. In vain they chased him around the bell deck, not daring to lay hold of him on the run, lest they should be pulled off the roof. At length, tired out, they sat down to rest; the sheep, also weary, retired to the north end and lay down near one of the chimneys. It was at once seen that, if approached with caution, it could be caught. The students accordingly, worked their way carefully along the ridge of the chimney, while, holding each other by the hands, they slowly swung around. Just as their prize was within their grasp, however, it suddenly arose, and, rather than submit to capture, took the fatal leap. The distance to the ground was more than forty feet, and the animal's neck was probably broken by the fall, for it showed no sign of life. The students came down, thinking they had well earned their money. The farmer relieved his sheep of blood, lifted it into his wagon, and, exclaiming, "Much obliged; just the one I was going to kill," swung his hat and departed home, whither his sheep had preceded him; but not to stay, for, in a few days, they again appeared on the green.

Mr. Farmer was evidently one of the "try, try again" kind, and must be met with a like tenacity of purpose. A college meeting was therefore hurriedly called, at which it was decided that the most effectual way to dispose of the obnoxious sheep was to bury them. The next dark night this plan was carried into effect in the following manner. Two trenches were dug, about three feet deep and of a length sufficient to accommodate the flock. In these the sheep were placed at equal intervals, standing up, and securely packed in with dry earth and sods, leaving their heads alone above the surface. The morning light dawned upon a double row of sheep's heads, sticking out of the ground, and immovable as stone lambs in a cemetery. The unhappy animals were giving vent to their discomfort in the most piteous bleatings, and again a crowd was attracted. With them came the owner, who, at the sight, lost his usual self-possession and, in a rage, ordered the students to dig them out or he would prosecute them. They replied that it was unlawful to rob a graveyard and they couldn't entertain the idea. He thereupon appealed to the president, who said there was no proof that the students were involved in the matter, and if they were, the law was open to him. But one thing was clear; it was unlawful to let animals run in the road, and he himself was liable to prosecution therefor. Finding it impossible to get any help, he at last concluded to dig them out himself. It was a laborious task, and one that took him a number of hours to accomplish. None of the sheep seemed injured at all, for, each, as soon as it was lifted from the trench, giving its wool a shake to dislodge the dirt, hastily left for home, a sadder and a wiser sheep; and the places that had known them so oft knew them no more forever.

But our friend was not yet satisfied. Evidently the feed on the campus was rather rich for sheep, but possibly horses might thrive on it; at least, he seemed disposed to try it, for next day three of them were there quietly feeding, and, at sundown, with satisfied appetites, had repaired, for sleep or meditation, to an angle of the college walls, where they evidently proposed to stay all night. There was no moon, and it soon became quite dark. About eight o'clock, as I was sitting in my room, there was a sudden flash of light outside, and rushing to the window, I saw a horse, frantically jumping and kicking, with a lighted bundle of straw tied to his tail. After numberless vain endeavors to rid himself of his burden, which was tossed high in the air, only to return crackling against his heels, the terrified animal dashed at full speed down Middle Street toward the lake, followed by a streaming wake of flame. About half way down the street he leaped into a gully and broke his neck.

The next morning, our farmer came up to look for his lost horse, and ascertaining the facts, went down to the ravine, skinned the animal, buried its carcass and returned home, saying as he left, that the students had the best of him and he gave up the contest.

The period of my stay in Burlington was an exciting one and many things of great interest occurred in which the students were not directly concerned. Such was the barbecue and mass meeting on the College Green, July 4, 1811. Near the middle of the green a tent was erected large enough to accommodate over five hundred people. About the sides of the tent, tables were set leaving an open space in the center, into which, at one o'clock, the dinner hour, a large ox was brought, previously stuffed and roasted in a pit outside. On each side, two carvers exhibited their skill and supplied the wants of the multitude. Eight or ten pounds were sent to the president of the college, and the remnants given to the poor.

SUPERFLUOUS * HAIR * AND * MOLES * PERMANENTLY * REMOVED

ELECTRIC * NEEDLE.

NO PAIN, NO SCARRING, OR OTHER INJURY, AND NO RETURN OF THE HAIR OR MOLES AFTER REMOVAL.

It is the triumph of science. Electricity is the scientific king of the day, the synonym of progress, and the solution of the wildest dreams of thinking men.

The ancient Greek philosopher declared that there was "one universal force in matter." Modern scholars know that force to be all-pervading Electricity.

What will this prince of progress not accomplish for mankind?

For the woman whose feminine beauty is marred, and whose features are rendered masculine by a growth of hair or disfigured by moles upon her face, much to the mortification of her friends, and her own personal shame, it has brought release from the bane and curse of her life.

Thanks to Electricity, there need be no more sensitive dreading or public gaze, no more keen sorrowing in secret because she is not as other women, no more bitter shrinking from the pleasures of society, no more hateful using of the razor or tweezers.

I take this means of respectfully inviting the attention of ladies thus afflicted, and their friends, to the fact that I have opened quarters at room 17, Clark building, 492 Main St., Worcester, near the Boston Store, where I am prepared with every modern convenience and comfort to do work in this line, assisted by experienced lady operators, on the most reasonable terms possible.

DO NOT FAIL TO READ THE POSITIVE GUARANTEE OF SATISFACTION offered below.

Do not fail to call upon me. A visit to my rooms will cost you nothing, and may prove a life-long blessing.

The success of this method of removing superfluous hair and moles permanently from any part of the body is so universally acknowledged by men of science, that it is only necessary for you to consult your family physician, if he is a well-read man, and up to the times in his profession, and he will unhesitatingly tell you not only that it is beyond all question a success, but also that it is positively the only method known for surely and permanently destroying these obnoxious growths.

But, better still, your own intelligence will tell you that all argument on the subject must close when I say that if you are at all doubtful, you will not be required to place a single dollar in my hands until the work is completed, and a sufficient length of time has elapsed to satisfactorily settle the question of permanency. In other words, it will not be necessary for you to pay for the work until you are perfectly satisfied with it.

The method will be carefully, fully and convincingly explained to all who will call at my office.

I have scores of testimonials, but as I never give publicity to the names of my patrons, I do not publish these testimonials here, but have adopted the better plan of placing those who are interested in direct correspondence with those for whom I have done such work, many of whom are easily accessible, personally, to people living in Worcester and vicinity.

I am just completing work for one of my patrons, from whose face and neck I will have removed, when the work is finished, no less than six teen thousand hairs. This lady is so grateful for the results accomplished in the permanent removal of this enormous growth of hair, which for years has been the bane of her life, that she has voluntarily consented to see and talk with any one interested, and afflicted as she has been. I have photographs of this lady, showing her as she was, and you can see her as she is. Notwithstanding the immense amount of work accomplished, not a scar can be seen upon her face, which presents precisely the natural appearance of one upon whose face no hair had ever grown. What has been accomplished for her and others, may surely be accomplished for you.

For ladies living out of town, pains will be taken to secure suitable board and lodging, at reasonable rates, when required unrequested. All correspondence carefully and promptly attended to.

The utmost privacy strictly maintained.

DR. B. F. LONGSTREET, A. M., Physician and Surgeon,
CLARK BUILDING, 492 MAIN ST., ROOM 17. TAKE ELEVATOR.

Some three hours were spent at table, during which time many eloquent and timely speeches were delivered. But party spirit knew no bounds, and, though the patriotic party had a decided majority, the minority did not hesitate to express themselves. One citizen who called the officers of the general government scoundrels, and all who supported them knaves and fools, was obliged to take himself speedily out of the way, to avoid being mobbed; and the meeting shortly after broke up amid great excitement and disorder.

Next morning, in the most conspicuous place on the green, behold a well-proportioned straw image, about ten feet high, tied to a stake still higher. Upon back and breast, in letters a foot high, was the name of the obnoxious citizen. There it stood all day, attracting the gaze of an admiring multitude. At night, it was set on fire, and after burning for about an hour, with a glare which lighted up the whole village, fell amid the shouts of the assembled crowd. This political excitement was but a prelude to the war of 1812.

In the college, also, party spirit ran high, and the students were more or less disorderly. I was invited to join a secret society called the Phi Sigma Nu. At the first meeting I attended I found them in a hot political debate over an objectionable book in the library. One of the students volunteered to remove the book and came near being expelled. Finding I had gotten into a hornets' nest, I soon severed my connection with the society.

Permit me to close this already somewhat lengthy sketch with a little advice to the Seniors on the matter of Commencement dress.

Do not deem it necessary to be a Beau Brummel, or a nineteenth century dude, but remember, nevertheless, as you hope to win appreciation for your oratorical efforts, that the beauty of a gem depends greatly upon its setting; and nothing, perhaps, can, on such an occasion, better supplement a slight intellectual dormancy—on the part of the audience—than a tasty, well-appointed dress, like the following, for example, which stood the writer in good stead seventy-seven years ago:

Ruffled shirt, ruffled wristers, standing collar, white cravat, white vest, black coat, small clothes tied with ribbons at the knee, black silk stockings, and slippers with silver buckles. To this add white silk gloves and stylish, slightly powdered hair.

Got His Lobster Back.

There came near being a riot on a Fulton ferryboat the other day, and for a while it looked as if Secretary Blaine would have to be called upon to settle another international difficulty says the New York Recorder.

A woman attached to a little dog leaved upon a seat in the ladies' cabin and the dog crawled under the seat and went into executive session.

A Frenchman attached to a basket entered, took a seat beside the woman, shoved his basket under the seat and began to envelop the contents of his newspaper.

Suddenly the woman began to wriggle. She toyed with her skirts.

"Don't be rude, Fido!" she whispered, as she gave the dog chain a little jerk.

Then the woman turned as pale as a plate of vanilla ice cream. She gave the chain a hard jerk, and said screechingly:

"Lie down, Fido! Behave yourself sir!" All the passengers sniggered and the woman gasped. Then she jumped up, with a shriek and began to spank her skirts and jump about as if somebody was pulling the string. Then she spanked harder, shrieked louder and danced more vehemently. As she swung around and balanced to corners the dog resembled a rag pin-wheel. As she saw the dog, she realized the fact that Fido wasn't the cause of the festivities, and she turned two shades paler, spanked more emphatically, danced dancier, shrieked shrieker.

Then the citizen became interested. An idea appeared to strike him. He reached under the seat and introduced his basket. He lifted the cover. Then he looked well informed.

"Madame," said he, without moving an eyelash, "when you are through with my lobster will you kindly return it to me?"

There was a last, wild, wicrd shriek, a final jump, and the woman collapsed. Then the citizen chased the lobster under the seat, captured it and placed it in his basket. The woman and Fido gasped out of the cabin, and the irreverent crowd roared.

To talk in public, to think in solitude, to read and to hear, to inquire and to answer inquiries, is the business of a scholar.—Samuel Johnson—Kasselas.

Do not train boys to learning by force and harshness; but direct them to it by what amuses their minds, so that you may be better able to discover with accuracy the peculiar bent of the genius of each.—Plato.

Bob Jones Enlightens His Audience.

"Talk of campaigning!" said Jones, finishing a long speech, "I'm the chap that can tell you a tripe about campaigning. I've been in Rooshia, Prooshia, France, Spain, and Portulayga. Portulayga is just twenty-four thousand miles from here. The books about it are all false; before my time the distance was not known, but our captains have made it out with gold wire, every tether length of it, so they did." Here the tavern-keeper, who was crossing the room, muttered a well dissembled panegyric on Jones' geographical intelligence, which set him on again.

"It's just fifty-two thousand miles," continued Jones, half shutting one eye and reckoning on his fingers, "from the quay in Chatham to the quay in Bombay; ten thousand miles from that to Bengal; fifteen thousand miles from that to Madras; and nine thousand or ten thousand miles—I forget which, for fear of telling a lie—from that to Noah's Ark, which stands on the mountains of Arrow Root, and beyond that point no man ever sailed but Columbus." * * * "My last escape," said Jones, as Paul entered, "was in the battle of—of—no matter about the names of places. Well, wherever it was, we lost only a half a million in the whole fight, but the enemy lost ten times as many! they lost fifty-four thousand."

"I suppose," said Paul "it was that battle that made an old man of you so soon."

"Nay, nay," answered Jones, "what broke my constitution first was that fall I got off a battery forty feet high in Bombay; but what smashed me to atoms altogether was the 4,000 miles that I marched across St. Helena, escorting Bonaparte to Gaul."

"And didn't you walk into the Sikhs?" asked another.

"That was only a scrimmage," said Jones. "Certainly, they thought to put an end to me out in a field by myself; but, dear me, such a death as I made among them! I killed twenty-one, or perhaps it was thirty-one, with my fixed bayonet, and next morning I wrote to the Governor and got six of them executed. Positive fact, I did."

"In what reign did this occur?" demanded a third.

"William the Fifth," replied Jones. "Some call him William the Fourth, but that's all rot. You see nothing can be simpler. We had George the Third, then we had George the Fourth, then we had our brave old William the Fifth; he defeated the French one time at the great river Blenheim, and then he was called 'William the Conqueror.'" * * * "That Sewell is a bad fellow," said Jones to a crowded canteen one evening about this time. "In my young days, I should have had great annoyance from a fellow just like him, who was called 'William the Conqueror.'" * * * "The Colonel was my chum."

"Who was your Colonel," asked a bystander.

"Colonel Harold," said Jones, "a son to Lord Byron, who called him 'Child Harold,' there is a book to that effect."

"You mean Lord Byron, the poet?" asked the other.

"Nonsense," exclaimed Jones, "Byron was no poet. I knew him too; he was a nice fellow, was Bobby, my namesake. Once we drank with an innkeeper, named Chesterfield, and he laid a bet with me, but he caught a Tartar in me, that he did."

"Jones," said another friend, "Who laid this bet?"

"Why Haddersfield," answered Jones, "how often must I tell you."

"Begin again, Jones, and I'll understand you; do please, tell me the innkeeper's name that laid the bet."

"Austerfield! Austerfield! I keep telling you," said Jones. "Perhaps the name did slip my memory; but as I was saying, Pattersfield found me no fool."

"Knock off, Jones," said a wisecrack present, "I see what your memory is made of. Burns was the best poet in the world, I suppose, at all events."

"None but a fool would say so," said Jones. "Burns was very good, but nothing to Anon at poetry."

"Anon?" said several voices at once.

"Never heard of the gentleman." "Blockheads!" said Jones. "Did you never hear of Anon, the poetry maker! I why he puts his name to lots of pieces."

The Skeptic's Vision.

I have lost my child, and I know not where,
The dust has returned to the dust,
But who shall tell how the spirit may fare,
Except as he blindly may trust?
And how may I know, if the spirit be gone,
Whether dissolved, it be known no more?
Or, caught in the arms of the Bethlehem born?
Or led by its loves to the other shore?
A thousand creeds and a thousand ways,
And each in his bold assurance saith,
The hope alone of eternal day,
Is to follow our narrow way in faith.

On the ocean of life at a whifwain's command,
A sea half crossed, and a voyage half done,
My chart marks a haven on either hand,
But my pilot assures me there is but one.
And on every side for a sea, coast light
A sparkle fits like a thing of chance,
Gleams out and fades on the gloom of the night,
Or reels in an ignis fatuus dance,
And on either bow, with an earnest look,
And a finger that stretches to cloud and sea,
And to that rests in an open bay,
By his own good course each warns me flee.

And withered hands are stretched from the clouds,
As ever my vessel is harried and tost;
The foam of the sea takes the semblance of shrouds,
And forever the winds whisper, 'Lost! lost! lost!
No longer assured be the breezes I swing.
Wherever I look it conducts me to Hell.
In vain to this wreck of thine I cling,
And summon my reason to master the spell,
For I hear as I plunge in the trackless abyss,
And rouse my spirit to grapple the theme,
The wrangling tongues of a myriad hiss,
And the search dissolves in a frightful dream.

I whirl in the maelstrom of dogma and creed,
And caught in the mazes can see but one goal,
And who shall deliver me? who in my need
Shall rescue from death and oblivion the soul?
But lo! as I ponder I see a face—
Lighter than gossamer, thinner than air;
They who look see nothing but spirit;
But to me the form of my child is there.

Over the waters I hear a sigh,
Softer than murmur, fainter than breath,
They hear it not who are standing by;
But to me it whispers, "This is not dead!"

Have ye not felt in the hours of night,
As ye walked apart from the haunts of men,
The breath of that wing which in kindly flight
Assured ye a loved one was living again?
Have ye not known in this battle of life,
The presence of her who has gone before,
'Till it soothed to quiet this world of strife,
And brought ye the calm that ye loved of yore?
Hath not the voice of a brother said,
In tender speech than in life ye knew;
In tones that were not the voice of the dead,
'I'm waiting! I'm waiting, my loved ones of yore?"

The beast may perish, and if man might fall,
And spite of promise the soul might die,
Yet have I heard the loved ones call,

And have seen their shades as they flitted by,
And know that they live, for we wait for we;
And I know that they harbour not with ill;
What matter, what creeds or dogmas show?
We judge by the acts of the Maker's will.
Doth Nature tire in her ceaseless round?
Do the seasons forget to come?
Does the water refuse to nourish the ground
E'er it rolls to its ocean home?

And shall the Maker and soul of all,
The keeper, since time began,
The eye that hath marked the sparrow's fall
Be blind to the fall of man?
The eye hath seen and the ear hath heard,
And every sense doth in truth attest,
That the heart of the human hath not erred
As it fixed its faith in a living rest.

No longer I dream that they are afar;
Of the ghostly robes and that city of gold,
For I see of myself that the gates are ajar,
And the weird hereafter's a tale that is told.

My babe is asleep in the Campac's shade,
Mid song of birds and odor of flowers;
On a pillow of light my cherub is laid,
For an endless circle of golden hours.

The Orthod-ox Team.

BY FRED EMMERSON BROOKS.

Hull on, stranger! Turn out yonder close to the wall!
For the road's rather narrow and I've got it all!
Whoa, back, how there, old Baptist! Whoa, Methodist, whoa!

These are oxen that need all the road, you know.
Yes, I drive: without swearin', though strange it may seem,
For I'm drivin', good stranger, my orthod-ox team!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"That Episcopal ox is of excellent breed.
He's more noted for style than he is for his speed.
Though of delicate structure, this ox will not shirk,
But he never was known sirt, to sweat at his work.
He's a good, pi us ox, never losin' his way,
For he reads all the signboards and goes not astray!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"There's the good Baptist ox; he's hard shell to the bone;
Close communion in diet—he eats all alone!
Shake's his head when it's raining and closes his eyes;
He hates to be sprinkled, though it comes from the skies!
Why, he won't cross a bridge unless dragged by the team!
He'll go nowhere, I sware, but down into the stream!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Presbyterian, gee! Cong egational, haw!
They're good stock, let me tell you, and know how to draw!
They're so perfectly matched, sir, that very few folk
Can tell 'em apart when they're out of the yoke!
But you see a slight difference when it is shown
One leans on his elders and one stands alone!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"There's an ox I term Israel, eldest of all;
Once he grazed in the garden before Adam's fall.
He went into the ark at the time of the flood,
And when Pharaoh starved he was sewin' his cud!
There's an ancestry, sir, full of glory, no doubt,
But for goring the Master they're scattered about!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"I've an ox over there who tends strictly to 'biz'!
He's the Catholic ox: what a monster he is!
And he keeps growin' big, while he keeps growin' old!
And he never lets go where he once gets a hold!
He's a strong one, you bet, 'tho' I never yet spoke
But he started right off, with his neck in the yoke!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"There's the old Methodist, one of the best on the road!
You'd suppose, by the fuss, he alone dragged the load!
How he pulls when I sing hallelujah and shout;
But the worst of it, he keeps changin' about!
He was bough't on probation and works like a top;
But I've had him three years, and suppose I must swap!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"That suave Universalist man admire
Think's the devil's a myth with his great prairie fire!
There's an Adventist claimin' to have second sight;
If he keeps on a guessin' he'll guess the thing right!
And the Seventh Day Baptist—their numbers are such
If they do break the Sabbath they don't break it much!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Got a Spiritist? Yes, sir; I bought one by chance;
When it comes to hard work he goes off in a trance!
Nothin' practical, sir, in a medium ox
When you have to keep proddin' with rappin's and knocks!
But I must keep movin' and ploddin' along
With my Orthod-ox team, or the world will go wrong!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

"Take the road that I came, and beware of short cuts!
You will not lose the way if you follow the rut.
I am sorry to force you, my friend, to turn out,
But this is the regular lumberman's route!
On the road of life, stranger, my right is supreme,
All the world of must turn out for my Orthod-ox team!"
Said the lumberman of Calaveras.

They Differ

In make up. Most baking powders contain ammonia or alum. Cleveland's does not; not a particle.

In strength: A rounded spoonful of Cleveland's does better work than a heaping spoonful of any other.

In results: Cake made with Cleveland's is fine grained and keeps fresh.

Cleveland's Baking Powder is the best in every way.

Good to Eat.

A ham should be put on to boil in cold water and boil, after the water comes to boiling point, fifteen minutes to each pound; the water really should not boil after the first bubble, but the ham should simmer gently during this time; it is best then to remove the kettle from the stove, then remove the lid over the kettle and allow the ham to cool in the liquor in which it was boiled. Tongue should be cooked in precisely the same way, allowing twenty minutes to each pound.

Whipped Cream.

This is a luxury that not all can indulge in, but it is so simple, so easily prepared and such an addition to so many simple desserts, that if it is available it can transform a very plain cake or common dessert into something nice. The thicker the cream is, (and still perfectly sweet) the better. In hot weather, be careful in skimming not to take up any milk. In cold weather, if cream is scarce, I sometimes allow a little milk, as it will then beat in and make a larger quantity. Good thick cream will beat up and make nearly or quite double the original quantity. I often beat it for oatmeal or other breakfast mushes from a point of economy, it goes so much farther and seems so much nicer. The whipping is done with an egg beater. Do not remove the froth as it rises. Whip all together till the whole mass is thick, and it is done. Flavor and sweeten if desired. Served with sponge cake it makes a dainty dessert, and it makes a dish of fresh berries or fruit doubly delicious, while those who are averse to oat meal, cracked wheat, etc., can learn to relish them if served with the addition of whipped cream. Stuffed Apples.

Select large smooth apples; pare them, cut out the cores, but do not make the hole run entirely through the apples. Take some cold cooked chicken and chop it fine; to each half pound allow a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, a half teaspoonful of salt, a little pepper and a half cup of bread crumbs; mix thoroughly and fill the apples. Put a bit of butter on each, and bake in a quick oven for about thirty minutes, or until the apples are perfectly tender; serve this with roasted pork or duck.

Stewed Celery.

Six heads celery, one-half pint white stock, three tablespoonfuls of cream, butter and flour, one blade of mace, pepper and salt. Wash the celery, strip off the outer leaves and cut it into lengths of two inches; put these into a stew pan with the stock broth and stew till tender for about twenty-five minutes; then add the cream, mace, pepper and salt and a little butter and flour; simmer for five minutes; pour into a dish and serve.

Beefsteak Pate.

Chop one pound of best round steak till it is a soft pulp. Season highly with salt and pepper. Add a little of the tender fat also chopped fine. Mix two beaten eggs with one cup of milk. Pour this slowly into one cup of flour mixed with one teaspoon of baking powder. When well mixed, stir it thoroughly into the meat. Bake in a moderate oven about an hour.

School and College.

Brown.

College reopened after the Thanksgiving recess on Monday. By Tuesday morning almost all had returned from an enjoyable reunion with friends and relatives; from personal experience the writer can vouch for the kind hospitality of Worcester friends with whom a most enjoyable time was spent.

The event of the week and of the season was the gymnasium ball. This occurred on Wednesday evening and proved a most enjoyable and successful affair. The floor of the new gymnasium had been put in excellent order and no pains were spared to overcome the inconveniences of a new floor. Floral decorations were abundant and an excellent supper was furnished. The proceeds from the sale of tickets is to help defray the expense of equipping the new gymnasium. Owing to the size of the floor and the limited number of tickets the usual crush was happily avoided. The opening ball was an entire success and it is to be hoped that a Gymnasium ball may become an annual event at Brown.

On Wednesday morning no little surprise was evinced at the appearance of a four page paper with the title "Brown Daily Herald." When it is remembered that three periodicals are now supported by the college and one of the three is a weekly it seems a daring step to enter upon a daily in a comparatively small college. Our little friend promises well and if given sufficient room and air may live, with unstinted support and careful management we may see the Herald become a factor in Brown life; at least, we may hope. Some have a fear that the upstart may encroach upon the field occupied by the Brunonian, in such case the Herald should not be supported since one good paper with news in its columns is a vast deal better than two poor periodicals.

The Republican Club held its first regular meeting on Tuesday evening; at this meeting it was voted to accept the invitation to join the Republican State League of Rhode Island. A well prepared paper was read on "Free coinage of silver."

The first of the free public lectures given by the Brown University Lecture Association was delivered Monday evening by Prof. A. D. F. Hamlin of the Columbia School of Mines, subject, "The Divine Wisdom and Byzantine Architecture." Thursday evening Prof. Hamlin delivered his second lecture in the course, subject "Cathedrals of Ancient and Mediaeval Styles." Both of these lectures were highly interesting and were made doubly so by the excellent views illustrating the subjects.

Invitations are out for the wedding of Arthur H. Colby '91, and Miss Marie Burt, both of Orange, N. J. It will be remembered that Mr. Colby was the composer of the charming "Marie Valse" and the liberal contributor of music to the Brown Song Book of which he was an editor.

Mr. Everett Kimball of this city intends to spend a few days with friends in South Slater Hall.

Boston University.

The Historical Register of Boston University 1869-1891 is the name of the first general catalogue of the University, which is published this week. The first few pages are devoted to "Chronological Notes" which beginning with A. D. 1, come down to the founding of the University in 1869. The corporation, the council, and the senate which includes all the officers of instruction with dates of beginning of service occupy the first forty pages of the book. The Convocation, which includes all who have graduated from the several departments, occupies the next fifty pages of the Register. The rest of the book consists of an Index of Graduates. The following figures are taken from the numerical summaries: Whole number of graduates 2,407, of which only 100 have been reported as deceased. Among the degrees given there have been as follows: L.L. B., 820; M. D., 534; A. B., 333; S. T. B., 257. In 1871 there were but eight graduates. Each year there has been a marked increase until in 1891 there were 180 degrees conferred. The Register was compiled by Waldron H. Rand the registrar.

The Alpha Chapter of Delta Delta Delta published this week volume one, number one, of the Trident. This is a quarterly magazine of thirty-six pages devoted to the interests of their sisterhood. Miss Emily F. Allen, '90, is editor-in-chief and Miss C. Grace Ayres and Miss Charlotte E. Joslin are the business managers.

John Westley Spencer who graduated last year being appointed alternate commencement speaker, died Nov. 28th, at Northfield, Vt., where he was Principal of the High and Graded Schools. This is the first death in the class of '91 since they entered in the Fall of 1887.

Wellesley.

Nov. 21, a reception was given by Prof. Bates to Miss Hodgkins, for many years professor of literature here. The seniors, the Shakespeare Society, and many of Miss Hodgkin's friends among the Faculty and students, were invited to meet her.

Mrs. Bainbridge, Superintendent of City Mission work in New York, addressed the college Sunday evening, Nov. 22. Her account of the opportunities, trials, and successes of a city missionary was most inspiring. At the close of her address Miss Balgarnie, of London, spoke of her work among the lowest classes in that city, and told us somewhat of her visits to the large cities of this country, where she has been studying methods of work, especially that of the police matron.

Monday evening, Nov. 23, Mrs. Leavitt World Organizer of the W. C. T. U. work, gave a lecture upon the "Crimes of Christian Nations in Heathen Lands" as she has seen them in her eight years' journey around the world.

The Earl and Countess of Aberdeen, with little Lady Majorie, paid the college a second visit, Tuesday afternoon. Lord Aberdeen addressed the students upon the "Social Side of the Irish Question." He is an ardent Gladstonian and is very confident that Ireland will have Home Rule in the near future. Lady Aberdeen is a charming speaker, and was most closely listened to, as she told of the effort that is being made to establish lace and other industries in Ireland. She has been in Chicago, making arrangements for an Irish exhibit at the Exposition. At the request of Miss Balgarnie, she gave a short sketch of the work being done by the ladies of the Liberal party in England and Scotland, under the leadership of their President, Mrs. Gladstone. Lord and Lady Aberdeen quite won the hearts of the Wellesley students, by their enthusiastic statement that the three things which had impressed them most in this country were Wellesley College, Mr. Moody's work at Northfield, and the Bishop of Massachusetts, Phillips Brooks.

Holy Cross.

The class of Philosophy will hold their annual Christmas disputation on Wednesday morning, Dec. 23. J. P. Gorham of Lynn will defend and D. L. Gleason of Windsor Locks, Conn., and E. D. Morrow of Lynn will object. J. A. Riordan of Worcester will deliver a Latin essay and S. A. Jennings of Boston, an English essay.

On Tuesday evening, Dec. 22, the Dramatic Club will present "The Celebrated Case."

Many of the boys enjoyed the Thanksgiving recess at home.

The day scholars with purple as their color have adopted a purple tie.

The study of Metaphysics has been commenced by the Senior class.

Senator Hoar has departed for his Winter stay in Washington.

Last Friday evening, forty members of Independence Lodge Good Templers, visited Rising Sun Lodge of Millbury.

Dr. A. W. Eldred is finding his duties in the Harvard Dental School very pleasant.

Thomas B. Shaw, W. H. S., '86, Yale College '90 and now in the college of Physicians and Surgeons, New York City, was in the city last week.

Edwin S. Phelps, a recent "Tech" graduate who has been visiting in Washington, has reached home again.

Miss Mary Frost and Miss Ethel Devin, of Dover, N. H., were the guests of Miss Mabel Moore during the Thanksgiving recess.

Miss Jennie Lockwood of Cleveland, Ohio, was the guest of Miss Evelyn Wyman during the Thanksgiving recess.

The Misses Hopkins daughters of Col. W. S. B. Hopkins, entertained a party of friends at their home, 12 Linden Street, last Saturday evening. Dancing was the principal feature of the evening.

Hon. Joseph H. Walker with his accustomed generosity has given $100 to the N. H. Music Teachers Association to further the interests of the Association.

James A. McTiernan, for many years with the Merchant's and Farmer's Insurance Company and later with Darling Bros., has entered the employ of J. D. Long, the furniture dealer, as salesman.

The dangers of the ice were clearly brought forth in the death of the two little fellows on Harris Pond last Wednesday. Too much precaution cannot be taken in this direction.

The Christmas number of our Fashion Journal is here. No charge for it.

Here's more Cloak news for every woman and child that desires an outside garment. The need for reducing the stock is imperative. Never mind what the need is now. We'll tell you that a little later. Suffice it to say, that the price reductions which we have made on everything in the department for the past two weeks will be continued by still greater reductions this week. It takes a big slice off the profits to do this—sometimes ALL the profit, and sometimes MORE than the profit, but the stock has got to go, so never mind the profit. If you want anything in the Cloak room, now is the time to get it. You save this week from 20 to 33 per cent.

A Tasteful Hanging Pincushion.

BY E. LAING

A long bag, one inch and a half wide, stuffed with sawdust and covered on each side with a different shade of ribbon, tied at the top with narrow ribbon and a loop left to hang it up by. The pins can be stuck in all over it, or only in a row up each side. And down the center of each ribbon a design or verse may run.

A similar cushion for parlor use is made of a bag eight inches long and three inches wide, inserting a Japanese doll's head at top of bag, overseaming the edges across the shoulders. Openings for the hands to extend horizontally are left at the sides. A sash and girdle of half inch ribbon shape the doll, which is suspended from the bag by a loop at the back of the same ribbon.—Ladies' Home Journal.

A Knitted Ankle.

Materials: Brown Germantown wool, 1 ounce of white Shetland wool, knitting needles No. 12 and No. 8. Four or two needles may be used. If two needles are used there will be a seam to sew up; while with four needles you simply knit round and round. With the brown wool and No. 12 needles, cast up 64 stitches and knit 1 plain and 1 seam for 80 rounds, then bind off loosely. Sew the lining to the outside on upper and lower edges and finish off both edges with a brown scallop.—Ladies' Home Journal.

One week ago last night, friends of Miss Edith Bennett of 45 Kingsbury Street surprised her by the presentation of a gold watch and chain.

Miss Wyman of Lincoln Street entertained her college friends at a luncheon Friday noon. Among those present were Misses Lockwood, Frost, Devin, Lewis, Anna Taft, Katharine Taft, Mabel Moore. All of these young ladies are of the Class of '94, Smith College.

The class of '90, Worcester High School, held a very enjoyable reunion Monday evening in Colonial Hall, which was very largely attended by the members of the class and their friends. Dancing, for which Marcy's orchestra furnished music, and cards were among the pleasures of the evening. The chaperones were Mrs. E. H. Stark and Miss Mary Jiltson. The affair was arranged by Charles C. Milton, president of the class, Wells H. Ellinwood and other members of the executive committee. Rebboli was the caterer. Among those present were Misses Lizette M. Draper, Mary F. Goodwin, Alice Day, Alice Norcross, Sadie E. Linnell, Helen Banfield, Lottie M. Hubbard, Mollie Day, Annie M. Lawrence, Effie Draper, Florence Churchill, Gertrude Smith, Addie Hubbard and Florence Hendricks, W. C. Mellish, Walter H. Fuller, George Lackey, Eugene Whipple, Arthur E. Richardson, Wells H. Ellinwood, Charles C. Milton, Edward W. Kinsley, Albert C. Clark, Louis C. Chase, Roland Howard, Walter S. Bliss, R. H. Hammond, W. H. Burleigh, Fred Morse, Stanley C. Brennan, Will Goodwin, Charles Baker, Jr., Mr. Jenkins and others.

Nineteen days for preparation.

Then Christmas.

Have you the very best idea of all that you must do within these nineteen days?

Up to this moment you have thought about it in a sort of a vague way.

You intend to do something, you will do something but you fancy there is plenty of time.

Nineteen days for work.

Hadn't you better begin to day.

The Handkerchief section shows the first decoration of the season.

Right by it a gentleman from Constantinople has a charming display of Turkish goods.

There are Mats and Tides.

Table Covers and Easel Scarfs.

There are Lambrequins.

The embroidering is in many colored Silks upon grounds of Satin, Silk, Velvet and Cotton.

The embroidering is all done by hand.

The contrasts are effective, and the articles are well worth your attention.

Think of it.

Nobody looked for the pretty India Silks for a couple of months yet.

But Fashion demands them for evening dress and they are here.

An entirely new line of them will be on the counters this morning.

They are in white grounds with 5 beautiful color prints apparent; pink, cream, light blue, yellow and Nile.

Vines, tracery, flowers are what the designer's fancy revelled in, and reproduced to perfection.

For evening dress or tea gowns, they are exquisite.

FUR CAPES will be sold at lower prices than ever before in the history of this popular garment.

RICHARD HEALY.

New York Fashions.

Styles in Fur: Theater and Opera Wraps: Full Dress Costumes.

Long coats of seal fur though shown and purchased, are not in such favor as hitherto, because of the great popularity of demi-long garments, whether loose or tight fitting. Not only does greater style, in general, attach to the two latter, but they afford an equally elegant covering at less cost, having the advantage moreover of less weight. The run upon them therefore is extraordinary and it is hard to say of capes or coats, which are the more freely bought. Capes show high shoulders and sleeves are invariably high and full at the top. Jaunty coats especially suitable to young ladies, though not unsuitable to older women of slender figure, run from about twenty-eight to thirty-two inches in length and tight fitting at the back, show fronts either tight, loose or opening over a vest of contrasting fur. Seal is the first choice for fitted garments, but Astrakhan, gray krimmer or Persian lamb afford a change at less cost and frequently some one of the latter appear as finishings on seal. Extremely elegant, but expensive demi-long capes are of sable.

Shoulder Capes

however, hold their own, not only because obtainable by many who cannot afford a longer garment, but because of convenience and in accordance with present ideas of increased length, they come well down to the waist, comfortable ones having a close vest with sleeves so as to afford complete protection to the arms. The English top coat, thirty-six inches long with extra high shoulders and storm collar and made in best quality seal skin, is a most elegant garment, though closely rivalled by a jacket running from twenty-eight to thirty-two inches long, also with extra raised shoulders and high storm collar. In opposite character comes an exceedingly handsome wrap from thirty to thirty-two inches deep. This is made in either seal or mink and the three being noticeable at Lord & Taylor's, will lead among fashionable purchasers. For and particularly for balls and the Opera, come Siberian circulars that are made full, completely enveloping the figure and lined with squirrel fur. Fine camel's hair, Bengaline de soie or brocade are the favorite fabrics and finish is often given by embroidery, braiding or elegant passementerie. Jaunty little theater capes and jackets are of velvet lined with light contrasting silk which those who follow out details carefully, take care shall match a color in the hat. Brilliant orange is particularly effective for this purpose.

MME. MAY.

"I use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral freely in my practice, and recommend it in cases of whooping cough among children, having found it more certain to cure that troublesome disease than any other medicine I know of."—So says Dr. Bartlett of Concord, Mass.

If you devote all your time to study you will avoid all the irksomeness of life, nor will you long for the approach of night, being tired of the day; nor will you be a burden to yourself nor your society insupportable to others.—Seneca.

Note what is said of the Trial in other cities:

Lawrence.

"One of the most enjoyable entertainments ever known in this city. * * * There was a lot of fun."

Brockton.

"A decided success. It drew an audience that filled the house and consequently drew a handsome sum into the treasury of the post, and it proved to be a really witty travesty on Justice as she is administered."

Haverhill.

"City Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity. * * * Hundreds stood up, unable to obtain a resting place. * * * It was one of the wittiest, most pleasing and altogether enjoyable entertainments ever held in this city."

Lynn.

"The mock trial was quaint conception, very cleverly carried out. * * * It was one of the jolliest shows that the Lynn theatre has seen, and the spectators left the house loud in praise of the projectors and actors in the novel drama."

CHURCH CHOIRS.

The second in the series of Christmas song services will be given at Central Church tomorrow evening at 7 o'clock. The subject will be "Christ the Light" and the following program will be given: Organ prelude, B. B. B. "Send out thy Light!" Gounod; chant—"Arise, Shine!" Farrant; "The Lord is my light," Hiles; duet—"Light of life," Lassen; "Light of the world," Hatton; solo—"Callst thou thus, O master," Smart; "The sun shall be no more thy light," Woodward; postlude—Fugue in G minor, Bach.

Y. P. S. C. E.

Worcester is the second city in the state to have a Junior Endeavor local union, one being organized two weeks ago and the first meeting being held last week. The officers are: President, Miss Mary O. Whitmore, superintendent of the Salem Street society; vice-presidents, Miss Nellie Jerome of Summer Street Church, Edward L. Smith of the Old South Church and the superintendent of the Dewey Street Church; secretary, Miss Lilla C. Fletcher of the Pilgrim society; treasurer, Benjamin H. Robbins of the Old South Church. There are five members, the Pilgrim, Summer Street, Old South, Salem Street and Dewey Street.

The Endeavor Society of Plymouth Church has elected officers for the next six months as follows: President, Dr. J. K. Warren; vice-president, Dr. Frank H. Howland; corresponding secretary, Miss Emily K. Mellen; recording secretary, Miss Florence Goddard; treasurer, Miss Edith M. Gates; chairmen of committees—Lookout, H. E. Austin; prayer meeting, F. C. Gamwell; good literature, Miss Emily K. Mellen; missionary, Miss Putnam; music, Miss Winifred Marsh; social, Miss Emily Whittemore; hotel, Fred W. Chase. The society voted to contribute $10 towards the support of the Lake View Church and $5 to the No License fund.

CONGREGATIONAL.

The annual meeting of the Congregational City Missionary Society was held Monday evening in the Young Men's Christian Association building. The reports showed that the society was in a prosperous condition, the report of the treasurer, Arthur E. Gray, stating that the expenditures during the year have been $3535.16 and that the balance in the treasury is $78.74. Officers were elected as follows: President, A. M. Stone; vice-president, L. P. Goddard; secretary, Elmer G. Tucker; treasurer, A. E. Gray; auditor, Thomas Hamilton; directors—Old South, Rev. Dr. A. Z. Conrad, H. H. Merriam, Geo. H. Pierce; Central—Rev. Dr. Daniel Merriam, Albert F. Smith, John C. Woodbury, Union, Rev. Dr. W. V. W. Davis, P. W. Moen, George L. Newton; Salem-street, Rev. I. J. Lansing, Ezra Sawyer, E. Tucker, Jr.; Summer Street, Rev. W. T. Sleeper; Plymouth, Rev. Dr. Archibald McCullagh, S. A.

Pratt, J. H. Bancroft, H. F. Leland; Piedmont, Rev. Dr. D. O. Mears, H. B. Lincoln, A. G. Estrabrook; Pilgrim, Rev. C. M., Southgate, William H. Larkin; Church of the Covenant, Rev. J. E. Hurlbut, H. L. Scribner; Park, Rev. I. L. Wilcox, John A. Sherman; Belmont, Rev. Albert Bryant, E. A. Colton; Hope, Rev. E. W. Phillips, Loring Foskitt, Rev. W. T. Sleeper was re-elected superintendent and it was voted that Sunday December 20 be made a city missionary Sunday in all the Congregational churches.

Rev. Henry Dike Sleeper, who was ordained as a Congregational clergyman last week Tuesday in Salem Street Church, will leave Worcester early in January for Beloit College in Beloit, Wisconsin, where he will be instructor in sacred music. Rev. E. D. Eaton, president of the college, was present at the ordination and took part in the program, giving the charge to the young minister.

Last week Friday evening the Pansy Club and Little Gleaners of the new Bethany Church at New Worcester held a sale and entertainment in the Old Men's Home, 49 Leicester Street.

Rev. John K. Thompson is occupying the pulpit of the Lake View church.

Disciples of Christ.

The Church of Christ Sunday School has elected officers for next year as follows:

Superintendent, J. E. Snyder; assistant A. G. Buttrick; secretary, C. E. Burnham; treasurer, Harry Chambers; librarian, R. L. S. Whittemore; assistant librarian, Guilford Blaisdell.

METHODIST.

Rev. W. T. Worth will preach Sunday evening on the Public Schools vs. Parochial Schools. This repetition of a sermon given some weeks ago is made at the request of several organizations which desire to attend.

UNIVERSALIST.

A "Bazaar of Nations" will be held in the First Universalist Church next Wednesday and Thursday evenings and Wednesday afternoon. Booths will be arranged to represent the different nations and the young lady attendants will be suitably costumed to accord with the nationality of the booth which they attend. Wednesday afternoon the operetta, "The Strange Visitors" will be presented. Wednesday evening the operetta, "The Seven Old Ladies from London Town" and Thursday evening the farce, "Thirty Minutes for Refreshments" will be played.

Deaths.

Mrs. Myra Wheeler.

Mrs. Myra (Ware) Wheeler, wife of Jennison Wheeler died, Saturday the 28th of November, of bronchitis, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. H. W. Pond, on Burncoat Street. Mrs. Wheeler was born at Barre Falls, the daughter of Otis Ward March 27, 1823, but resided in Hubbardston with her husband till 1872 when they removed to Worcester, living for many years at 33 Shelly Street in the same house with their daughter. While in Hubbardston Mrs. Wheeler joined the Methodist Episcopal Church and on coming to this city became connected with Laurel Street Church, but was later transferred to Grace. Here she was one of the foremost members and workers. In her church life, she was a member of W. A. Smith's class and was an excellent example of the devoted, Christian woman. Her going hence will be felt, not alone in the immediate home circle but also in the wider range of social and religious influence where her presence was ever felt. She had four children, three of whom are married and now live in this city; Harry the youngest died in 1867 at the age of four years. Her husband survives, and will reside with his daughter Mrs. H. W. Pond, on Burncoat Street. The other daughters are Mrs. A. M. Thompson and Mrs. F. A. Bean.

Mrs. Wheeler caught a cold at Sterling last August, which terminated in bronchial asthma. Prayers were offered at her home on Burncoat Street at 9.30 on Monday, after which the body was carried to Hubbardston where the funeral was held at 1 o'clock. Rev. Wm. Ferguson, pastor of the Methodist church there, conducted the services, and the church choir furnished music, singing "God is Love," and "Asleep in Jesus."

William A. Houghton.

This gentleman was formerly well known in our midst following the calling of a printer, but latterly he has worked in New York. He came home for Thanksgiving at the home of his father, Mr. Alba Houghton, No. 66 Elm Street. There he was attacked with diphtheria, and growing rapidly worse died, Monday morning. The nature of the disease would not admit of delay, so the burial was in the afternoon of that day, in Rural Cemetery, the Rev. A. S. Garver officiating. The deceased was thirty-five years old.

Mrs. Farrington.

In Chattanooga, Tenn., one week ago Friday night, Mrs. George W. Farrington died. She was a daughter of Warren C. Keyes and a sister of Mrs. Webster Thayer. Formerly, she was well known in this city, making, with her sister and brothers, the Keyes Quartet. Her husband was formerly a book keeper at the Knowles Loom Works.

The funeral was held at No. 17 Oak Street, the home of Webster Thayer, Esq., at 2 p.m. Tuesday, Revs. A. S. Garver and G. A. Fuller officiating. Music was furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Simester, Mrs. Charles A. Merrill and James Little. The pall bearers were Charles H. Hammond, Edward E. Johnson, Charles H. Howe and Charles Keith.

Among the floral tributes were a "Gates Ajar," from Mr. and Mrs. Webster Thayer; a large harp, from Charles E. Keyes and Herbert W. Keyes, of Fitchburg, brothers of Mrs. Farrington, and numerous bouquets from friends.

The interment took place at Hope Cemetery.

Mrs. Charles Hamilton.

Last Sunday morning at her home, 10 Cottage Street, this estimable lady entered into rest after a long illness. She has not been well for some years, having been a sufferer from stomach difficulties which finally resulted in death. She was born in Readfield, Me., Sept. 30, 1830, her maiden name being Jane Ingham. Her early years were spent in Bath, Me., where she was married to Mr. Hamilton about forty years since. Mr. Hamilton has been for many years one of the foremost printers in the city. Their children are F. Walter a member of the first class at the Polytechnic, '71, and Harry W., both associated with Mr. Hamilton in his business. She also leaves two sisters, Mrs. Mary J. Stevens of East Brookfield, and S. Annie, who has long been an inmate of the Hamilton family.

The funeral was held Tuesday, at 1.30 p.m. at Cottage Street, Dr. Almon Gunnison conducting the services, the burial being in Hope Cemetery. A quartet consisting of W. F. Little, C. J. Merriam, Mrs. J. W. Mitchell and Mrs. W. H. Merriam, sang "Come Unto Me," "O, Paradise" and "Abide with Me."

Naomi Lodge, Daughters of Rebekah, of which Mrs. Hamilton was a member, was represented by twenty-five members. Many and beautiful floral tributes were sent, including a mound from Naomi Lodge; wreath, Mrs. George Mattoon; wreath, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Dodge, flowers, Miss Florence M. Dodge, Messrs. H. and E. Wesley, Mrs. M. E. Gorham, Mrs. Henry Irving Osborne, Master Jamie Osborne (5 years old), Mrs. Cora Foster, Mrs. Alice Hammond, Miss Ella McFarland, Mrs. Carrie Thurston, Mrs. Ernest H. Vaughan, Mrs. Charles A. Merrill, Miss Lottie S. Hamilton, Mrs. Loraine A. Hamilton. The bearers were J. W. Stockwell, C. G. Parker, George L. Bliss and Samuel Wesson. Mrs. Hamilton was an admirable woman, the light of her home and, through a wide range of acquaintances and associations, she will long be missed. Her husband and surviving relatives have the sincere sympathy of the community.

Miss Grace Hamilton of this city appeared in "Si Slocum" at Lothrop's Opera House in Boston last Monday night and won an unquestioned success. She will appear in Worcester, Dec. 14.

Miss Mabel West of this city was one of the bridesmaids at the marriage of Miss Nina Fiske to George N. Prouty, at Ashland, Wednesday evening.

CROCKERY DEPARTMENT.

A Complete Line of Lamps.

It means with us not only every sort of a lamp known, but infinite variety of form and color of each sort.

We have exercised more than usual care in their selection as their are few manufacturers worthy the name, whose best productions are not fully represented.

In no branch of our business have the changes been more decided, and the march of improvement more rapid for the past year than in the department of lamps.

With this betterment, comes a welcome reduction in prices.

If you have had no occasion to make inquiry for awhile, you will marvel at the quotations. Taken all together, we do not believe this "COMPLETE LINE" was ever equalled in point of number, variety and price. We are sure they meet all requirements.—If you haven't any idea of buying, look in and see how a full line of lamps should look, and wonder how they can be sold so cheaply.

Household.

The following is a recipe for cologne, which is said to be very good: To one-half gallon of alcohol put six drams each of oil of lavender, oil of bergamot and essence of lemon, two drams of oil of rosemary and twelve drops of oil of cinnamon.

It is said that by putting old rubber rings of cans into weak ammonia water they will again become elastic.

Scorch stains on white cloth, which are the work of a careless ironer, may be removed, it is said, by soaking the cloth in lukewarm water, squeezing lemon juice on it and sprinkling a little salt over it, and laying it in the hot sun to bleach.

Painting the kitchen walls enables one to wash them off, and in general tends to a neat appearance. The paint should be good oil paint, applied as for outdoor work, first sizing the surface to be coated with a solution of one-half pound of glue to a gallon of water.

By adding a teaspoonful of pulverized alum to half a package of good stove-polish, wet up with a little water, much time and labor will be saved. A stove polished with this mixture will remain bright a long time, and it requires very little labor to produce a shine. It should be applied when the stove is nearly cold.

California. E. M. L.

Save all the paper bags They are most convenient to draw over cans of fruit to shut out the light; the hand can also be slipped into one when cleaning the stove, as well as in doing much other household work which is hard on the hands.

Liniment for painful joints.—Take of soap liniment, six fluid drachms; tincture of aconite, ten fluid drachms. Mix. To be rubbed upon the joints at bedtime.

A teaspoonful of salt dissolved in one-half glassful of water is excellent to allay nausea in sick headaches.

All advice to the contrary, the best brush to use is the one that suits your teeth; usually too large a brush is chosen and the corners of the mouth are hurt.

If the gums, as frequently happens after illness, become very sore a gargle of myrrh in a little water is to be commended, and as this has a good wholesome odor one need not mind using it.

Webster's Pupil.

John B. Stevens, Sr., died two weeks ago at Dover, N. H., aged 94. In his boyhood he attended the school taught by Daniel Webster, in Cornish, Me., and was undoubtedly the last surviving pupil of Mr. Webster's.

Who would be a King?

Osman Pasha, the hero of Plevna, has been located as sealer in the kitchen of the Sultan of Turkey. His peculiar business is to seal all the dishes for the Sultan's table as soon as they are prepared, and thus secure against poison. They are carried into the royal dining room, and the seals broken only in the Sultan's presence.

The second juvenile member of Dr. Wm. T. Souther's family came Thanksgiving Day, in the person of a bouncing girl baby. The north end is a flourishing locality.

Curious Corner.

Darwin used to go into the Zoological Gardens in London, and, standing by the glass case containing the cobra di capello, put his forehead against the glass while the cobra struck out at him. The glass was between them; Darwin's mind was perfectly convinced as to the inability of the snake to harm him; yet he would always dodge. Time after time he tried it, his will and reason keeping him there, his instinct making him dodge. The instinct was stronger than both will and reason.

The Society of California Pioneers are the owners of a wonderful curiosity. It is a section of timber taken from the side of the ship Powhatan. It includes a portion of the "skin," which is four inches thick, and a piece of abutting knee, which is nine inches thick; transversely through the whole of this a sword-fish has dashed his sword, and the portion broken off is still embedded in the timber. The sword pierced through thirteen inches of this solid oak, and the fish was going in the same direction as the vessel at that, the ship being under a good head of steam at the time. An idea of the strength which must have been exerted can be obtained from the fact that a rifled six pounder could not have done more than pierce that thickness of solid oak.

Mr. Andrew Walker of Kennebunk, Me. who is in the eighty-third year of his age, sends the following very interesting communication to the secretary of the Bostonian Society:

"I am probably the last person living who has talked with the man who took an active part in the famous "Boston Tea Party" of 1773. His part was not on the patriotic side. In 1834 I boarded with a man in this town by the name of Mitchell. His father, Jotham Mitchell, lived with him. The old man told me that at the Revolution he was employed on a coasting vessel between Kennebunk and Boston, and happened to be in Boston on the evening of Dec. 16, 1775, when a company of men disguised as Indians, went on board three tea ships which lay at one of the wharves, and taking out the chests, emptied the tea into the water.

"The old man said, 'It was too bad to see so much good tea thrown overboard, so I thought I would save a little. Taking a boat, I went to the side of one of the ships where men were throwing the tea into the water, and tried to save some in the boat; but the scoundrels saw me and tried to drown—yes, the great scoundrels tried to drown me, and I was glad to get back to the coaster again alive.' Jotham Mitchell died in 1840, aged ninety-five years."

Every grade of fortune can be seen in close proximity in a large city. On Fifth Avenue close to Fifth Street, the Vanderbilt mansions occupy one block, which is the one extreme, i. e., opulence. On the opposite frontage is an orphan asylum, and this latter represents a monument of indigence, or the other extreme.

Miss Alice E. Brownell and sister Miss Ida Brownell of Royalton, Vt., are visiting friends in this city, stopping with their uncle, L. H. Royce. 4 Lowell Street.

THE QUESTION OF COST IS IMPORTANT TO YOU.

LET'S MEET IT FAIR.

A good workman deserves a fair compensation for his services.

Anything short of fair compensation for faithful and valuable service would be almost a crime.

The careless and shiftless workman ought not to get the same compensation for his inferior service. To give it to him would be almost a crime.

Fair prices paid a skillful workman for honest service means actual value in goods over and above what can be found in the work of the poorer workmen.

A house well built upon solid foundations, by honest men, paid honest prices, will last years longer than one built in the opposite way.

◀ A SUIT OF CLOTHES made from genuine Cloths:—

Made by good tailors:—

Made by men paid to do their best work, and from whom nothing less will be accepted, are the only kind that you can afford to buy.

These Clothes may cost you at first a dollar or two more than the kinds ground out by the carload.

But in the end, when you count up the number of month's service:—

When you take into account the immense difference in the appearance of the two sorts after a few months' service.

Then you'll agree with us that

OUR PERFECT CLOTHES,

AT OUR FAIR PRICES,

ARE BETTER FOR YOU,

ACTUALLY COST YOU LESS,

Than any other kinds made in anyway less certain and sure than ours.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1891.

No. 15

Were a star quenched on high,
For ages would its light
Still travelling downward from the sky
Shine on our mortal sight.

So, when a great man dies,
For years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

—Longfellow.

The foregoing words might apply to the late Dom Pedro, Ex-Emperor of Brazil.

As kings and potentates go, there was no one better than the white-haired ruler; but the time and the place were not favorable to kings, and he had to step down and out.

That famous Boabdil, Grenada's last Moorish king felt no more sorrow in his immortal sigh, looking back at his Alhambra, than did the Brazilian Emperor who in November, 1889, went out from his native land into what proved to be final banishment.

As the chief man in a republic, he could have had few superiors. His picture is one of the few that look down upon the poet Whittier in his Danvers home. It was his misfortune to be born a king. For this reason he died an exile in Paris, afar from his western home. The days of kingly rule are nearly over.

The contest against the Drink Traffic is progressing, though mildly. Each Sunday, pulpit and platform resound with denunciations of the curse and every few days its portentous array of arrests appears in the Telegram. It seems very queer that this compilation is not printed in the other papers as well. Had the vote been taken the day after Ex-Alderman Sawyer's assault last Summer, the "Nos" would have it by a big majority. As it is, we shall see.

The New York Times has put its price back to three cents a copy. This is a good indication. When, following the suit of the Herald and the World, it dropped its price, many said, "Better put the price up and improve the grade," but it didn't. It fell into the Pulitzer Slough and from that day to this, New York dailies, with a few exceptions, have seemingly vied with each other in debauched journalism. The present move is a step in the right direction. Something should recommend a paper beside cheapness. The western type is not the most desirable.

The recent death of "Felix Oldboy" on Blackwell's Island from a drunken debauch recalls all that has been said for and against the famous Keeley cure for Intemperance. Its most earnest advocates have never claimed that the "cured" might not relapse any more than a physician who has conducted his patient through a severe case of pneumonia will guarantee him not to be sick again. It acts as an antidote; tones up the stomach, strengthens the shattered nerves and props the man up all around. The recovered man must not go "fooling" around dram shops again. If he knows anything, he will keep away from them. Snake poison will still kill. For just what it claims to be, the Keeley Cure is a God-send.

The Second Report of the Boys' Club is out and it is a valuable showing of the work that this agency is accomplishing. Every night, a throng of lads, who otherwise might be roaming the streets, is assembled in the Barton Place rooms and they are amused and instructed for a few hours by Mr. Burgess and pains-taking, self-sacrificing assistants. The final results of these labors are afar off. We may not live to see them; but they are sure.

Should present indications continue, South Carolina bids fair to be the champion Southern State in the matter of prohibition. There must have been a wonderful advance in public sentiment when this state's House of Representatives votes, conclusively, to do away with the traffic. What will "The Fine Old Southern Gentleman" do without his favorite beverage. If he means to do "without" it, then indeed the Millennium must be near at hand.

The young people of our city never did a more praiseworthy thing than when they undertook to conduct a personal canvass of the city in behalf of "No License." This is an application of young blood and energy that will redound to their credit for years to come. Let their efforts be supplemented by the votes of their elders and our city may, once more, stand forth, redeemed.

A LETTER FROM COL. T. W. HIGGINSON.

Dec. 8, 1891.

Editor "Light,"

DEAR SIR: I am already receiving letters which show the need of correcting a slight misapprehension contained in your issue of Dec. 5th, as to the task to which I was appointed by Gov. Ames. That task has never been defined as including "the revision and full preparation of the muster roll of Massachusetts during the Rebellion." You are quite right in speaking of "the errors and blunders so painfully evident in the volumes now in existence," the two quarto volumes published in 1870; but it has never been proposed, I think, to reprint those two volumes in an amended shape, and, if it was, the work was not assigned to me. My task has always been construed to be the preparation of a continuous and (if possible) readable narrative of the Massachusetts soldiers and sailors, considered as one body; the names of individuals and even of regiments appearing only incidentally. This plan has received the approval, in a general way, of our highest authorities in military history, such as General Devens, John C. Ropes, Esq., Gen. F. A. Walker and Col. A. A. Rand; and it is on these lines that the work has been proceeding.

As a preliminary publication, there will appear in the N. E. Historical and Genealogical Register for January, 1892, a very careful and laborious "List of Battles and Casualties of Massachusetts Troops" prepared under my direction by my accomplished assistant, Mrs. Florence W. Jacques. This will also be printed in a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution to Grand Army Posts and other veteran associations, and copies may be obtained, after January 1, by application to Mrs. Jacques, 114 Charles Street, Boston. Corrections and criticisms are earnestly desired, as this is the purpose for which the record is printed. As it will necessarily form the backbone of my whole narrative, it is of the greatest importance that it should be approximately correct. No one who has not undertaken the task can appreciate the contradictions and confusion which impede the way.

To return now to the errors contained in the printed muster rolls; these errors proceeding not merely from carelessness in printing, but in many cases from the defectiveness of the original rolls. These errors go so far, for instance, as to represent one good soldier of the 15th Regiment as a deserter, whereas he was killed at Fair Oaks; and another as killed at Fair Oaks although he really came home without even a wound. I can see no reason why there should not be, among the necessary appendices to my book, an appendix expressly devoted to the correction of such errors as those, and I will therefore ask as a favor that my attention may be called by letter to all such mistakes. I am cordially yours,

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

Mrs. Lyman Brooks.

Once more death has invaded the Bay State Home circle of boarders and removed thence one of the long time residents. Mrs. Brooks was born in Western Massachusetts and at her death Saturday afternoon was seventy-one years old. Besides her husband, she leaves a son Harry, now in Boston. The funeral was held at All Saints Church, Monday at 2 p. m., Dr. A. H. Vinton officiating. The boy choir furnished music. Many floral tributes were sent. The bearers included John A. Dana, W. S. Barton, Fred G. Pratt, and W. A. Bullens. The burial was in Hope cemetery.

Golden Wedding.

Mr. W. B. Goodnow of Princeton, brother of E. A. Goodnow of this city, with his wife celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding day last Wednesday. Mr. Goodnow lives on the ancestral acres. In addition to many Princeton friends the following were present from Worcester, E. A. Goodnow, Mrs. R. K. Partridge, Miss C. L. Goodnow, Mrs. Hastings, Hon. S. R. Heywood and wife. Letters were read from friends in New York, Boston and elsewhere. At noon an elaborate dinner was served. Mr. and Mrs. Goodnow were the recipients of between $100 and $200 in gold, and many other articles of value.

The December number of Fashions, from the Boston Store is out and its most prominent feature is a portrait and sketch of Worth, the great Paris king of Fashion, though there are many and timely plates showing what the prevailing usage is. It is an excellent paper.

Don't fail to read Col. Higginson's letter in regard to the Record of Massachusetts Soldiers and Sailors.

The current number of the New England Magazine has a timely article on Salem Witchcraft whose Bi-Centennial is near at hand. LIGHT is interested to know how many Worcester people claim descent from the victims of those terrible days. If readers will send in names of those who are thus affiliated, it will be considered a favor. Please name the one descended from.

The members of the Crescent Tennis Club are hard at work making final arrangements for their third annual dance at Horticultural Hall Dec. 18th. The arrangements, which are in the hands of three committees, promise a still greater success than that of last year, which was pronounced by many to be the most select party for young people held during the Winter. Zahonyi will do the catering and Bicknell's orchestra will furnish music. M. R. Crane will act as floor manager with the following aids: F. A. Whittemore, F. W. Washburn, F. S. Pierce and Karl Bonney. The reception committee consists of E. C. Belknap, H. H. Ames, Jr., W. H. Parker, H. A. Billings, W. C. Bemis.

The G. A. R. Trial.

The crowd gathered till its ribs ached. Mechanics Hall never held so much fun at any one time as it did Thursday night, when fifteen hundred people gathered to witness the Mock Trial of Charles W. Wood, Esq., for the alleged theft of Mayor Harrington's Plymouth Rock Rooster. The hits were all local and all exceedingly pat. From first to last the rafters rang with the merriment that fairly bubbled over. Comrade Newton has made his Mock Trial business famous. Properly backed up, as he was here, the evening becomes as funny as one with Robson and Crane, John E. Owens, Harrigan and Hart and W. J. Florence combined.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Dec. 12, 1891.

In Memoriam.

Scarcely had the mourning friends of the late Frank A. Monroe returned from his burial, Nov. 24th, before Marion Jane, one of his two daughters, was stricken with the same dread malady, pneumonia, and Tuesday last, just two weeks from her father's funeral, her gentle spirit joined his in the Summer Land. She was aged 14 years, 8 months and 13 days, a pupil in the seventh grade of the Belmont Street school. The funeral was held at her late home, Friday, at 10 o'clock, a.m. The Rev. Alexander C. Childs, who spoke Christian words over her father's body, commended her soul to our Heavenly Father and addressed comforting thoughts to the surviving friends. The sympathy of the entire community is with this stricken household. God help and keep them.

The correctness of the maxim "nothing succeeds like success" is well exemplified in Ayer's Sarsaparilla. The most successful combination of alteratives and tonics, it always succeeds in curing diseases of the blood, and hence its wonderful popularity.

Sole Agency

After all the other houses in the Syndicate and the largest general stores in Boston and in nearly all of the large cities of the United States have had confectionery departments for some time, and after many requests on the part of our patrons, we have decided to open a similar department.

At the foot of the central aisle staircase, this confectionery department will be formally opened Saturday morning.

An agreeable surprise awaits you, for the confections will be choice and very nice; fresh and wholesome continually.

As the Syndicate stores buy all their candies together, of one well known and extensive confectioner, the total quantity bought is very large; and so, of course, you can expect our prices to be lower than any you have yet enjoyed.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

The next meeting of the Worcester Art Society will be held in the lecture room at the Free Public Library, on Saturday, December 19th, at eight o'clock, p.m. After the meeting an exhibition of portraits by Mr. F. P. Vinton (mainly of citizens of Worcester), and of landscapes by Mr. Foxcroft Cole, will be opened to the members and their friends, and will remain open to the public for a fortnight.

Recent letters from Mr. Charles E. Haselden, who is studying dentistry in Basle, convey the information that he is pursuing certain studies as physiology and anatomy in the University of Basle, his Worcester High School diploma admitting him without an examination.

Next Thursday evening Herbert Johnson and the Whitney family will give the fifth entertainment in the Young Men's Christian Association course. Mr. Johnson will be remembered as the tenor who sang so splendidly at the recent Music Festival. The Whitney family includes Mrs. Charles M. Whitney, harpist and pianist; Miss Pearl Whitney, solo violinist; Charles M. Whitney, Jr., second violin, contra bass and conductor; Miss Estelle Whitney, viola; Miss May Whitney, violin, cello and contralto. With such an array of talent there should be a fine program.

Mrs. Frank A. Monroe with son and daughter will spend some weeks in Newark, N. J., her old home.

METHODIST.

GRACE.—Thursday evening at the annual meeting of the Sunday School Board Mr. E. W. Coffin was elected superintendent; Fred S. Tainter, assistant superintendent; Wm. T. Rogers, secretary; S. C. Flint, treasurer; W. L. Pentecost, librarian.

The Epworth League of Grace Church held a social Monday evening in the vestry. The entertainment consisted of a rehearsal of the Backwoods chorus under the leadership of L. J. Pentecost. Miss Gertrude L. March was organist and the singers were D. R. Taber, O. W. Farwell, A. L. Farwell, Misses Alice Bates, Alice G. Buck, Alice E. Worth and Flora M. Minor. A cobweb was next untagged, the first prizes going to Mr. F. W. Kenyon, a paper knife, and Miss Alice G. Arnold, a celluloid memorandum. The web proved too intricate for those who were left, and after much work, the five who persisted drew lots for the booby-prize, and it fell to the president. Those not concerned with the web, spent the time in singing and finding out a list of hidden cities. It was a very enjoyable evening.

A business meeting preceded the entertainment, at which a committee of five were appointed to act with similar committees of other Leagues as a general committee of arrangements for the coming convention.

At a meeting of the officers of the New England District League it was decided to hold the next annual convention in this city. The convention this year met at Portland and 600 were there. As Worcester is almost in the centre of the district, there ought to be 1,000 delegates here next October. Preparations are already being made for the program, this by the officers, and the committee from the leagues in the city will have full charge of the meetings aside from the program.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The Christian Endeavor Society of Park Church elected officers Monday evening for the coming six months as follows: President, Louis B. Osborne; vice-president, Miss Ella Parker; secretary, J. Edward Sherman; treasurer, David Fletcher; chairman of look-out committee, Louis C. Chase; of social committee, Elliott W. Brigham.

CONGREGATIONAL.

CENTRAL.—Tomorrow evening at 7 o'clock will be given the third in the series of Christmas song services. Rev. Dr. Palmer of Norwich will deliver the address. The following musical selections will be given as illustrative of the subject "Christ, Our Refuge."

Evening hymn, Brewer; organ prelude, West; chant, "Truly my soul waiteth upon God." Barnby; anthem, "I will sing of Thy power, Sullivan; anthem, "In the fear of the Lord," Roberts; prayer; solo, "Rest in the shadow of the Rock," Gilbert; hymn-anthem, "In heavenly love abiding," Mendelssohn; solo, "Rest," Parker; hymn-anthem, "Rock of Ages," Buck; organ Postlude, Schumann.

At the annual meeting of Park Church held Thursday evening officers were elected as follows:

Clerk, James G. Alexander; treasurer, Javan E. Beane; auditor, A. H. Ayer; deacon for three years, S. E. Fisher; deacon for two years, John L. Day; deaconess for three years, Miss Laura A. Giddings; standing committee, Simon E. Fisher, John L. Day, J. H. Gleason, C. R. Peacock, L. W. Putnam; pastoral committee, Mrs. C. W. Bowker, Miss Ella Parker, Mrs. Wilcox, with deacons and other officers.

BELMONT STREET.—The Ladies Aid Society held a Christmas sale Thursday evening. The fancy table was under the charge of Mrs. E. C. Metcalf and Miss Lora Andrews, while Miss Hattie Robinson had the children's table in hand. There was also a pleasant entertainment consisting of music and readings. A quartet, consisting of Mrs. E. H. Plaisted, Mrs. C. W. Lee, Mr. Chas. J. Hitchcock and Mr. C. W. Lee, sang several selections, and Miss Hattie Robinson gave readings. Mr. Reed and Mr. R. H. Thompson played the accompaniments.

UNION.—At the pastor's residence, No. 9 Ashland Street, Thursday afternoon and evening, a most delightful entertainment was given, consisting of "A Trip to Florida" under the direction of Mrs. Merrifield, Miss Hattie Smith and Mrs. Peabody, and a Christmas sale under the charge of the flower committee, which included Mrs. E. H. Peabody, Miss Hattie Williams, Miss Mattie Lathe, Miss M. Clavel, Mrs. Mills, Mrs. Charles Keith, Miss Mabel Lancaster and Mrs. W. V. Davis, and the fine needlework committee, which includes Mrs. Fred Coes, Mrs. Alexander De Witt, Mrs. S. F. Dickinson, Miss Annie Currier, Mrs. P. W. Moen, Miss Hattie Smith and Mrs. Henry Merrifield.

Plymouth Church held its annual business meeting in the church vestry Tuesday evening. An innovation was introduced this year in the form of a supper served by the Ladies' Aid Society just before the business session. Nearly the entire floor was occupied by the tables, to which over 300 sat down. After the supper, Rev. Archibald McCullagh, D. D., the pastor of the church, called the meeting to order and Rev. Dr. A. E. P. Perkins offered prayer. The election of officers, which followed, resulted as follows: Dr. F. H. Howland, re-elected clerk; E. W. Warren, elected treasurer; J. H. Bancroft, auditor; G. Henry Whitcomb, William Maynard, and George H. Mellen, with the other officers, standing committee, Prescott G. Kent, deacon; Sunday School—Superintendent, Charles G. Reed; assistant superintendents, Willis E. Sibley and Frank E. Stimpson; secretary, W. F. Crosby; treasurer, E. H. Wentworth; librarian, Frank Gilbert; superintendent of primary department, Mrs. C. H. Morgan; assistants, Mrs. J. W. Townsend, Miss Charlotte Morgan and Miss Lessie Maynard. Deacon Jehiel Todd's resignation as deacon was read but was not acted upon. The various reports showed: that the membership numbers 706, a gain of 42 during the year; that the receipts were $4,318.48, the expenditures $4,375.21; that the membership of the Sunday School is 631, divided among 56 classes.

Bethany Church celebrated its first communion last Sunday in the Old Men's Home on Leicester Street. Rev. W. T. Sleeper was the officiating clergyman and the deacons were Dea. Deming and Dea. Bauer. The new silver service, presented to the church by Mr. Albert Curtis was used.

HOPE.—It begins to look as though Hope Church might have a new edifice. The 2d annual meeting revealed a very healthful condition. The officers for the ensuing year are Clerk, Miss Emma S. Cutting; Treasurer, Miss Emma G. Hall; Auditor, Loring Foskitt; Deacon for three years, George Mitchinson; Deaconess for three years, Mrs. Annie Lever; to fill vacancy, Mrs. Hutton; Standing Committee, Loring Foskitt, Joseph Dobbins, Mr. Hutton, Mrs. J. S. Moore, Mrs. Roxena Berry, Mrs. Hattie Scott; Pastoral Committee, Mrs. Bertha Chase, Mrs. George Mitchinson, Mrs. Mary Me, also the pastor and church officers ex-officio.

BAPTIST.

At the Pleasant Street Baptist Church last Sunday six persons were admitted to membership by baptism.

MAIN ST.—Thursday and Friday afternoon and evening, The Ladies' Aid Society conducted a sale of Christmas articles, serving refreshments in the evening. The sale was well patronized.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

Four persons were admitted last Sunday to the Church of Christ upon confession of faith.

At "The Poplars," Mr. A. S. Lowell's residence, The Farmers' Club held its session and B. W. Potter, Esq. quite charmed his hearers with an essay on vacationing on wheels. Of course only a few farmers can afford time and outfit for a trip by his own conveyance, but where the same is possible, he will do well to read carefully what Mr. Potter has said and to heed his advice. No more entertaining paper has been read before the club than this.

The Saturday evening sketching class of the Art Students' Club was formed last Saturday evening. This evening it will be decided whether a class in oil, under the direction of J. M. Stone of Boston, will be formed.

The harsh, drastic purgatives, once deemed so indispensable, have given place to milder and more skillfully prepared laxatives; hence the great and growing demand for Ayer's Pills. Physicians everywhere recommend them for costiveness, indigestion, and liver complaints.

Prof. George E. Gladwin.

A picture of Longfellow among his books or Edison in his laboratory would be voted complete. This, too, must be the judgment on our representation of Professor Gladwin. He is in the drawing-room at the Institute. About him are the casts and models that generations of boys have copied. In his hands, receiving immediate consideration, are the papers that the students have, lately, passed in. Like a king upon his throne, he is the monarch of all he surveys. And thus it has been from the very founding of the Institute. Every young man, who has been a student there, has had to pass under Professor Gladwin's supervision.

Our instructor is a native of Higganum, Conn. where he was born December 15, 1828. There were eleven children in the family of whom he was the third. Nine boys and two girls made up an array that savors of old times. The elder Gladwin was a ship joiner and, fifty years ago, ship building was a thriving industry on the Connecticut River. Here in the ship yard, as a lad, the future draughtsman learned to wield mallet and chisel rather than pencil and brush. When twenty-two years old, he had assisted in the building of thirty different crafts, from the large merchant ship, down to the fore and aft schooner. It was at this age that he started away from home, resolved to acquire an education.

In 1850 he went to New Britain, Conn. and entered the High School, where he prepared for admission to the State Normal School, located in that thriving place. He remained in the school till graduation, receiving the Valedictory in a class of twenty-three members. Then followed a year's teaching in the school itself, making a specialty of drawing, attaining therein, considerable success. Thence he went to Meriden, in the same state, and took charge of a large district school remaining two or three years and making drawing, still his chief theme.

Next he removed to Hartford, in 1857, where he established himself as a teacher of drawing to a large number of private pupils and also found work in several of the public schools. Besides, he undertook the training of the city teachers in this branch. At this time, the whole matter of drawing in schools was tentative, no city nor town having undertaken it as a fixed part of the school system.

In 1859, under the lead of the Hon. Henry Barnard, a prominent Connecticut educator, a university was projected at Madison, Wisconsin. Mr. Gladwin was requested to assume the direction of the drawing department and, to better equip himself for this labor, he was sent to Europe, by Dr. Barnard, to study the different systems there established, with a view to introducing the results of his study and observation into the new Western college. He left America, in the Fall of 1859, and entered the South Kensington school of Art in London in October. The coming on of the War of the Rebellion deferred the university scheme at Madison, so that he was able to remain aboard longer and so acquire a wider range of culture. It was not till October, 1863, that he returned to this country, bringing with him, when he did come, medals and medallions as trophies.

Then came his introduction to Worcester, for he was persuaded to make his home with the late John B. Gough where he established a studio. Soon after, he opened one in this city and, at once, more work poured in upon him than he could readily accomplish. Upon the founding of the Polytechnic, he was selected as the man to have drawing in charge and for more than twenty years, he has been the indefatigable director of all branches of this art in that institution.

During these years, he has labored diligently in other directions, having charge of drawing in the High School of this city and in Hartford, Norwich, Providence and Springfield as well. In all of these places he has been the pioneer to open the way. Also he has travelled far to find subjects for his delineating touch. He even went, once, clear to Niagara to see and to sketch the ice-mound formed at the base of the Falls. He has sailed in the Arctic regions for the study of icebergs and he has dwelt in Florida for semi-tropical scenery. He has spent much time upon the prairies of the Far West, making notes of Indians and their habits and, besides, he has penetrated into the wilderness of Canada to see just what the "Forest primeval" may be, while there is not a nook nor a corner any where near Worcester that he and his sketching classes have not found.

Prof. Gladwin is a quick, nervous, practically untiring man. He is ever in quest of some new field and his home at No. 16 Harvard Street, contains many traces of travel by sea and by land. While with Mr. Gough he found a wife in Miss Mary A. Booth, a member of the latter's family. They have no children, but a grand-niece of Mrs. Gladwin has long made her home with them, having been adopted.

Our Professor is one of those who have given a tone and inspiration to the study of art in this city. He is prominent in all the agencies that look to the furthering of this department of culture. He is a pleasant, genial gentleman. One whom we like to meet, always leaving a pleasant impression on the memory.

The Telegram Train, with conductor Hugh D. Magee aboard looking after the interests of Worcester's business men, will make periodical trips through the business section of Main Street during the holidays. The genial conductor's train has long been on the road to success.

A great many people have examined with pleasure the portrait of General Devens on exhibition in the window of Pinkham and Willis. It is finished in India ink and was given to Post 19 by Comrade James F. Meach of Lynn.

Senator Pinkerton's Legislative duties keep him in Boston a large share of the time.

Frank E. Heywood has been appointed chairman of the committee on investigation and reinstatement of the New England Association Amateur Athletic Union.

Col. A. George Bullock was one of the pall bearers at the funeral of E. W. Bond, ex-president of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Company, at Springfield, Tuesday afternoon.

A Hope.

My creed is "The Golden Rule,"
My Hope, that there may be
A Heaven, where the soul, at last,
Shall be, forever free!

And that those who sin may know
Repentance's greatest joy;
That those who nobly live may find
A bliss, without alloy.

That we may have warm lips to kiss,
Strong hands to clasp, and hold,
A face and form, (as well as soul)
That self-same soul, to fold.

That Earth may be perfected,
Its we be joy prolonged,
That tears may be smilings all ways
That right be no more wronged!

That know'ng then, 'tis we are known,
Fall in that Great White Light,
We shall work to make a Heaven,
A Day—that has no night!

CHAMBERLAIN FARMERS' CLUB.

Program of the Meetings for Discussion This Winter.

The official program of the meetings for discussion of the Chamberlain Farmers' Club for the season has been issued, and is as follows:

Thursday, Dec. 10.—At "The Poplars," Brattle Street, North Worcester, residence of A. S. Lowell. Subject: "A Cruise on Wheels as a Farmer's Vacation." Essay by B. W. Potter.

Thursday, Jan. 14.—At "Mapleshade Farm," Salisbury Street, residence of Hugh J. Allen. Subject: "Free Delivery of Mails and Library Books in Country Districts." Essay by S. A. Burgess.

Thursday, Jan. 28.—At residence of F. P. Stowell, corner of Salisbury and Forest Streets. Subject: "What the Poets Say About Farming," Mr. and Mrs. William L. Allen, leaders; Mrs. Charles R. Bryden, Mrs. E. W. Wheeler.

Thursday, Feb. 11.—At "Chamberlain Farm," Salisbury Street, residence of S. A. Burgess. Subject: "Life and Early Records of Chamberlain District." Essay by Caleb A. Wall.

Thursday, Feb. 25.—At "Intervale Farm," Salisbury Street, residence of J. L. Ellsworth. Subject: "Is Science Aiding the Practical Farmer." Essay by J. Lewis Ellsworth.

Thursday, March 10.—At residence of E. W. Wheeler, Forest Street. Subject: "What are the Proper Sanitary Conditions of Our Homes?" Essay by Dr. Merrick Bemis.

Thursday, March 24.—At "Applecroft," Salisbury Street, corner of Forest, residence of B. W. Potter. Subjects: "Home Decorations." Essay by Mrs. A. S. Lowell. "Indoor Floriculture." Essay by Mrs. J. L. Ellsworth. "Outdoor Floriculture." Essay by Mrs. B. W. Potter.

The annual supper will be at "Lilac Hedge Farm," the residence of P. F. Sears, at the corner of Salisbury and Flag Streets. There will be a musical and literary entertainment at each meeting.

The melancholy days have come, the saddest of the year. 'Tis now the longest gas bills in collector's hands appear.

A "Lucky" Boy.

He was not quite 17, and was at home for his first college vacation. Three or four young fellows of about his age lounged on the piazza of one of the village homes, and discussed the affairs of the college youth.

"I'm older than he by seven or eight months," said George Chester, gloomily, "and my father is a good deal better off than his, yet here he is through his first college year, and no prospect of my beginning mine. Some fellows are lucky and some are not, and that is all there is about it."

"His father doesn't send him to college," said Horace Wells, a boy who lived nearly across from the young man whom they were discussing. "An old aunt, or grandmother, or something, who took a fancy to him years ago, got him a chance to take care of the library, and help to pay his way; and she got him other chances too. I tried for one of them, and he got it instead, so I know about it."

"Well," said George, "that just proves what I said. Why shouldn't you have got the chance, for instance, as well as he? I tell you he is a lucky fellow."

"He took the prize for mathematics," volunteered young Brooks; "that gave him a lift—it is in gold, you know. I never thought he was a special genius with figures."

"Nor was he," muttered George; "it is just another instance of luck."

"Horace is mistaken about one thing," declared Merrill Stuart. "The old lady who helps Hal Adams along isn't an aunt nor a grandmother to him, anyway; she is no relation. My aunt Harriet knows her."

"That's only another argument for George," laughed Horace. "We all know dozens of old ladies; why didn't some of them take a fancy to you and give you a lift?"

While these wise young men are discussing "luck," let me ask you to go back over a period of five years, when they were all between twelve and thirteen years of age, and stand with me at one of the street corners of their village on a certain August day.

A heavy shower was falling, which had gathered three umbrellaless boys under the awning of the corner building. Three other boys appeared at nearly the same time, two of them coming out of the grocery, the third from the bank across the way.

"If you were only going my road," called the boy from the bank, "I could shelter one of you. What are you doing this rainy day without any umbrellas?"

"Why, the sun came out," said Horace Wells, "and we thought it wasn't going to rain any more."

"Ho!" laughed the boy from the bank, whose name by the way was George Chester, "anybody with an ounce of thought would have known that that was a make-believe clear off. Whew! how it does pour. I believe I will try the awning myself until it lets up a little."

"I had no faith in the clear off," said one of the umbrellaless boys, whose name was Halford Adams, "but the fact is, my umbrella isn't convenient to carry." The boys laughed good-naturedly; they knew he did not own an umbrella, and that perhaps there was not even one in the entire family.

"I have umbrellas enough," said Will Brooks, "but it is such a bother to be lugging one around all the time. Hallo! look at that old lady; I guess she wishes she had taken her. What an idiot she is to splash out in this shower; she will get as wet as a duck. Why doesn't she stay on the steps over there until the shower is over?"

The boys all turned and looked in the direction indicated. Sure enough, there was a tall, elderly, plainly dressed woman braving the pelting rain as best she could, with her arms full of packages, and without an umbrella. She made a curious figure splashing along in the puddles, and the boys laughed, some of them. One exclaimed over her misfortunes: "She is an oldish lady, too! George, you have a large umbrella, why don't you go and help her through?"

"Not I!" said George, shrugging his shoulders; "I'm not such a dunce. She had no business to start out in this rain."

Hal Adams, who had made the suggestion, looked about him uneasily. "Perhaps her errand would not wait," he said. "If I had an umbrella—I say, Merrill, let me take yours and I'll help her out; it isn't likely that she has far to go, or she wouldn't start in this storm. I'll bring it back all right in a few minutes. You are not in a hurry; you never are."

"Why, no," said Merrill Stuart, "I'm in no hurry; but then, I think you are an everlasting idiot to do any such thing. You don't know her, and are under no obligations to get a wetting for her."

"All right," said Hal, breaking into the midst of this: "I'll listen to your moralizing when I come back; give us your umbrella, old fellow." He seized it, and was gone, amid the jeers of the boys, every one of whom thought him a simpleton. The middle-aged woman, struggling with the storm, did not.

"You are a good, kind boy," she said heartily, as he pounced upon her packages and tucked them under his arm, shielding her carefully the while. "I would not have started out, but my niece is sick and needed the things and there was no one else to go. I could not wait for the shower to be over on her account. I knew I couldn't manage an umbrella, so I didn't take one."

It proved to be but a short walk, and Hal thought the woman's gratitude more profuse than the occasion warranted. He shook his head merrily when she begged him to come in and wait for the rain to be over. "No, ma'am, thank you, this is a borrowed umbrella, and the owner is waiting for it."

"A borrowed one? Then you will be left without. How will you get home if the rain continues?"

"O! I will run between the drops; I'm used to it. I never carry an umbrella."

"Why not, young man?"

"Why, because," he said, with a burst of laughter, finding himself caught by such an outspoken question, "I have none to carry."

"Is that so? Well, I have one which is altogether too heavy for my hands; I will give it to you to remember our walk by. It is nothing but cotton, and old at that, but it will keep the rain off."

It was in vain to protest; his new friend was in earnest, and Hal came back to the boys laughing and showing his large umbrella, which was very good indeed.

"You are in luck!" said George Chester; "I wouldn't mind having as good an umbrella as that for my own; mine is about worn out."

That was years ago. The boys gathered under that awning are, with one or two exceptions, the same boys who sat on the piazza five years later and discussed the luck of Hal Adams in college. Every one of them has forgotten the incident of the rain, and of Hal Adams's rush through it to help a middle-aged, plain-looking woman. I suppose if they had known that the "aunt or grandmother or something," who took a fancy to him years ago was the woman in the rain, and that she had never lost sight of him since, but had been able to give him a bit of help of one sort or another many a time, they would have called it a "queer piece of luck." While bright enough boys in general, they seemed to be utterly stupid about cause and effect.

Listen to one of them, shouting at this minute from the piazza to Hal Adams under the trees: "Hallo, Hal; I heard you had a tip-top bicycle. How did you happen to be so lucky?"

"I planned my luck," Hal called back, with one of his old merry laughs. "I found a second-hand one for sale cheap, and discovered that by riding it I could board a couple of miles farther away from the college, and the saving in board would pay for the bicycle in few months' time."

"Just his luck!" muttered George Chester, even in the very face of the important words, "I planned my luck!"—Myra Spaford in Pansy.

PLAYS AND PLAYERS.

Great is Blue Jeans, greater still is Joseph Arthur, but greatest of all is Laura Burt. Such was the verdict of the thousands of people who visited Blue Jeans at the Worcester Theatre last week, and who applauded the witty lines, roared at the comedians, sympathized with the vicissitudes of the hero, held their breath over the saw mill, cheered the brass band and coveted the baby, but united in pronouncing Laura Burt the bright star of the occasion. She is as piquant as an of-fenbach air, as refreshing as a watermelon in August, beautiful as an angel, though much more becomingly dressed, and more funny than a lobster factory. The part of June fits her like a glove, but so does every other rôle she has ever undertaken. It is a peculiarity Miss Burt has. She is even credited with playing Topsy in Uncle Tom's Cabin, and making that mouldy chestnut "bud and blossom like the rose."

A young man whose head and heart are alike, tender, and who has never grasped the dangers of a little learning, was heard to remark before a group of sympathizing auditors that Miss Burt was possessed of the "Beaute du diable," and when pressed for a translation declared that she was "devilish pretty."

Verily Miss Burt, from this time forth the city of Worcester is your especial property.

An afternoon tea was given Wednesday at the home of Mrs. Mary A. Lathe, 20 Cedar street. The hours were from 4 to 6.

Phi Gamma Delta.

The establishment of a chapter of a Greek Letter Fraternity in an institution in which neither Greek nor Latin is taught is a matter of sufficient moment to call out a little history. The very oldest society of this kind is the Phi Beta Kappa, established at William and Mary's College in 1776, but this long since ceased to be a society in the sense that the later orders are. It is now chaptered in certain colleges, taking therefrom only a certain proportion of the Senior class at graduation, the first third or such fraction as may have been decided upon. There is only an initiation and the member wears a well known key attached to his watch chain. There are, today, probably seventy-five fraternities, wearing Greek letter badges and being more or less secret in their character.

The particular one, which has recently granted a chapter at the Institute in this city was founded in 1848, at Jefferson College, an institution located at Canonsburg, Penn., but which, in 1865, was united with Washington College, James G. Blaine's alma mater, located in Washington, nine miles away. The merged institutions are known as Washington-Jefferson College. In 1879, there had been granted, thirty-nine chapters, mostly in Southern and Western colleges. For this reason, a considerable number were given up during the War. The locating of a chapter here, is creditable to the Polytechnic. As students are clanship and will have their cliques, anyway, it is quite as well for college faculties to recognize this fact and to permit such bodies to exist legally. In some colleges, they maintain an existence by stealth, not a good way for young people to come up. In 1879, Phi Gamma Delta had 2750 members, with its strongest chapters in the West. The founders were Samuel B. Wilson, James Elliot, John T. McCarthy, D. Webster Crofts, Ellis B. Gregg and N. Fletcher. Though no one of these names has attained anything more than local fame, the Fraternity boasts among others Senator Vance of North Carolina, Edward Eggleston, the author, General George A. Sheridan and General Lew Wallace, in addition to the names given in last week's LIGHT, as President Harrison, James G. Blaine and Chauncey M. Depew. Very likely this innovation will open the way for more orders of the same sort.

Smith.

Ev. ry one is busy now, as the time for examinations, term essays, etc., draws near. Prof. Goodyear of Harvard has begun a course of art lectures, illustrated by stereopticon views, which are given every Thursday and Friday evenings in Assembly Hall.

Dr. Anderson of Paris gave a very interesting talk on the McCall Mission, Friday night, in the First Church. Dr. Blodgett, who is much interested had urged the college girls to attend, so that they formed the greater part of the audience. A branch association was started, of which Miss Jordan, head of our English department, was appointed vice-president.

Prof. Landers of Yale now gives Bible lectures to the Freshmen.
Dec. 9.

Worcester Academy.

The first of the series of lectures will be given next Wednesday evening by President Andrews of Brown University whose subject will be "Mental Independence." The second will be given January 13th by President Hyde of Bowdoin College and the subject will be "The Qualities of Leadership." January 27, President Small of Colby University will speak on "The Ideals of the Higher Education." President Gates of Amherst will also speak sometime during the Winter.

High School.

The usual rhetorical exercises were held in the hall Dec. 3, consisting of the following programme: Declamation, Extract from Webster's address at the Plymouth Bi-centennial Celebration 1870, H. Bellis; Reading, Contentment, Holmes, Miss Cheney; Violin Solo, Miss Clark; Declamation, Extract from one of Charles Sumner's speeches in Senate.
W. Tower.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather Dec. 5 and the small attendance of the societies, it was thought prudent and advisable to join the meetings of the Assembly and Summer Club. This enabled the members of both societies to hear Mr. Cummings, the janitor, who was to speak to the Assembly on his personal "Reminiscences of the War."

He briefly outlined that he had belonged to a regiment of Zouaves, composed of New York firemen. This regiment was mustered in by Gen. McDowell for the war, whether it lasted one or ten years, the only one that was ever mustered in with that design.

His talk was highly entertaining and he was heartily received and applauded. When the applauding had ceased, a unanimous vote of thanks was extended to him.

"Tech" Camera Club.

The young men who constitute this thriving organization have every reason to congratulate themselves on the success of the exhibition which they gave, one week ago to-day. The large room on the second floor, north-east corner, was given over to them and, in this, they displayed above five hundred prints. There were possibly a dozen different exhibitors, so it will be seen that some of the parties had many samples. Some exceedingly fine pictures were for exhibition only, conspicuous among these were those shown by Master Kimball. The judges were Mr. Alfred S. Roe, Principal J. Chauncey Lyford and Dr. A. S. Kimball. These gentlemen attended to their duties so that at four o'clock, all the cards were in place designating the honored few. There was a steady influx of visitors so that the receipts were sufficient to net a handsome balance. Not the least happy faces in the room were those of some of the fortunate recipients of prizes; but everybody looked happy, even the judges who had to crush some rising hopes. There were fifteen classes in all and the awards were as follows, the first name, in each case, being number one; landscapes, A. C. Higgins, H. Sinclair; marine views, Sinclair, H. W. Brack; architecture, H. S. Coombs, Bracken; interiors, E. W. Davenport, E. H. Keith; animals, Braken, Keith; instantaneous, Sinclair, Higgins; flash-lights, E. W. Vaill Jr., Higgins; portraits, Higgins, Keith; groups, Keith, Braken; machinery, Sinclair, Higgins; copies, Braken, Higgins; bromides Keith—no second; novel effects, Higgins, Sinclair; clouds, Keith, and E. E. Kent.

It was understood, at the outset, that the same party should not take both first and second prizes in the same class and some excellent pictures were shown that took prizes last year. Of course, they were ruled out of this. A little more care in classification is desirable and Mr. Braken's scheme of having all his pictures in one frame was particularly vexatious to the judges. His work was excellent but it should have been distributed. Where there was so much that was choice, comparisons may be invidious, still LIGHT will not forego mentioning Higgins' glimpse in the Adirondacks, Keith's group of high school girls, Sinclair's children at play and Bracken's mare and colt all of which won first prizes for their makers. As a whole, the result was excellent and it is a pleasure to see young men, thus striving for success, content with honorable mention. In the evening there was a fine exhibition of lantern slides, under the direction of Mr. Edward H. Keith. The next annual showing will be looked forward to with pleasure. The officers of the club are President, Edward H. Keith '94; vice-president, Aldus C. Higgins '93; secretary, E. W. Vaill, Jr., '93; treasurer, Howard A. Coombs '93.

Holy Cross.

The marks for November were read in Fenwick Hall last Wednesday. Among the Worcester boys averaging 95 per cent., or over were the following: rhetoric, T. B. Cunningham and W. I. McLaughlin; poetry, J. P. O'Brien, F. M. Phelan, C. P. Fitzgerald, T. H. Dowd and C. H. Durning.

The regular monthly elocution exercises took place last Thursday.

Last Tuesday being the feast of the Immaculate Conception and a holiday of obligation, was a holiday for the students.

The regular semi-annual reviews commenced yesterday.

Rev. Robert Walsh of the Church of the Immaculate Conception is holding during this week a retreat for his parish. It will close Sunday morning with a solemn high mass at 10.30 and a sermon to be preached by one of the fathers from the college.

The net receipts of the recent minstrel show given by the Washington Club at the theater were $226.25 while the net profits were $311.47.

Church Choirs.

At the Old South Church last Sunday the choir sang a Te Deum set to music written by A. V. Hill, the organist of the church. The work is in the key of C and has solos for soprano, alto, tenor and bass. It is as yet only in manuscript, but it may be published.

Our Schools.

CHAPTER IX.

At the risk of almost tedious iteration it may be well to quote still further the words of eminent educators on this subject: An article in a late able periodical, said to have been written by a distinguished educator, says, "We turn our children stupefied with lists of names and dates and intricacies of spelling and grammar, but utterly ignorant of most things which are needed for the struggle of life." Another able writer on the subject remarks that "The cramming system, so much in vogue, subjects all the pupils to the treatment of Strasbourg geese — noodled, as it is termed, till their livers are unnaturally enlarged; only it is the minds of the children that are thus noodled."

E. L. Stanley, an able educator, says: "Our educational machine is like the labor of the Danaides; with a maximum of friction, it forces a huge volume of water into vessels full of holes, and but little remains to fructify the soil."

Another writer remarks as follows: "Owing to the perfunctory process of filling the child's memory—so far as he had any—with words unexplained, and disconnected facts, the school becomes irksome to the child, and the attendance becomes a sort of bondage which the child is too glad to escape from. Thus the school-life, instead of being the happiest time for the child, becomes one of incessant fret and worry."

Owing to the sort of military discipline pervading the schools,—happily somewhat relaxed in the High School—the condition above described is too fatally manifest.

The "State Board of Education" has the following: "Experience has proved that the cause of popular education in a community flourishes in proportion to the excellence of its supervision. From the nature of the case adequate supervision cannot be secured except by agents selected for their pedagogical learning, and employed to give their whole time and strength to the administration of school affairs."

From what has been said in previous chapters, it is obvious that there is necessity for using greater care in the choice of school committee; and that in the discharge of their duty to the people, this committee, in filling the important office of superintendent, should exercise perfect independence of all personal influences, whether in the form of persuasion, blandishments or intimidation, and should at once proceed to elect to that office, a person of far higher qualifications than those possessed by the present incumbent—thus recognizing the will of their constituents so often and so emphatically expressed.

In closing the present series of papers it is desirable to recur to the question of school management, now claiming so large a share of public attention.

So much interest has it caused that a committee of fifteen gentlemen was chosen at a public meeting to take into consideration the whole subject of popular education.

This committee, after a survey of the situation, published in the morning papers of the 21st, ultimo, an unanswerable "statement" the attempted reply to which is only noticeable for its audacious mendacity—a characteristic which sufficiently reveals its inspiration if not its authorship. The assertions in regard to "Kindergartens" in the above "reply" appear ridiculous, in view of the papers elucidating the subject lately read before the Woman's Club—some of which have since appeared in the columns of the Spy—and the remarks about "sticks and blocks and clay models," as at present "used in the primary schools," clearly show the utter incapacity of the management to understand or at all appreciate the scope and purpose of the kindergarten; and make it clear to all its friends that this management is as incapable of successfully introducing the system as would be very "sticks and blocks and clay models" themselves.

It is well understood that the school committee needs to be better instructed as to the will and purpose of the great majority of the people. In the impending election it is important that they should exercise careful discrimination, in the choice of committee men, and vote only for such men as will carry out their often expressed will.

The Herculean efforts now making to thwart this will, should be no cause of discouragement, as it only shows the desperation of this man and his few coadjutors.

The intelligent members of the committee must see that the harmony of a great political party and the peace of the city require that they should act for the best interest of the schools, and dispose of this exciting question, in the only possible way, by the discharge of this obnoxious official.

The great audacity of this political intriguer and his untiring devotion to his own interests, coupled with his long experience and past success in his peculiar style of chicanery, have rendered him a somewhat dangerous subject,—dangerous to the best interests of the schools, and utterly obstructive to any progress towards the newer and better systems of education already so successful and beneficent in more enlightened and enterprising communities. If this man had any sense of propriety, he would no longer be a rock of offense, and "a stirrer up of strife," but would at once betake himself to "fresh woods and pastures new."

After what has been said in preceding chapters it would be useless and might become tedious to prolong the discussion of this subject; the time for words is past, and the period of action is, at hand; if the course of these papers has in any degree helped to open the eyes of the public to the fatal loss that is occurring, at a ruinous cost in money—as well as in moral and intellectual culture, a loss ten times more deplorable—there can be no doubt that every conscientious and hopeful voter, of either sex, will do the duty of a faithful citizen in voting for reform at every opportunity.

In taking leave of this subject for the present, I wish to thank the publisher of LIGHT for admitting this series of papers to his columns, sometimes under protest; and to say that the writer alone is responsible for whatever they contain, which, but for the cautious reticence of the editor, would have been far more aggressive than they now appear.

"Prayer ardent opens heaven."

If We Could Know.

BY JOLIA H. MAY.

If we could know
Which of us, darling, would be first to go;
Who would be first to breast the swelling tide,
And step alone upon the other side—
If we could know!

If it were you,
Should I walk softly, ke-pling death in view?
Should I my love to you more oft express?
Or should I grieve you, darling, any less—
If it were you?

If it were I,
Should I improve the moments slipping by?
Should I more closely follow God's great plan?
Be filled with sweeter charity to man—
If it were I?

If we could know!
We cannot, darling; and 'tis better so,
I should forget, just as I do to-day,
And walk alone the same old stumbling way—
If I could know.

I would not know
Which of us, darling, will be first to go.
I only wish the seas may not be long
Between the parting and the greeting song;
But when, or where, or how we're called to go—
I would not know.

"SCHEPP'S PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE WORLD."

THE GREATEST BOOK ON EARTH.

COSTING $100,000

NEW, NOVEL, STRIKING.

A Wonderful Collection of Photographs. Everyone Seeing It Will Want a Copy.

We take great pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to one of the most daring, if not the most marvellous achievement, that has yet been accomplished in the publishing world. We refer to a new and most valuable publication, entitled "Schepp's Photographs of the World," representing renowned picturesque scenery, historic castles, views of cities, avenues, buildings, monuments, copies of celebrated paintings and artistic statuary, collected from every corner of the world.

It includes every thing of any interest through Great Britain, from the Blarney Castle to the Giant's Causeway in Ireland, and from the Hills of Scotland to the South Coast of England; through Europe, from Gibraltar in the South to Hammerfest in the North; through Asia and the Orient, from the Holy Land, Arabia and Persia in the West to India, China, Japan, Australia and the Islands of the Pacific in the South and East.

Through Africa, from the Suez Canal, Egypt and the Nile in the East to Cape of Good Hope in the South and life among the Natives in the interior, West and North; through Asia and the Orient, from the Holy Land, Arabia and Persia in the West to India, China, Japan, Australia and the Islands of the Pacific in the South and East.

Through Spanish South America, from Terra del Fu-go to Panama; through the Central American States and Mexico;—land of the Aztecs; through Alaska, Greenland, British North America and Canada.

Through the United States, from the Golden Gate in the West to the Rocky Coast of New England in the East, and from the Lake cities in the North to the Cotton States in the South, forming one of the finest, rarest, wealthiest, and most beautiful, interesting and historic collections of Photographs ever seen.

The Photographs representing master paintings and works of art, taken from the French Salon, Louvre, Luxembourg, Versailles, Dresden, Uffizi, Pitti and Vatican Galleries, in the direct and accurate reproductions of the famous originals. Their value is so great that the wealth of nations could not buy them. No collection like this has ever before been formed from the lids of any book.

Every Photograph is carefully explained in from four to six lines printed matter, in an accurate, concise and most interesting manner. So great has been the demand for this book already, that the publishers immediately translated the English explanations into Swedish and German, printing the book in three languages within four weeks, and we understand that a Spanish edition is now in course of preparation.

The work is issued by the Globe Bible Publishing Co., of Philadelphia, Penn. The publishers, who are wide awake, and know how to meet the wants of the masses, have placed the retail prices marvellously low, ranging from $3.25 to $7.00, according to the style of binding, giving every one an opportunity to purchase a copy.

Mr. E. H. Chamberlain, 3 Clarence Street, is the local representative for this community, and we trust that this announcement to our many readers may prepare every one to receive him cordially. A postal card to his address will receive early attention.

The Chautauquan for December.

The frontispiece is a portrait of Edward Everett Hale, a Counselor of the C. L. S. C., and there are also two pages containing nine pictures of contributors. This magazine, though, the organ of the Chautauque movement, contains much of interest to the average reader, as a "Trip up the Nile," containing several illustrations; the "Scottish Language;" the "Modern Treatment for Insanity;" and a description of the life and work of Charles Stewart Parnell. The woman's department shows what women have done as lawyers, astronomers, trained nurses and clerks. The Library Table contains many interesting sketches cut from books both new and old.

Dr. Theodore L. Flood, Meadville, Pa.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have recently issued a new edition of Lowell's Vision of Sir Launfal with portrait and designs by Edmund H. Garrett. Printing and binding are in the highest style of the bookmaker's art.

W. D. Howell's Venetian Life, so many years a cherished book by all who travel, or, for that matter, stay at home is out in a new illustrated edition from the presses of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It is profusely illustrated and will be hailed with pleasure by many readers.

The Christmas Wide Awake has been made by some of the brightest people in America; Mary E. Wilkins, Jessie Benton Frémont, Charlotte Perkins Stetson, Childs Hassam, Irving R. Wiles, John Mead Howells, Charlotte M. Vaile, Captain Curtis, U. S. A., Emilie Poulsson, Eleanor Lewis, Mrs. Maria Mc Intosh Cox, Mrs. Harriet Maxwell Converse, L. J. Bridgman, Frances Courtenay Baylor, Lieut-Col. Thordike, Caroline Hunt Rimmer, Charles Monte, E. H. Garrett. There is a great range of story, ballad, and picture, all full of the Christmas spirit.

Wide Awake is $2.40 a year. D. Lothrop Company: Boston.

Good Housekeeping for December presents a number of articles of unusual interest, apart from those which give its distinctive flavor as a Christmas number. Among these may be named "Little Lord Noughtyboy," a society paper on "Afternoon Receptions," "Our Sleeping Rooms," "The Attic and its Treasures," "A Chapter on Children," especially relating to "The Baby," with others of equal importance. A most appropriate holiday gift for any housewife—or for almost anybody else—would be a year's subscription to this model home magazine. Clark W. Bryan & Co., Springfield, Mass.

William Dean Howells to Write a Story Especially for Girls.

It is said that Mr. Howells, who is perhaps the foremost of living American novelists, has long had in mind a story of American girl-life, which he believes will be the best piece of work he has ever done. The great novelist has now been induced to write out the story, and at present he is at work upon it. It is a novel unlike any which Mr. Howells has ever written. It deals entirely with the struggles of a Western girl who goes to New York, and the story will have about it all the flavor which attaches to a tale of city life with a young girl as the central heroine. Heretofore all of Mr. Howells' novels have gone to the Harpers, but this special girls' novel will be printed during 1892 in The Ladies' Home Journal, of Philadelphia, the publishers of which have bought the exclusive rights to the story from Mr. Howells. The novel is to be beautifully illustrated, and Mr. Howells himself believes that it will be as attractive a story as any with which his name has been connected.

Babyland.

The December number is already here, and it is quite as enchanting to the little people as preceding numbers have been. It is full of pretty pictures, and with its merry jingles and little stories Babyland is sure to delight every baby. Suitable for children whose ages range from one to six. Nothing better for the Christmas stocking or tree than a year's subscription.

The price is only 50 cents a year; 5 cents a copy. Published by D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Mass.

The Pansy; Isabella M. and G. R. Alden, editors. A week-day and Sunday magazine. The best publication for children of all ages. Bright, sparkling and interesting.

This year The Pansy will be brighter, more attractive and more helpful than ever.

Pansy's new serial, "Way Stations," will deal with a real girl and boy.

Our golden text story this year, The Little Card, will be the work of the loving hand of Pansy herself.

Margaret Sidney's Little Paul, and The Frisbie School, will introduce novel, quaint, and interesting young folks.

Mrs. C. M. Livingston's Baby's Corner will delight the little toddlers.

"English Literature" will acquaint you with celebrated characters in fiction.

A novel and interesting feature will be a series of autobiographical stories of dogs—actual occurrences, correctly reported.

Our Bible Band, Sunday Afternoon, The Junior Society of Christian Endeavor, The P. S. Corner, The Missionary Department, All Along the Line, The Queer Story will continue to uplift, instruct and guide every member of the family; for The Pansy is a favorite with young and old alike.

The Pansy is $1.00 a year. New volume begins with the November number.

A free subscription by sending two new subscribers with two dollars, direct to D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

The following tribute to the work of an American magazine is contained in the report of the Secretary of the Interior just submitted to Congress:

"Your attention is also requested to the paper contributed by Mr. John Muir to the number of The Century Illustrated Monthly Magazine for November, 1891, entitled "A Rival of the Yosemite—the Canon of the South Fork of Kings River, California." It furnishes maps of this section and is illustrated by most admirable engravings of the wonderful scenery there existing. The engravings are chiefly from the pencil of Mr. Charles D. Robinson. These gentlemen, as well as the editors of The Century especially Mr. Johnson, have taken a great personal interest in the forest reserves in California, and are worthy of great consideration, both from their experience and intelligence. The magazine article mentioned advocates the extension of the Sequoia National Park so as to embrace the Kings River region and the Kaweah and Tule Sequoia groves. The boundaries are there set forth. The subject is recommended to your favorable consideration and action."

The Century for December, contents: The Holy Family, Frontispiece, painted by Frank Vincent Du Mond; The Christ Child, Raphael, (Italian Old Masters) W. J. Stillman, engravings and notes by T. Cole; At First, Amanda T. Jones; The Shepherds, Edith M. Thomas, picture by H. Lerolle; The Christmas Shadrach, Frank R. Stockton, picture by A. B. Wenzell; The Midnight Call, Kate Putnam Osgood; The Naulahka, A Story of West and East, H. Rudyard Kipling and Wolcott Balestier; Queen Elizabeth, Ross Terry Cooke; The Rapture of Hetty, Mary Hallock Foote, picture by Mary Hallock Foote; The Appearance of the Angel to the Shepherds, painting by P. Lagarde; Mozart—After a Hundred Years, Amelia Gere Mason, pictures by Malcolm Fraser, and from paintings, etc.; Remembrance, William Sharp; The Two Lessons, Thomas W. Higginson; A Christmas Fantasy, with a Moral, Thomas Balley Aldrich, picture by Anne G. Morse; The Annunciation to the Shepherds, painted by J. Bastien Lepage; The Bowerly, Julian Ralph, pictures by A. F. Jacassy and A. Castaigne; The Long Ago, Julie M. Lippmann; Childhood, Viola Roseboro, picture by Abbott H. Thayer; Holy Night, painted by Fritz Von Uhde; The Ocean from Real Life, John A. Beebe, pictures by W. Taber; Science and Immortality, Augustus Jay DuBois; Sympathy, Charles H. Crandall; Frost-Flowers, W. P. Foster; The Golden Age of Pastel, Elizabeth W. Champney, pictures from old paintings in pastel; The Century's Christmas Pictures, Mrs. S. Van Rensselaer, W. Lewis Fraser; Wally, A Wall, a Christmas Sketch from Life, Vida D. Scudder; An Offertory, Mary Mapes Dodge, picture by Dagnan Bouveret; The Song of the Brook, Mary Ainge De Vere; Characteristics, I. S. Weir Mitchell, portrait of the author by Frank Holl; Sherman and the San Francisco Vigilantes, unpublished letters, General W. T. Sherman.

TOPICS OF THE TIME.

The Christmas Century, Charitable Reform of High Public Value, The "Per Capita" Deduction, The World's Columbian Exhibition.

OPEN LETTERS.

John Boyle O'Reilly as a Poet of Humanity, George Parsons Lathrop; The New England Kitchen, Maria Parloa; Parks and Playgrounds for Children, Walter Vrooman.

IN LIGHTER VEIN.

Understood, William B. McVicar; Smithy Song, George Horton; Jack Frost, Esther B. Tiffany; The Blue and the Gray, R. W. P. Noble; The Little Tunker Bonnet, B. S. Parker; A Paradox, Lydia C. Heckman; Friends Only, F. H. Curtis; Embarassing to a Modest Mao, J. K. Bangs; Christmas Day, Alice Williams Brotherton; To a Southern

Girl, James G. Burnett; A Christmas Toast, John H. Boner.

The Christmas Century is something more than the usual number of this magazine under a holiday name. It is pervaded with the spirit of Christmas, and both directly and indirectly touches upon the Christian celebration. This characteristic is first evident in the cover, a new and special design, drawn by George Wharton Edwards, and printed in gold and brown on white. The frontispiece is a reproduction of the painting of "The Holy Family" by Du Mond, a young American artist, who presents in this picture an original conception of the subject. The number also contains engravings of modern pictures relating to Christmas as follows: "The Arrival of the Shepherds," by H. Lerolle (with a poem by Edith M. Thomas); "The Appearance of the Angel to the Shepherds," by P. Lagarde; "The Annunciation to the Shepherds," by J. Bastien Lepage; "Holy Night," by Fritz Von Uhde, and a Madonna by Dagnan Bouveret, accompanied by a poem by Mrs. Mary Mapes Dodge, entitled "An Offertory." Quite appropriate to the season also is Mr. Stillman's article on "Raphael," accompanied by Mr. Cole's engraving of "The Madonna of the Goldfinch," made especially for this number, and three other examples of Raphael's work—the Aeneas and Parnassus groups from the Vatican, and the portrait of Maddelena Doni.

December Education contains several articles that should be read in Worcester. The first essay by Commissioner Harris is entitled, "Vocation Versus Culture; with two Aspects of Education." Treating, as he does, at some length, the subject of kindergartens, it is quite fitting for Worcester people to peruse. "School Libraries" also is a pertinent subject, though the writer treats the literary features of the same more than its uses as a source of information. The prime function of a school library is to answer questions and the more books that will assist in this direction, the better. Of course if there is not near a public library, then the school collection must help along in the way of general literature. "The Study of Modern Language" is a helpful treatment of a subject of growing importance. "Is the Public demanding Impossibilities" is another name for the oft repeated discussion of "Limitations in Teaching." We can't do everything, all at once. All must grant this, yet the school curriculum, already badly crowded, is threatened with still further loadings.

The December Architects and Builders Edition of the Scientific American has its accustomed array of designs for homes, real pleasurable buildings all by themselves. Just think of a cottage, two stories high, with four rooms on each floor, not to mention halls and closets, and all to cost only $800. Why should people live in "Three deckers," where such happiness is to be had so cheaply?

Doubtless the high water mark of educational literature is reached in The Pedagogical Seminary, whose third number, completing the first volume is just published. It is one of the several highly scholarly publications of Clark University, bearing the name of President G. Stanley Hall as editor. The editorial is a comprehensive glance over the entire educational field, Europe as well as America. It is a masterly presentation of the outlook. "Recent Literature on Higher Education" indicates progress in the United States and in the European learned centers of France, Germany and England. "Higher Pedagogical Seminaries in Germany" is by W. H. Burnham, Ph. D. J. F. Reigart, A. B., discusses, "The Training of Teachers in England," wherein he shows us that the English way is quite different from the American. "History of Methods of Instruction in Geography" is by J. R. Potter, A. M. "Literature and Notes" includes a wide range of subjects. The miscellaneous matter giving paragraph notes on educational matters, the world over, is the result of a vast amount of pains-taking searching and clipping. "The Recent Acquisitions to the Pedagogical Department of Clark University" gives an excellent notion of the proportions that this lately established portion of the institution is attaining. The Seminary may be had of Putnam, Davis & Co. $1.50.

House and Health by Harriet Prescott Spofford, New York, Dodd, Mead & Company, 1891. $1.

The writer of this instructive volume has long been known as the writer of very interesting short stories, in fact she is one of the few people who can do that very difficult thing and do it well. But this book is not in the story line at all. In twenty-three chapters, she has condensed a lifetime. It is a book to give to your newly married friends and they should read it aloud to each other. Quite likely subsequent living would be much happier for the act. Moreover, as it is better late than never, there are very few who might not profit by the perusal. The chapter heads are, The Maid Herself, The Grandmother, Mortmain, An Unseen Giver, In Society's Beauty and Charm, In Fair Array, The Lovers, The Betrothal, The Bridal, Marriage, On the Part of Mother and Father, Bondage and Burden, A Great Hindrance, Poor Work, The Allowance, The Relations, The Unhappy Wife, The Plain Wife, The Old Wife, The Angel in the Child, In the Sick Room, The Family Strain. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

The Pansy for December is now ready; it is not necessary for us to read all the stories to know whether it is wholesome for children. It is the same with this as with all the magazines published by this firm, all that could be desired for the young people. It contains many short and elevating stories from the able pen of Pansy. It is also full of beautiful illustrations, and we are sure that the young folks who read it will feel better, stronger and happier for their association with such wise and entertaining friends as Pansy, Margaret Sidney and the other favorite authors. It is only $1 a year, 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

"Tales from Town Topics No. 2." the second of the series recently started by the publishers of New York Town Topics, has made its appearance. It is a collection of the favorite stories, poems, jokes, etc., that have appeared in the pages of the journal itself. Town Topics Publishing Co., 21 West 23d Street, New York.

"Glittering and Sounding Generalities."

These oft repeated words in the recent campaign comprise a part of a remark in a letter of the year 1856, in which Rufus Choate referred to a government based on Northern or anti-slavery ideas, as follows: "Its constitution, the glittering and sounding generalities of natural right which make up the Declaration of Independence."

It was Emerson who replied, that these "generalities" were "blazing ubiquities."

We are told of three ways of getting out of a scrape, first, write out; second, back out; third and best way, keep out.

If a man bristles with rustere reflections, affecting to untwist verbal tangles, or prune an apostrophe, he is likely to betray that his most active interest is to promulgate the fitness of things; yet, it is not worth one's while to rush ête battisse against a granite wall just to be compassionally called a reformer. The error may prove a nearer millstone; it might be a lightsome fogbank.

We will not fix the genesis and trace the road by which we reached the conclusion that the "blazing ubiquities," and the composite errors to be assailed, require the work of a redactor, nor state whether we journey afoot, on wheels, or mounted on Pegasus,—we did not cut cross-tails. There are shams in every art. Persecution, deception and piracy, plagiarism, and pugnacity belong to antiquity and are not catalogued with the lost arts.

From the post of observation which a critic chooses, he should not lack the poise of judgement in his attempt to "fog the world." The critical spirit possesses a comprehensive nature, often fickle, but facile and insinuating. It is a transparent stream which creeps around weedy rocks babbling of ugly flaws, spreads like a wet mat under chilly, uncertain feet. A critic need not be an advocate nor an apologist. Averse opinions and defects must be set in their natural connection, claiming honest freedom for themselves. "The National Sin of Literary Piracy," covers a large serrated surface and "Tristram Shandy" is held in the grasp of Dr. Ferrier, while the modern literary Kodak has focused hundreds of literary inadvertencies and "blazing ubiquities." Even now a sermonizer has deemed it becoming to assume the little liberty of adaptation and sing, "Hurray, for my handiwork!" with old "Tubal Cain" for he too, was a "man of might." Then the time had come for the little javelin of rebuke, which touched the structure, and it fell like a house of cards. Crumbling monuments of genius afford not a compensation, and the epithet of "tacti" may distinguish the architect as he "backed out," but the city of Amyclæ was destroyed by silence.

"A loose leaf with a negotiable thought upon it is so handy," says one, "A chance-found" is claimed for "scrap" territory by another. A certain quality in a writer makes him an excellent "verse tinker," emulator of Demas Junior, of whom the dreaming tinker in "Pilgrim's Progress" fixes a bas-relief. A genius is he who can "soldier over the cracks and chasms of rigid honorable poetry." A confirmed pirate will screw up his mouth, sharpen his sight and pilfer the soul-language, the brain-labor of an arduous scholar merely for the purpose of alliteration, convincing the originator that

"Like an old tailor to his needle's eye."

"His leaf
By some o'er hasty anel was misplaced
In Fate's eternal volume."

There are great scientists, great artists, great inventors, and explorers. Would these men bear infringement upon especial disclosures of their genius without a strong protest against imposture? Would they adopt the system of Pythagoras, and remain silent? No, they would struggle to compel recognition, unless they represented low incomes, figuring high only in the scale of fame and "intangible services," thus forming a cluster of obliterate heroes. Imagine the feelings of a painter upon seeing a cherished creation of his brush dismantled. Conceive the beautiful infant in Bertinotti's "Watch and Ward," transformed into an allegorical "Infant Bacchus," by a graceful twining of grape-vines and a burden of luscious fruit. Or with Circe's rod that transformed the Friends of Ulysses into pigs, change the subtle influence which surrounds the subject of Landseer's "Sancho Panza" with his faithful companion "Dapple," by substituting an Antelope for the Ass. We should behold an incongruity as insidious as the recension of some word-pictures from which disservice has filled individuate beauty and vitality, as a fire without the crackle or a scent-rose rose.

Thophile Gautier discovered that painting was a means "too impersonal and too remote" to satisfy the desire that was within him demanding an artistic outlet. He became an honest "hunter of words" and phrases. It is said, words had for him the fascination that butterflies have for children. His literary field was the dictionaries, of these he possessed fifty. His fine word-pictures were "copies in the color of Greek Marbles," their beauty powerfully appeals to the artistic mind.

In fine delineations Gautier was pre-eminent, as the following samples amply prove and enabled him to pose as the prince of word-painters.

In an expression of an Oriental day he tells us "the light sparkles, the sun darts arrows of fire, and the heavy silence of burning hours weighs upon the atmosphere." While in Spain, Gautier describes two cypresses backed by the bluesky next to the red walls of the Alhambra, which strike upon his sense like a staccato note, "Those two black sighs of foliage, sad, like a thought of death in the midst of general joy; the only sombre tint in the dazzle of gold, of silver, of azure, of roses." These are enough to characterize the powers of this incessant, fantastic, arbitrary, lawless, vivid and beautiful writer, — a literary artist.

Who of the group of reproducers would have the temerity to tamper with this man's phrases to delude modernites? Or who, dare to filch from the unique and typical Maurice de Guérin's "Centaur," or Keats' "Hyperion," interrupt the "sweet slipping movement" of Spenser, alliterate Lowell's "Biglow Papers"

"But John P.
Robinson he
Saz they didn't know everythin' down in Judee."

Would they dare, and still look through Casa Guidi windows to the sun? Instances are painfully numerous and of much imporance that have been made public, have confronted the contempt of the minority, been met by a quasi-denial from the accused, and finally, controversy has been overborne in the maelstrom of life-interests while the delinquent found half shelter beneath the smiles of a variant public.

Conspicuous in modern times are the plagiarisms found in "Progress and Poverty" so ably exposed by Mr. Sullivan and credited to their true author, Patrick Edward Dove. The moral offence of Henry George was not a crime to be dealt with by severely repressive laws, exile, stripes and the halter, therefore the generalship wrought no wholesome remedy, brought no indemnity. He attempted to "write out" of the scrape.

"The Painters Adventure," by a young French artist named Chatillon, is another instance; brief mention of his lost manuscript, its fate, and where it was published can be found in "The Critic" (May 16th, 1891).

"The lines "Over the River" were communicated to the "Trumpet" over the signature of Anna M. Bates. Subsequently a poem entitled "Over the River," appeared in the Boston "True Flag," July 7th, 1855, bearing the same thoughts, but omitting the author's name. In August, 1857, still another arrangement of the same conceit appeared in the "Springfield Republican" and the lady is said to have been a resident of Hinsdale, N. H. The friend who kindly furnished copies of the three distinct poems gave a few interesting coincidences respecting the writers and added, "I know of nothing in the English language more remarkable than these three poems which so closely resemble each other. Soon after the publication by the Springfield Republican, a war of words arose over the authorship, and if I rightly remember, all three of the writers claimed the honor of originality. I am strongly impressed that neither of the claimants knowingly trespassed on the rights of the other."

"A careful study of each poem will show that the conditions of the inspirations were very similar, and this may explain the seeming plagiarisms. The spirit that could clothe such sentiments in such beautiful language, is not the spirit of one that would willfully wrong another. The poems must ever stand as three of the rarest gems in the poetic world."

A poetical contributor favored a leading journal with a poem not devoid of merit, and having an old familiar air about it; the editor's divining rod brought out the fact of its original appearance in a volume of poems published by a lady more than seventy years before. The sender put the English song into the French tongue for the sake of securing a copyright. Wholesale piracy of this stamp is commonly resorted to. "I can point out," said the editor, "in volumes that now lie upon my table sundry scraps, prose and verse, which were frauds upon their publisher," the productions being slight variations of works that had previously appeared, ushered by more or less famous writers. It develops considerable ambidexterity dealing when an editor in this era dares to deplete a contributor's magazine article, by introducing a portion of it to decorate his own leader in a succeeding number, and he, in our opinion, meets just punishment when a contemporary press adopts the culprit's entire article and applies it to his own locality. Even collectors of autographs possess very little veneration. One vandal filched a page from a book containing the autograph of Queen Elizabeth; a rogue stole Byron's note from the urn in Sir Walter Scott's drawing room, which examples are amazing enough to justify retributive inflictions, yet sure-footed Nemesis is slowing up in pace.

It is also lamentable, but true, that great improvements and discoveries in medicine and surgery have brought persecution to their authors. Instances are too numerous to give in this limit, more than a hint. Ambrose Peré was persecuted for substituting "a mild treatment for cauterizing in gun-shot wounds;" Boylston, for introducing inoculation into New England; Harvey, for his discovery of the circulation of the blood; Jenner, for his discovery of vaccination; Johnson met irritating insistence and he long repelled the attempts to rob him of his rights of discovery of etherization. Such cases require the constant magnetism of a resolute nature to secure vindication. It is somebody's business to remember the petition, "to strengthen such as do stand," and assist the myopic few who lay, "Prop't on beds of amaranth and moly," on the hypothesis that Lot has taken a new lease of life. Living in a pleasing land of "Drowsyhead," waiting with Chinese patience, was not wholesome for one man, who became a reformer, energized himself to elevate the intellectual standard of educators in a country where a man had been sentenced for robbing a church, to serve three years as a schoolmaster. But the man who stole the meeting house gave warm encouragement to a movement looking toward moral progress, and his act seemed to be a solid contribution to the Nation's training, notwithstanding he took large liberties with the texts and creeds. The society was not so fortunate as the Patriarch Abraham who reclaimed his well of Abimelech, because he had made it.

The training, tending and watering season has past; the period of illusions has past. It is time for the public to tolerate frank criticism which belongs to the "open country and the broad day." Here is no Don Quixote searching for enemies to battle with, nor a Guy Fawkes, whom you may seize and bring to judgment as a supposed conspirator with a dark lantern corrupting credulous people, nor a Carlyle to prick through many a bag of bombast and make onslaught with his fine rapier; nor indeed, self-asserting shoulders to push their way regardless of the natures galled by contact. The tripod from which our affluence is distributed, is not made luxurious with padding. Mr. Carlyle may dub the profession "the California of the spiritually vagabond," and our names may be unknown outside the adytum, but we are really necessary to mankind. We may be classed with an oracle "who" his enemies claimed, "was not long ago a noble savage and ran wild in the woods near a famous college, was caught and caged in that institution," and after devoting, like him, a year or two to tobacco, the balance to belles lettres, we received a degree from the faculty and having a "feeling for color," became an items-man and was "made vocal" by the newspapers they "Then think strange things have come to light, Whereof but few have had a foresight."

It is not every victim of "glittering and sounding" injustice and pilfering who has the courage to seek immediate revenge, so sweet to some. The literary forum would become a battlefield entailing a general dissolution of society should repression venture under extreme measures. We need not multiply examples, for unchallenged facts and pointers broaden from "precedent to precedent," from the era of Seneca, ancient Nero's teacher, to the present hour. It is not our problem to shape the form of action the movement should take to correct the evil.

It is possible for each one to enquire what he for his part can do.

In his mind there are many things which plainly should be done; he may do the one enjoined by duty, the general issue will rest with a Higher Intelligence. The penetrating spirit of justice and principles of right will find expression. The geniuses who have forgotten duty and abused it for self glorification, may costume themselves with silence and bar their study doors, despise the salient energy of the "items" and the "critic," but, baffle the chief-detective conscience, they cannot. Renan says of himself, "I often lie in conversation, I never lie when I take a pen in my hand."

Should the pirates row me up "Salt River" according to Willis, it may debar my remark that there are professional adapters who perform a legitimate and economic service for pioneers in literature. Their process is well known to the less fortified novice whose embryonic growth sparkles with brilliant fragments of thought, masked in the quarry, toward which an able redactor will graciously bend, summon out the amenities, cast away the detritus of the work.

The thinkers delve and bring forth the ore, the adapter seizes the nugget and eventuates its currency, thus the honest adapter becomes a beneficiary to the fledgling. J. E. L.

EMILY DICKINSON.

The second volume of Miss Dickinson's poems is reviewed in another column. As, in the years ago, she was a visitor in this city and still has relatives here, it is not amiss to make some further mention of her. It is true that very little can be added to the pleasant little sketch, given by Colonel Higginson in the Atlantic but even this little may be of interest. Her's was not a personality that admitted of a long biography. Her fame is altogether posthumous. Her girlhood in her Amherst home, presided over by that sternest of Puritans, her father, would probably disclose little that is peculiar. Her education, away from home, was had at Mount Holyoke where she was an intimate friend of Miss Fiske, also an Amherst girl and the famous Helen Hunt Jackson of later years. Another friend in the seminary was Mrs. Simeon Newton of State Street, Worcester. In those days, Mrs. Newton recalls her as a modest, retiring girl, with no indications of poetic ability, yet even then possessing some marked peculiarities.

Whence came this ability to express her thoughts in verse? Not even a Galton could find any reason for it among her paternal ancestors. Metered Psalms would include all the poetry that they cared for; but when we turn to the Norcrosses, her maternal relatives, we find literary taste and activity that readily accounts for her own devotion. Not that the Dickinsons were not highly intellectual, for her father and brother have been connected with Amherst from the beginning and her grandfather, a Yale man, was its founder, but prose realities rather than poetic fancies filled their minds. Her uncle, William Dickinson, of this city, was prepared for college but preferred business to school. He sent two sons, however, through college courses. He was himself, always interested in school affairs and was the donor of the bell in the High School tower.

After her death, her sister, Lavinia, to whom she willed her poems, many hundred in number, has with others, as Col. Higginson and Mrs. Todd, made judicious selections for publication. Then it is that her marked peculiarities of manner are the more vividly remembered. After her father's death she would wear white only, and after the dismissal of the Rev. Mr. Jenkins from the Amherst church, she never attended meeting. In a recent Christian Union, a member of this Jenkins family has given a child's recollection of Emily Dickinson. A cousin was an invalid, obliged to be wheeled about in a chair. Emily would never see Cousin H—, but frequently sent bunches of flowers to be tied to the invalid's chair. She was devoted to flowers and to this day, her sister, as far as possible, preserves the grounds and floral display as Emily loved them.

Her last interview with certain near relatives was very peculiar. They had come from a distance and at first she declined a meeting, but later she consented to five minutes conversation each with uncle and aunt in a dark hallway. It was a visit of words only, for vision was impossible. When her father was in Congress, she was in society at the Capitol but afterwards, she almost completely withdrew herself, scarcely appearing save as she and her sister served at the annual lawn parties given by her father at Commencement.

The life, so full of sentiment that no one knew while she lived, must have had a thousand unsatisfied longings. Possibly, in that beyond where she and so many of her kindred are, there may be a fruition unattainable here. Let us hope so.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Mary Howe was married to William J. Lavin, the tenor, last week Monday, at Cleveland, O., at the residence of a cousin of the bride. Mr. Lavin is twenty-seven years old and already holds a very high rank in his profession. The New York Sun says of him that he "is one of the most acceptable tenors who has ever appeared in the Messiah." A bright future seems to be in store for the talented young couple.

The Fair Bugler of Glendale.

BY R. H. HOWARD, PH. D.

In the thriving country village of Glendale there was, at one time, among the young people, an unusually large number of accomplished amateur musicians; and what was quite remarkable, many of these, embracing ladies as well as gentlemen, were skilled in the use of brass, and other wind instruments. In process of time these young musicians organized themselves into a sort of orchestra or band, and played on certain public occasions; or, it may be on Summer moonlit evenings on the village green, for the entertainment of their many admiring friends. They also provided for themselves a natty barge, and on various half-holiday occasions made excursions into adjacent districts and villages, delighting the people with their choice selections. Many a midnight serenade also may be placed to the credit of this unique, charming musical company.

Meantime, one of the most gifted of these amateur artists, and who in this homemade orchestra, always played a leading instrument, was an interesting young lady named Jenny Fowler. Indeed, by common consent, the energy and brilliancy with which this young woman uniformly executed her parts were the delight not to say the astonishment, of all hearers. Everybody confidently predicted for her a very brilliant career on this line, even though never attempting the role of the professional. Unfortunately, however, directly in the midst of these brilliant successes, Miss Jenny's health became sadly unsettled, and also eventually, her mind to a degree, as well. She of course, to our inexpressible regret, dropped out of our band. She went little into society, seldom meeting even her intimate friends. It was understood that her trouble was of a nervous nature, and took the form of melancholia. Strangely, she conceived an aversion to music and seldom if ever touched, or even alluded to her favorite instruments.

Time passed on, weeks lapsed into months. Finally towards the close of a balmy, sunny, Summer's day, our company was making one of its accustomed trips through the rural districts, whether by chance or ofset purpose. I do not now remember, it happened that our route lay in the immediate vicinity of Jenny Fowler's home. Eagerly, as we slowly drove past the premises every eye was strained to obtain if possible, some glimpse of our old time bugler and admired associate. It chanced that the latter was discovered walking by herself in a field near by. Pausing, the band at once struck up and softly played a familiar air. With a surprised and startled look, Jenny stood and gazed upon us listening. Presently one of our number, an intimate lady friend, instrument in hand, ventured to go over to her, and cordially greeting her, to ask her to play. Unhesitatingly she took the instrument, and blew upon it a blast that resounded melodiously far and near. "Give me my bugle," she cried. Her own instrument was straightaway brought and placed in her hands. Putting this to her lips, she proceeded to execute a variety of snatches and passages from well remembered favorites, and with quite all her former vigor, brilliancy and power. Instantly disembarking, our company naturally hastened to gather about her, and with unfeigned enthusiasm and delight, to accompany her in these various performances. The occasion, it needs hardly be said, was one long to be remembered. But what was especially remarkable in connection with this strange occurrence, and suggestive of a most interesting study in physiology, is the fact that the pleasant surprise, as well as mental excitement, incident to this timely diversion on her part, seems to have had the effect of quite restoring Jenny Fowler to her right mind.

The dense cloud, that for some reason had so long drearily brooded her faculties, had suddenly passed entirely away. She was fully herself once more, to the unspeakable delight of her family, and wide circle of tenderly attached friends. Henceforth, as the reader may readily surmise, our music social company was never complete without the presence of the brilliant, accomplished and charming Jenny Fowler, popularly known as the "Fair Bugler of Glendale."

Lincoln's Marvelous Memory.

Abraham Lincoln, says a writer in the Chicago Herald, was perhaps the best man in the country in his day to remember men and to place them without hesitation in the environment where he last saw them. He was first of all a politician, and the politician who forgets is lost. When he was comparatively a young man and a candidate for the Illinois Legislature, he took dinner with a Sangamon county farmer, and after the meal they two stood at the barn-yard gate, talking and whittling. Lincoln's knife needed sharpening and the Yankee in him prompted him to sharpen it. He walked to a tool box the farmer had nailed just inside the wagon shed, took from it a whetstone and came back to the great gate, where he stood again and began sharpening his knife. One post of the gate was very high, and a rod from the top supported the extended weight of the gate. A man came along the road in a wagon, going in the direction Lincoln wanted to travel, and he bade his host good-bye and clambered into the vehicle—intent, no doubt, on getting another vote.

Years afterward, when he was President, a soldier came to call upon him at the white house, and at the first sight the gaunt chief executive said: "Yes, I remember you. You used to live on the Danville road. I took dinner with you one time when I was running for the Legislature. Recollect we stood together out at the barnyard gate and I sharpened my knife?"

"Ya-as," drawled the farmer-soldier, "and wherever did you put that whetstone? I looked the whole place over a dozen times, but I never could find it after the day you used it. We loved mebbey you had took it along with you."

"No," said Lincoln, looking serious, as if the matter were as important as the recent defeat of Pemberton, "no, I put it on top of the gate post—the high one."

"Well!" exclaimed the visitor, "mebbey you did. Couldn't nobody else have put it there, and none of us ever thought to look there for it."

He went on home, and when he got there one of the first things he did was to climb up on the gate and look for the whetstone. It was there, right where it had lain for fifteen years. The honest fellow, adoring his chief, wrote a letter before his furlough expired, telling the President the whetstone was found and never would be lost again.

Mrs. Mary M. Jacobs.

California papers of November contain obituary notices of the death of the wife of Mr. John H. Jacobs, formerly of this city. He was extensively engaged in hardware and junk trade over the firm name of Smith & Jacobs, though latterly he was by himself, with place of business at Lincoln Square and residence on Lincoln Street. Mr. Jacob's failing health compelled the removal of the family, in May 1856, to Southern California. In Worcester, Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs were very prominent members of Grace Church, foremost in all that pertained to the interests of that body. Mr. Jacobs was an efficient member of the official board and Mrs. Jacobs was the soprano of the choir, having one of the clearest and strongest voices ever heard in the church. Their departure from our city was sadly missed.

Mrs. Jacobs was born in Sutton, Vt., February 3d, 1853, the daughter of Dr. W. W. and L. W. Carpenter and Nov. 5, 1873 was married to Mr. Jacobs. Coming to Worcester soon afterward, they resided here till they took the long Western trip. Here their oldest child, Ralph, died, they having one son John on their removal. In California, two children were born to them, a boy and a girl; but the former was early taken by death. Their home by the Pacific was, first, in Los Angeles and second, in South Pasadena; in both places they allied themselves with the local Methodist Church. It seems not a little strange that illness should attack Mrs. Jacobs first, the very ailment, to escape which, Mr. Jacobs had made the trans-continental journey. Consumption claimed a victim, but not the husband and father. Her decline was gradual and peaceful, surrounded by loving friends, among them a sister, Mrs. Beckwith. The funeral was attended by the Rev. J. D. Monroe, her pastor, who was assisted by former pastors, Revs. T. S. Woodcock and J. A. Wood. The choir, in which she had sometimes sung, rendered, most effectively, "Asleep in Jesus," "Thy Will be Done" and "We shall meet Again."

Two of Mrs. Jacob's sisters still reside in Worcester. They are Mrs. Edwin W. Kenerson and Mrs. William N. Berry. Though a broad continent intervenes between her burial place and this, her former home, there are many hearts in Worcester that treasure pleasant memories of the life that is gone and that are filled with sympathy for the sorrowing father and the motherless children.

The Clinton Courant, Nov. 28th, has in full a lecture given by Arthur P. Rugg, Esq., of this city, before The Village Improvement Society of Sterling. LIGHT regrets its inability to transcribe in full his eloquent appeal for the still further beautifying of his native town. Should his advice be followed, Sterling will be one of the most attractive towns in the Commonwealth.

That Little Home.

BY CORNELIA WESSON BOYDEN

There's a little home on a hillside fair,
O'er shadowed by mountains high,
Mid the fragrant breath of the Summer air,
And the pine trees gentle sigh;
Where the sweetest notes of the wild bird's song,
At the waking hour of day,
And the sound of the brook as it glides along,
O'er its bed of stones and clay,
Where the early flowers of Spring time bloom,
And the purple lilac's glow,
Cast a scented shade in the "sitting" room,
While the nodding blossoms blow,
Where the crimson light of the western sun,
Turn the window panes to gold,
As he bids "good night" to the day that's done,
And the curtains of night unfold.

Where the twilight hour falls slowly down,
Like a mantle of softest gray,
And folds the earth in a tender gown,
Ere it swiftly glides away;
And the whip-poor-will with his plaintive cry,
Is heard mid the shadows dim,
While the drooping crickets hovering high,
Are singing their evening hymn.
And the sighing pines in the spicy grove,
Are chanting a low refrain,
That the birds in the branches up above,
Are echoing back again.
And the well-worn path from the homestead door,
That leads to this cool retreat,
Is trodden now as in days of yore,
By the tripping of many feet.

And the coming snows of the Winter drear,
With its garments of ermine white,
Will but add to the homestead's pleasant cheer,
As it follows the Summer's night,
For the glowing fires, and the sunlight's play,
And the happy hearts within,
Will lighten the gloom of the darkest day,
And the grimest of shadows win.

The Joke Reacted.

A good story is told of Bay Middleton, whose name in England is a household word for jokes and escapades of all kinds. It seems that in the house was a guest, who, for some reason, did not bring a smoking-jacket with him, and committed the heinous offense of appearing in the smoking-room in a dress coat. Bay Middleton vowed vengeance against him, and promised him that if he repeated the offense he would tear the coat from his back. The following night the man appeared in the smoking room very late, wearing, as usual, his evening-coat. He took his position before the fire-place, with his arms on the mantle-piece, gazing contemplatively into the fire, and presenting his coat-tails in a tempting fashion to Bay Middleton. The offer could not be refused, and Bay seized the coat-tails and split the coat up to the collar. The victim never moved or said a word. The joke seemed to fall flat. Some one asked him of the split coat why he did not make any objection, upon which he said: "Why should I? As I came down-stairs I went into Bay's room and put on his evening coat."

Good to Eat.

The board of health.—Three square meals a day.—Puck.

Indian Pudding, No. 1.—Three tablespoonfuls of corn-meal, three pints of milk, one tablespoonful of flour, salt to taste, molasses enough to make a batter. Put this mixture into half the milk, scalded; then pour into a well buttered dish, and pour over it the cold milk. Bake in a moderate oven about two hours.

Indian Pudding, No. 2.—Pour one quart of boiling water over five tablespoonfuls of meal, two-thirds of a cup of molasses, one large tablespoonful of butter, ginger, cinnamon and salt, thoroughly mixed. Turn into a buttered dish, and pour over it one cup of cold milk. Bake two hours. F. F. BATTLES.

Massachusetts.

Browned Hashed Potatoes.—Chop two cold boiled potatoes fine, and season. Put one tablespoonful of butter into a frying pan; when hot put in the potatoes, smoothen them carefully over the bottom of the pan, and cook slowly, without stirring, until the potatoes are brown and stick together. Lift with a slice. If more are wanted they must be browned in separate lots.

Lemon Cake.—Two cups of sugar, one-half cup of butter, one cup of cold water, the whites of four eggs, beaten stiff, one large spoonful of baking powder, and two cups of flour. Bake in three layers. For filling, take the grated rind and juice of a large lemon, one cup of sugar, a spoonful of butter, and one cup of water. When boiling, thicken with two spoonfuls of cornstarch dissolved in a little water. Spread very thickly between the cakes, and cover the top of all with the yolks of two eggs, beaten very creamy with confectioners' sugar.

Meat for Mince Pies.

The best proportion of meat for mince pies that I ever tried was beef tongue well boiled, and all the tough outer skin cut off, two parts; and roast mutton, one part. Mutton was the meat used for these pies when first invented, as I have said, but later authorities substituted neat's tongue, then beef's heart, and we come down to quite recent times before we find the tougher fiber of the beef round used. Our pioneer mothers often made mince meat with pork, in lack of other meat, but those blessed dames could make good things out of the most unpromising materials, so well had necessity sharpened their inventive powers. I would not, however, advise my readers to try to emulate them with a pork mince pie; it would be labor wasted. And in advising the use of a proportion of lean, cooked mutton in mince meat I must not fail to warn you never to put in any mutton suet; it is a fatal error. Beef suet must be used, fresh, sweet and dry; the ancient formula was equal parts of beef suet and apples, but if you wisely cut down the proportion of suet to the very smallest amount that you find your family approves, the result will be a decided mellowing of the "mince pie visions" that follow. The goblins are fewer and of a gentler breed, not to say better looking. —Good Housekeeping.

Household.

When in a hurry to boil some preparation for dessert in a double boiler, if the outside portion of the boiler be filled with brine, the inside will boil immediately, owing to the much higher temperature of boiling brine than of boiling water. E. M. L.

California.
For arrow-root blanc mange, use one cupful of milk and two dessert spoonfuls of the arrow root. Flavor with vanilla or rose. Sago may be used instead of arrow-root, but must be soaked an hour in cold water. It requires a little longer cooking than the arrow-root.

Beat the yolk of an egg with two teaspoonfuls of sugar until thick. Pour into a tumbler, rinsing with a little milk. Fill the tumbler with milk. Beat the white to a stiff froth, and stir it in lightly, adding a little grated nutmeg. This is very nutritious and easily digested. Where the patient objects to the raw taste of the egg, boil the milk, and when scalding hot, pour it over the beaten egg and sugar. To be served hot.

For invalids, never make a large quantity of one thing, as they seldom require much at a time, and it stimulates the appetite if variety be provided for them. E. M. L.

California.
To make tea do not use water which has stood in the tea-kettle and been boiled repeatedly. Fill the kettle with fresh water, and use it just as it comes to the boiling point.

To clean mirrors, sponge them perfectly free from all dirt, drying with soft cloths, and when quite dry rub a little powdered blue over the glass, polishing it finally with a soft, old silk handkerchief.

When hot grease is spilled on the floor, pour cold water on it immediately, to prevent it from striking into the boards; then scrape it up.

It is said that silverware furnishes one of the most reliable means of detecting defective drainage. If it is covered with a black coating or tarnish soon after being cleaned, and after a second or third cleaning again becomes darkened, one may be certain that there is something wrong with the drainage system of the house.

The Sand-Bag.

It is very often necessary, says Good House-keeper, to convey artificial warmth to the bed in cases of sickness or with persons of imperfect circulation in cold weather. Hot water bottles, of glass, rubber, or clay, with bricks, soap-stones, billets of wood, and other articles, are employed in the mission; but the handiest and the best, because the most satisfactory, method, is said to be a bag of sand. This may be prepared in almost any way to suit the occasion; but a good plan is to make a flannel bag some eight or ten inches square, which should be filled with fine, perfectly dried sand, the whole being covered with a layer of linen, cotton, or stout canvas. This can be easily and quickly heated by placing it anywhere about the stove or oven where it is not too hot; it can be easily adjusted to the feet, back, chest, or any other portion of the body will retain the heat for a long time, and will in use displace any other agency for the same purpose.

Prof. Miller's Loss.

Every body sympathizes with our genial barber when misfortune overtakes him, but somehow or other he nearly always comes around O. K. He fell off the window ledge and was laid up only a short time. It would have killed any other man in the shop. He had to yield to the Sunday closing act; but he seems to have flourished just the same. A discharged workman took a tramp to the Professor's house and put him to bed there, but the Professor had the drunken fellow locked up. Then Friday, one week ago, he lost a sum of money out of his pocket. With most men the loss would have been complete, but not so with our German friend. It was found and in a most generous manner he rewarded the finder with a V. So well do all his patrons think of Prof. Miller, it is probable that they would have passed around the hat for him, had his going abroad depended on the amount lost. Its finding, however, makes it sure that he will revisit "Fatherland."

Womans' Club.

The address of Mrs. Anna C. Fall of Boston, Wednesday last, on "The Status of Woman under the Laws," was a valuable addition to the long list of worthy lectures already listened to by the Club. Mrs. Fall will be remembered as the woman lawyer who recently won her case when Col. W. S. B. Hopkins was the opposing counsel.

New York Fashions.

Full Dress

costumes receive great attention now, as opera will soon commence and almost simultaneously successive entertainments. For rich fabrics, such as brocade, velvet or Bengaline de soie, princess outlines lead, but are so modified by ideas copied from coat or round styles, that much variety is given and stiffness often done away with. Especially is this the case where the guimpe is introduced, since when made of thin material, it gives softness and even when of heavy plain material, goes to break up lines that might otherwise be too long drawn out. The corselet also is another happy innovation. When of passementerie, the effect is exceedingly rich with finishings of course in keeping, or if in velvet, pretty and almost innumerable contrasts in color may result.

Coats

of velvet, brocade or heavy corded silk worn with skirts of light fabric, such as lace, net, crepe de Chine, etc., are made to open over vests to match and pretty fancies are often brought about by linings of silk that match slips worn under the light material. There are great differences as to shape in these coats and sometimes they have tails at the back, reaching to the end of the skirt. Again they are economical, since transferable from one skirt to another and quite as suitable to silk or fine wool as to lace or gauzes. MME. MAY.

Leonard R. Hudson.

The death of this gentleman, Friday evening of last week, has removed another link between the old days and the present. He was a fireman when Worcester was a town. From 1845, onward for many years, there was very little in the way of firemen history that he did not have a part in. For several years he was in the bakery and confectionery business on Main Street. His home was on Grove Street where he was ever an agreeable host. His figure was conspicuous, not alone for his stature and weight, but for his wealth of white hair and beard. His death was the result of the breaking up, incident to old age, he being above seventy-eight years old.

His funeral was held at his late residence, Tuesday forenoon and was under the direction of Revs. F. A. Gray and D. O. Mears. The attendance was large including friends and relatives and many veteran firemen. Many and emblematic floral tributes were sent by individuals and societies. The burial was in Hope cemetery and the remains were escorted thither by the veteran firemen and by a delegation from the actives. The bearers were A. T. Burgess, Samuel Bigelow, A. H. Sears, A. Rice, L. G. Lincoln, and Jacob Eitd. some of them being old friends and neighbors.

The Achievements of Women's Clubs.

It is through this dominant thought of doing something active for the condition of women, and consequently the rest of mankind, that—after many years of struggle, first by the woman's suffrage societies, then by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and later by the agitation in the clubs—the sex has gained the right to vote on school matters in twenty-eight states in the Union; that women can serve in hospitals as physicians and nurses; that women have been allowed to protect the unfortunate of their own sex as matrons in police stations, or, as in Chicago in the city jails. In two States the right of equal suffrage has been granted, and in several others permission to vote on matters connected with municipal reform. Colleges which in former times denied them the privilege of entrance have opened wide their doors to let them gain the knowledge they desire. These are some of the actual gains of a class of beings to whom was the denied the right, at one time, to learn the alphabet.—Mrs. Alice H. Rhine, in the December Forum.

Mr. A. W. Edson, agent of the State Board, conducted a teachers' meeting in Westminster, Tuesday last.

The Sons of Scotia and Clan Scott will hold a joint celebration of the anniversary of Robert Burns' birthday, January 25.

Next Tuesday evening the Continentals will hold the first of a series of socials in Continental Hall. The floor committee will include Capt. C. A. Waite, Lieut. N. E. Mansfield, Sergt. George H. Cutting, Sergt. F. M. Clark, Jr., and Private C. D. Thayer. The others in the series will take place January 7 and 27.

Dr. Frank H. Howland has one of the best dove cotes in the state. His birds always command the highest prices. He has just sent a pair of white Fantails to San Diego, Cal., for $30. There is something besides fun in such a hobby.

George K. Robinson, the oldest son of William L. Robinson of this city, has been engaged by J. B. Mackie, the proprietor of the "Grimes Cellar Door" Company, as his leading support in that play. He will take the part of Josiah Grimes.

A former pupil of Mrs. Ware has lately visited that lady in her Boston school and finds her more than pleasantly situated. Obviously the "Hub" appreciates a good teacher.

The Central Massachusetts Poultry Club has concluded that Horticultural Hall will not be large enough for its exhibition and so has engaged Mechanics Hall. The dates of the exhibition are January 26, 27 and 28.

Last week Friday evening Rev. Austin S. Garver gave a reception to the members of his congregation at his residence at the corner of Lancaster and Highland Streets. Besides social intercourse there was dancing in the hall at the top of the house. A large number attended in spite of the rain.

Police Ball.

The fifth annual concert and ball of the Worcester Police Relief Association will be held in Mechanics Hall next Wednesday evening. The Worcester Brass Band will furnish the music.

A. A. Goddell Camp, Sons of Veterans, held a social in Grand Army Hall last evening.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Two entertainments were given this week by the School of English Speech, the proceeds from which will be used to furnish a ward in the Washburn Memorial Hospital. The first took place Monday evening in Horticultural Hall and the pupils who gave recitations were Miss Nellie Delany, Mr. Harry Hosley, Miss Mabel King, Miss Edith Hardy, Miss Mary Howard, Miss Sadie Parsons, Miss Lulu Isaacs, Miss Ella Johnson. They were assisted by Miss Genevieve Burke, soprano; Miss Alma Collins, contralto; Mr. Arthur Hanson, violinist; Miss Mamie Kuddy and Mr. Ben Hammond, accompanists; Mrs. W. E. Bowen, reader. It had been planned to give "The Dolls' Hospital," but on account of the illness of one of those who were to take the parts it was postponed. The second of the entertainments was given last evening.

Mechanics' Course.

The Boston Rivals gave the third entertainment in course A, Monday evening. The company includes Miss Elizabeth Hamlin, soprano; Felix Winternitz, violinist; Albert F. Conant, pianist; Mrs. Jessie Eldridge Southwick, reader. The names alone warrant that the entertainment was excellent. Next Monday evening, in course B, the Lithatans quartet will give a concert with the assistance of Olive Mead, violinist.

Friday Populars.

Next Friday evening the third of this course of entertainments will be given in Mechanics Hall, when Prof. J. B. DeMotte will give a lecture on electricity, illustrated by many experiments.

BOOKS AND BOOKMEN.

Wedding Bells. Here is something decidedly new and pretty. The title page has Cupid in the center with an arrow drawn almost to the barb. Above him a bird carries a ring in his beak. In one corner is a picture of a church, whence comes of course, the "Mellow Wedding Bells, Golden Bells." In another corner are those oft quoted words from Longfellow, beginning, "As unto the bow the cord is, etc." It is a book for marriage records designed by Mrs. H. Emilie Taylor of this city. This is an age of birthday books and autograph albums and this beautiful book is designed to receive the names of your married friends, there being properly arranged spaces under each month. Then, too, there are most apt quotations for the several months, and your first act will be to turn to the month of your marriage to find what its sentiment is. It is a pretty specimen of book making, in white and gold and may be had at the book stores for 40 cents.

Our Little Men and Women for December is a charming number, full of delightful pictures and pretty stories and verses. The little folks will be sure to hail it with joy. It is printed on fine paper, in large type. The magazine is both entertaining and instructive, and is suitable for children whose ages range from five to nine. A year's subscription will make the very best of Christmas presents. The price is only $1.00 a year, 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Publishers.

Inglis' Home and Art Magazine, Published by J. F. Inglis, Lynn, Mass.

As the name indicates, this is a magazine given wholly to art and the home. It takes up decoration of almost everything whether done in water color, oil, scorch work or china painting. All directions are very clear and this number has many articles especially adapted for the coming holidays. Price fifteen cents per number, or one dollar per year.

Table Talk, published by the Table Talk Company, Philadelphia, Penn.

As with all the other monthlies so this shows the near approach of the holidays. It has Christmas dinner, Christmas eve, Christmas decorations, Christmas gifts and a Christmas poem. The question and answer column holds a deal of useful information and the new menus are a feature which will prove a great help to the housewife. Price per year $1.

The Little New Neighbor, by Mary D. Brine, illustrated by Miss A. G. Plympton. E. P. Dutton & Company, New York. $1.

The children look eagerly for a new book from this author for she is deservedly popular among them. She has a way of reaching the little hearts that is not attained by every writer for the children. In fact we think it a gift that comparatively few possess. The dainty heroine has moved into a new place situated in the country and, with her cat, proceeds to make acquaintances among the people around her. Everybody calls her the new neighbor and she finally calls herself by that name. The pictures are so dainty, the cover so attractive, in its white, gilt and colors, and it is in every way such a lovely book that we hope many a child will find it among his Christmas gifts. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

The January Atlantic Monthly will have an article of peculiar interest on James Russell Lowell, by Henry James. It will be largely devoted to the remarkable success of Mr. Lowell as U. S. Minister at London, and to the greatness and charm and superlative patriotism which marked his character.

The most remarkable piece of news in the literary world this week is the announcement that William Dean Howells will sever his connection with Harpers and will become one of the editors of the Cosmopolitan Magazine.

Short Studies in Literature by Hamilton Wright Mabie, New York, Dodd, Mead & Company, 1901, $1 25.

A book full of interest to the book lover or to him who loves to think about Johnson and the many others who have reigned as literary kings. There are forty chapters, each one devoted to some phase of literature and each one, as the writer says, so suggestive that it might easily be expanded into a book. The chronic novel reader and the dissipated absorber of sensation, clap-trap papers would find this book dull reading; but he who has fed on good healthful literature will cut and turn these pages with genuine delight. Our writer betrays a familiarity with the book makers of the past and he passes them in review as his chapters progress. It is a book for the teacher of literature to fill up from as he appears before his classes. Whether Mr. Mabie's illustrations be drawn from Greek, Indian, Hebrew, German, French or English sources they are alike inspiring. It is a charming series of essays, every one bearing the stamp of thorough study and reflection. There are few readers of good books who can forego its possession. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

Physical Development and Exercise for Women, by Mary Taylor Bissell, M. D., New York, Dodd, Mead & Company, 1901, $1 25.

Here is a book for parents and for girls. Not alone for mothers but for fathers as well, that they may intelligently suggest rules of health to their growing daughters. Many books on this subject are already in existence, all having their excellent points, but this one does more than point out their imperfections, it suggests means of improvement. The subjects treated are under the following heads. I. Symmetry and Health. II. How we grow. III. How environment may influence Growth. IV. The Influence of Dress on Physical Development. V. The Influence of School on Physical Development. VI. The Influence of Exercise on Development. VII. Some things that Exercise will do for the Body. VIII. The Ways and Means for Exercise. IX. Practical Suggestions. The volume is practical enough for a text book and in judicious hands may save many a woman from life-long illness. Everywhere the woman killing corset gets a deserved whack. For this reason, if for no other, the book should be read by millions; for not the individual alone but all her descendants are liable to be effected by her way of living. "The Influence of School" is a very valuable treatise, setting forth the ills that come to our young people through the constrained attitudes too often assumed there. Dr. Bissell clearly portrays what the perfect form is and illustrates how means may be taken to attain it. The gymnastics, described under "Practical Suggestions," if persisted in will bring about most salutary results. We cannot be too careful in so important a matter and any teacher who will point to a better life, physical, mental or moral is a benefactor. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

Decorated China.

Miss Emma Gladwin, daughter of Prof. George E. Gladwin, is exhibiting in Room 9, Burnside Building, some beautiful specimens of her handiwork. Nothing lovelier was ever shown in Worcester. Those liking this form of art will do well to call early as some of the choice pieces are already sold. Along with this decorated china are many sketches made by Prof. Gladwin in his rambles, north and south. Here are icebergs from Labrador, oranges from Florida and homelier scenes from points nearer Worcester. Parties looking for Christmas gifts will do well to call and see what this room affords.

Hancock Club.

This body after nine months of being, held its annual meeting last Tuesday night and, in addition to partaking of a collation, re-elected Harry W. Anderson, President, and other officers as follows: Vice-president, S. A. Willis; secretary, Elmer H. Loring; treasurer, F. R. Burgess; board of managers—Rev. F. G. Burgess, H. A. Howe, W. E. Holmes, J. A. Shaw, C. H. Davis, E. L. Parker and G. L. Allen. House committee—G. L. Allen, E. H. Day and John A. Lowe; membership committee, E. L. Parker, Rev. F. G. Burgess, S. C. Earle, G. W. Mirick and J. F. Crowell.

The club room is in W. H. Sawyer's building, on Lincoln Street and everything indicates success in the past and prosperity for the future.

Mr. Jehiel Todd is very dangerously ill at his home, 105 Austin Street, and it is feared that he will not recover. Mr. Todd is a deacon in Plymouth Church and has long been one of its most active workers. He was formerly in the wholesale spice and coffee business, with headquarters on Union Street and his coffee, in particular, had a wide reputation for its excellence. But for several years past he has been with J. A. Long, the furniture dealer. At the business meeting of Plymouth Church Tuesday evening, resolutions, expressing the sympathy of the members, were drawn up and sent to Deacon Todd.

BARNARD, SUMNER & Co.

It's wicked.

Positively wicked, to sell Portiers for the price you can have them for to-day.

You've heard lots about the "McKinley" bill.

One result of it we'll tell you about this morning, because it will give you the reason for the wicked prices placed on this lot of Portiers.

The result of that much talked-of bill is that Portier will hereafter be made in this country.

The foreign makers want to close out their stocks before the American goods get on the market.

We've bought the stocks of several of them—as you know—at very low prices, and sold them to at different times during the Fall.

And the price is—

It's so very low that when you consider the excellence you will agree with our opinion.

The 7 1/2 inch ones are worth from $15 to $18 a pair.

We'll sell them for—

Two dollars and fifty cents each curtain.

Your home ought to be your world.

Brighten it in all ways and increase the sum of happiness for all.

Portiers will help greatly.

You have the opportunity to-day

If you are wise, you'll come quickly and make selection.

Two dollars and fifty cents each curtain.

You'll find them on the second floor in the Upholstery department.

BARNARD, SUMNER & Co.

NO. 545 MAIN STREET, FRANKLIN SQUARE,
WORCESTER, MASS.

Our fitting and prescription department will be in charge of Dr. W. H. Draper, late professor of ophthalmology at Optical Institute, Boston, Mass., who is an optical specialist of long standing and wide reputation. He will make free examinations of the eye, and we will furnish the glasses at the following prices:—

GOLD SPECTACLES, $4 to $6.

GOLD EYE-GLASSES, $3 to $5.

STEEL SPECTACLES AND EYE-GLASSES, $1 to $2.50.

Compound cylindrical lenses proportionately low.

Entertainments.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Silver Age," a western play, in which the villain is foiled and virtue and innocence are triumphant in the end, has drawn crowded houses every evening this week at the Pleasant Street Theater. The matinee performances are well attended, the gentle sex predominating. Miss Katherine Rober as Lena Wilder, the heroine and the bright, particular star of the mining town of Silver Age, easily carries off the honors at each performance. Miss Rober is a charming little actress, whose personality and rare talent have succeeded in winning for her many admirers both on and off the stage. Max Freeman as Capt. Jack Caton, U. S. A., steers justice in its proper course and makes it a point to see that the villain is foiled in the regulation way. Mr. William Cattell deserves especial mention for the realistic manner in which he portrays the death of the outlaw in the final act. His conception and rendition of the character are among the features of the performance. The laughable farce, "Statue Blanch," which precedes each performance, is the work of Mr. John Phillips. It is one of the best farces ever given at the theater and keeps the audience in laughter from the beginning to the end. Miss Frankie Bell as the statue made a very pretty picture.

Mr. Charles Barringer and Miss Kate Glassford will bring "Si Slocum," a sensational melo-drama, in which the late Frank L. Frayne made such a phenomenal success, to the theater next week. "Si Slocum," with a nerve of iron and a heart of gold," will be in the capable hands of Mr. Barringer, who is every inch an actor. Ruth Slocum, the wife of the hero, "a true American woman," is well adapted to Miss Glassford's genius. Miss Grace Hamilton, as Grace Townsend, will make her first Worcester appearance. She is bound to be successful, as she has the benefit of an experience in some of the best companies on the road, among them Daniel Frohman's celebrated New York company. Miss Hamilton has a host of acquaintances who will be glad of the opportunity afforded them of witnessing a performance in which she is to take a leading part.

Mr. J. Gordon Edwards, an actor for a long time connected with Lothrop's Stock Company, but of late with the Joseph Haworth Dramatic Company, has been again secured by the management and will be seen here next week. The patrons of the house are in for an unusual dramatic treat.

Firemen's Ball.

The eleventh concert and ball of the Worcester Firemen's Relief Association was held in Mechanics Hall last week Friday evening and was a success, in spite of the bad storm. Reeve's band of Providence furnished the music both for the concert and for the dancing.

Last evening in Old South Church, Albert L. Bacheller, of Lowell, repeated his lecture of last March, on famous personages in English history. As before, it was illustrated by persons costumed to represent the characters.

"He that is down needs fear no fall."

Christmas Work.

Linen Sachet.

A very pretty sachet for the bureau of a little girl is made from two pieces of white linen, each twelve inches long and six inches wide.

A quaint figure of a little girl in Kate Greenaway costume is etched on the linen, and a fold of white cotton batting is plentifully sprinkled with orris powder mixed with violet sachet powder, and placed between the two pieces of linen.

These pieces are then buttonhole-stitched together with coarse white silk, and small bows made of white baby ribbon are tacked at each corner.—Household.

Pincushion.

An ordinary wooden spoon is first Aspinlled white, and when dry, painted with small flowers and grasses in sienna brown and gold bronze. A small cushion of light blue satin is fixed in the bowl of the spoon with glue, and the spoon trimmed with light blue ribbon.—Home Magazine.

An Ear of Corn.

This is a pretty device for the handle of a hot tea or coffee pot. It is made from a ball of corn color knitting silk as follows: Steel needles, medium size. Cast 40 stitches, knit plain across, carry two threads. Knit five stitches with one thread; carry second thread over and knit five more. Knit five more with first thread.

So continue until the forty stitches are knit, representing eight kernels of corn. On return seam five stitches, then carry the thread over inside and seam five more. So continue to seam until across. Make the holder about one-eighth of a yard long. Gather one end and crochet around it in single crochet, to form a point, and frill a crochet of shell stitch on the other end.—Household.

A Crystal Catch-All.—The small glass globes which come for many and varied uses, such as holders for fresh flowers, for spent matches, etc., may be beautifully decorated if you are anything of an artist. They come in different sizes, but those from four to six inches in diameter are the prettiest. Take your oil colors and paint upon them field flowers and grasses, all springing upward from the bottom. Cover the glass with the design, but make it light,—not putting it on too thickly, but leaving an effect of delicacy. Under the curling "lip" of the glass tie a satin ribbon of pale blue, green, gold, or amethyst, finishing with a bow. Under this bow tie an end of the ribbon; leave sufficient by which to hang it, and tie the end on the opposite side with a small bow. They make very graceful little gifts where your own handiwork, and but small outlay, are sought.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

A small plush bag for holding an opera glass is a pleasing gift. An oblong piece of pasteboard forms the foundation of the bag. It should be five inches long and one and a half inches wide, with rounded corners. The pasteboard is covered with plush on the bottom and satin on top. Two pieces of plush with satin lining are sewed to the foundation, and silk draw-strings the color of the plush are run through a casing at the top. Olive plush and old-gold satin is a good combination.—Good Housekeeping.

CROUPY SOUNDS

At night, from baby's crib, are distracting to parents who are at a loss for a medicine equal to the efficacy. Not so with those who have Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in the house. A dose of this medicine affords certain and speedy relief. To cure colds, coughs, sore throat, asthma, bronchitis, hoarseness, and the various disorders of the breathing apparatus, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has no equal. It soothes the inflamed tissue, promotes expectoration, and induces repose. Cap. U. Harley, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children were subject."

"I use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my practice, and pronounce it to be unequalled as a remedy for colds and coughs."—J. G. Gordon, M. D., Carroll Co., Virginia.

satisfy a great many clothing dealers so well that they persist in the practice season after season.

The fact that every face that comes into the store is a new face never seems to trouble them, or tell them the most important of all facts in the building up a reliable business.

New faces are welcome in any store, but it is never wise, or good, business, to simply make a sale to the visitor.

It's

The "COME AGAIN" TRADE

that constitutes a business worthy of the name. The "come again" trade is only won by the fairest kind of dealing, by the fairest kinds of goods, and fairest of all prices.

In CUSTOM CLOTHING

we have names on our books that never have been on the books of any other clothing house.

Every Suit of Clothes and every Overcoat they have ever worn was made for them by us.

We know exactly what their taste requires. We never make the mistake of putting into their garments things that will offend them. There is no need to caution us in this direction or that. We know what'll suit them, and we see that they have it.

Then again, there are in our employ to-day men and women who have made CUSTOM CLOTHING for us for so many years that they are not only familiar with all our particular ways, but are full of the spirit of our purpose—that nothing but perfection shall go out with the Ware, Pratt Co.'s goods and name.

All this helps to add month after month to WHAT WE CALL BUSINESS,

The "COME AGAIN" CUSTOMERS, whose wishes our salesmen know, and whose interests they guard at all times and in every way.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1891.

No. 16

"Which is best,—to build a light-house,
Storm and tempest to withstand,
Or to build the buoyant life-boat
Always ready to be man'd?
Is it best to save the ves'els
From becoming total wrecks,
Or to snatch a few poor wretches
From the brine-besprinkled decks
Of the wrecks each year occurring
For the want of warning light?
Ought we not to save the ves'els
And direct their course aright?"

Read the sentiment first.

See how well it fits the present emergency.
Tuesday's vote was for the light-house.

It was the record that did it. Figures may or may not lie, but the constantly paraded contrast did its work.

Those black figured columns in the Telegram could not be overlooked. Nearly three to one arrests for drunkenness in license months as against the same time under no license.

Where is the croaker with his stereotyped statement, "Just as much rum drunken under no license as under license." He will make his appearance soon. Look out for him and close his mouth with the record.

What a turn about! Last year, license by over a thousand majority; this year, no license by more than four hundred! Truly Worcester is the banner city of the Commonwealth. The brigade of workers for "personal liberty" was behind the bar dealing out fluids. Next year it will be at liberty to organize again.

What is needed is the securing of no license two successive years and then the brigade will have to go to work. It cannot afford to pay rent for unused bar rooms, two years running. The profits are such that it can pay rent and lie idle, one year but not longer. The second year is what we must look for now. When citing the influences that brought about the decisive "No," we must not overlook the work of the young people. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor along with the Epworth League has made itself a potent factor in this cleansing labor. It is the first time that these bodies have taken a direct part, but probably not the last. It was an inspiring sight to see young men driving vehicles, bringing to the polls those who would help along the opposition to the rum power. The names of these organizations have grown to mean something.

Amidst so much hurly-burly, incident to politics, it is a great pleasure to turn aside to the peaceful life that at Danvers, Thursday, the 17th, entered upon its 85th year. John G. Whittier was born in Amesbury 1807. Long beyond the lives of his associates has his life been prolonged. Those who fought with him the battles for Freedom have passed on; but he remains, the grandest of them all. However much we may revere those who have set New England in the fore front of thought, we must ever accord to Whittier the place nearest to the popular heart.

One of the most notable publications of the state, for several years, is that recently sent out by the Secretary of the State Board of Agriculture with reference to abandoned or partially abandoned farms of Massachusetts. The City of Worcester has no such land as any one may safely conclude who has ever tried to purchase a house lot. These farms are mostly in the towns remote from the centres of population, though Charlton has fifteen and Dana but one. Fitchburg has two, a fact that is not to the credit of our sister city. Leicester has one, but the electric railroad will soon obviate that. Boylston has one. Otherwise, our contiguous towns seem disposed to hold on to their land. If something would drive people from the cities to the country, a better condition would follow.

At last it appears that the final government action with reference to the new Post Office has been taken and that, in the near future, work will begin. Curiosity is on tip toe to know just how the edifice will look, behind the Flat-Iron Block, but very likely some way will be devised to get rid of that. If the same public spirit that drew the office to that section of the city will remove the objectionable building in the angle, many will be glad. What many fear is that the cost of it will be thrown upon the city. That will arouse opposition.

The recently received news that a son of Kit Carson had shot and killed his father-in-law in Colorado and that Joaquin Miller's son had "held up" a stage coach in California make it apparent that the twig was not properly bent in their childhood. Carson, the elder, was a man of action, quick, alert, daring, but not capable of a cowardly act. Miller, it is claimed, has always neglected his son. "Look to your hearths, My Lords," was said by Catiline for another purpose, but it will apply here. Our homes are what we make them. Our children will be as we rear them. Street education will make rowdies of them. Know where the children are. Labor for them now and in later years your hearts will not ache for them.

This is one of the weeks when store windows look their very best. Wednesday afternoon, the schools were not in session and as a consequence the little folks were out in crowds taking in the free sights that enterprising merchants had provided. True, there was no snow, no sound of merry sleigh bells and Santa Claus, if on his way, was taking his journey on wheels, still the streets were thronged with a happy company of easily pleased people. That it became, used exclamation, "Oh!" was used till it was, if possible, rounder than ever. Very likely all the beholders were not purchasers, but they did get a deal of satisfaction from the free show. The merchant gets his returns in no way sure. The smiles in front of his store must have been, at times, as light bearing as the gas jet and may have delayed lighting it. It is a good thing to please the little folks.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Patti receives five thousand dollars a night, besides a share of the profits, during her tour of the United States, this season.

Tschaikowski has composed a striking overture to Byron's "Manfred."

An American "society" lady, who wished to entertain her friends at a party by having Paderewski play for them, asked for his terms. He placed them at one thousand dollars.

New York critics seem to consider Paderewski's concert to R ubinstein.

M. Guonod, the composer, who is 74 years of age, has been seriously ill but is now better. Some months ago, he had a cerebral attack, which seriously affected his eye-sight. He cannot read without spelling each word and does not write at all. He considers his career as finished and never hopes to write the score of another opera. M. Guonod lives very secluded with his family, seeing only his intimate friends.

"A few weeks ago, I gave two working girls tickets for a concert of a superior class. I have just seen one of them and, in thanking me, she said, 'I never was at a concert in my life.' I felt distressed. No sweet voices, no melodious choirs, no grand organ ever charmed and elevated this girl. The concert was in a chapel. Why not? Cannot Christians use their chapels and choirs a little more in this way and so make many a poor girl feel like an angel and a saint." Ex. The Worcester churches began this good work some time ago and what the Bostonians are just beginning to do with their working peoples' concerts, has been done to a degree for several years in Worcester, by the musical organizations of our churches. At Central, Salem Street, Pilgrim, Piedmont, Grace and other churches high class concerts have been given and, though they were not always free, the price of admission has been very small, only large enough to meet any expense that has incurred.

Mr. Thomas F. Anderson has severed his connection with the Boston Globe to accept a position of Press Agent of the New York & New England Railroad. Mr. Anderson is widely known in journalistic circles, and is particularly well qualified to fill the position to which he has been appointed.

There are no abandoned farms in the city of Worcester, but Mr. F. J. Kinney of Tattuck left his long enough to run down to Boston and address the New England Farmers on Market Gardening, last Saturday.

Before you start out on your Christmas round of shopping, be sure to look through Light's list of advertisers and give them the benefit of your buying. Every business advertised here is first class, no matter what the line is, it is the very best. Read carefully every advertisement.

The next paper will be out, Thursday, the 24th. Boys should call for their at 6. p. m.

Light deems itself specially fortunate in being able to present a letter on Milestones from Mrs. Freeland of Sutton, the able historian of the town of Oxford. Her explanation leaves little to be desired concerning this interesting question.

It is children's week, too, at Barnard & Sumner's. The south window is filled with objects for the children's special delectation. Of course, the window separates the little ones from the glorious sights, but how they would like to be inside. The north window is another triumph of the decorative art. Who would think so much could be done with handkerchiefs!

Mr. and Mrs. William H. Chandler went down to Ashland Tuesday evening to attend the installation of the Order of the Eastern Star.

Mrs. S. D. Leland and son of Holyoke are visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Felix De Camp, of Dix Street. In the years past Mrs. Leland was a pupil in the High School, a Normal School graduate and a Worcester teacher.

Prof. Gladwin's Book.

There are many people, not all in Worcester, who are anxiously awaiting the Professor's book. It is sure to be one of interest and well worth keeping. It will be a good souvenir volume.

A Literary Contest.

Light is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at Light's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Furniture dealers are hardly supposed to make special displays for Christmas, for they furnish the framework on which may hang the more delicate fabrics of special display, but the Putnam, Sprague Company has found some of the most beautiful material in all forms of cabinet make for their show windows. The hand of man is very skillful.

The Belmont, at the Lake, under the management of W. M. Fay, is enjoying a well deserved reputation as a place for anniversary parties and dinners. The railroad connection makes communication easy and the dinners could not be better. The veterans of the 4th Heavy Artillery, who went down there last week, were admirably treated.

Miss Nellie York.

This young lady, Worcester reared, made a most excellent impression last Sunday afternoon in Mechanics Hall as she read before the immense audience gathered there, "A Voice from the Poor House." She has a well trained voice, fine personal appearance and thorough appreciation of what she reads.

This is the only store that has an umbrella trade large enough to maintain a separate department of umbrellas.

Having the largest trade is the unspoken evidence that prices are the lowest here.

We engrave the handle of every umbrella sold, free of charge.

Lamps.

Downstairs, to the right.

We have just opened the most commodious and pleasant lamp department in Worcester.

One-half side of the basement is transformed into a blaze of light and vision of beauty never before seen in the city.

The stock is as large as all the similar stocks in all other city lamp stores put together.

We are sole agents for the best lamp there is—the Pittsburg; and our prices are less than what is being asked for inferior makes.

500 Pittsburg lamps in a row.

Plush Toilet Sets.

Right aisle.

A useful gift is good; one combining usefulness with beauty is better.

Plush and silver toilet sets, perfumery, manicure, shaving, jewel, and glove cases, are most conspicuous combinations of extreme usefulness with great beauty.

The prices—depend upon it—they are lower than elsewhere.

The list of things is as long as childhood's hours.

Japanese Toys.

Downstairs, too.

The little folks will think themselves in dreamland while among them. These toys are all so different from the toys of other nations that even grown people are often lost in admiration.

"We are all children of larger growth."

Silverware.

Downstairs.

We carry the Hartford Silver Plate Co.'s quadruple-plate wares.

We have about every article on their list you are likely to ask for.

This ware is sold elsewhere in Worcester. But we make the lowest prices. Fact!

We fully guarantee every piece sold. The company is behind us.

Candlesticks.

Right aisle.

Sweet and pretty beyond description.

New York society is agog over them, and in every comfortable home the kindly light of candles glimmers quaintly. We can supply everybody—candles, candlesticks, shades.

A corner of Japan.

Downstairs.

The Japanese department is now in its glory.

We have the largest and nicest stock of Jap goods in New England without exception.

It is almost a universal custom to put absurdly high prices on Jap wares; it's necessary for stores to do so that depend upon indirect and costly methods to buy their goods.

The Syndicate sent a man to Japan; bought largely; imported direct; and our prices are a surprise.

DENHOLM & MCKAY COMPANY.

Wellesley.

The last two or three weeks before vacation always seem to pass very slowly in spite of the fact that they are unusually busy, but at last vacation has come. College closed at noon, Dec. 16, for a recess of three weeks.

Since we last wrote, we have been addressed by Dr. Mabie, Home Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Union, and by President Andrews of Brown University. Dec. 8 Mme. Hopekirk gave a fine piapo recital.

Sunday evening, Dec. 14, the usual Christmas Vesper Service was given by the organist and several of the students.

Dec. 15, the Beethoven Society, assisted by Miss Estelle Andrews of Boston, gave a concert, consisting of solos, choruses, and a short Christmas cantata.

Dec. 17.

Mrs. Lillie Wilkinson has been confined to her home on Pleasant Street since Thanksgiving on account of inflammation of the eyes. But she is now recovering the use of them and will soon be able to be out.

For The Truants.

It was long since demonstrated that if we would make the bad, good, we must do something besides punish. It is this thought that has prompted the construction of the building whose picture adorns the first page of LIGHT this week. It is in Oakdale, the first station North of West Boylston, on the Boston & Maine railroad. Here the track of the Massachusetts Central crosses the B. & M. and thereby the School may be readily reached from all parts of the county.

Quite too long, a certain element among our boys has been sent to the Reform School at Westboro or, as in this city, to the Truant School at the City Farm. Having the life-long interest of the boys at heart, it was decided, some months since by the County Commissioners to erect a centrally located building and in it to gather such lads as home surroundings had failed to properly train. The building is up: how do you like it?

Worcester County does not command a finer outlook than that which may be had from the west porch of this structure. Having decided upon this central place for the school, the commissioners could not have done better than they did in taking this slope of thirty-six acres. Upon it, the sun shines the entire day, and the vista of fertile fields, threading railroads, and busy factories must prove in the years to come an inspiration to the lads whose home this is to be. Leaving the cars at the Union Station, we have to retrace our steps and finally take quite a climb up a new road, through what will, eventually, be a beautiful park appendage to the grounds. By a gradual ascent, this leads up to the building, which, another season, will be surrounded by the greenest of lawns. Our eyes rest upon a commodious structure, two stories and an attic high, in the shape of a Greek cross. The length, north and south is 113 feet, east and west 90 feet, yet so well adjusted are the parts, the arms of the cross would seem to be of equal length. Fuller and Delano of this city are the architects. The walls are of brick with mottled Conway trimming; the construction was done by Joseph Vaudreuil also of Worcester. The slate roof was laid by the O'Gara Brothers of Worcester, while the foundation was put in by the late C. F. Batchelder, a Worcester contractor. The north and south wings are each 34x25 feet, while the west, main frontage is about sixty feet in length. The impression on nearing the edifice is imposing and happy at the same time.

As the superintendent, Mr. Frank L. Johnson is here let us walk up the graveled path to the front door and push the button, for all that electric signaling can do has been introduced here, Mr. C. F. Page of Worcester, doing the work and putting in, at Mr. Johnson's suggestions, about a mile of insulated wire. Today, the superintendent will answer but, by and by, one of the boys will be on hand to respond. Going into the main hall we find at the left the superintendent's office, a spacious room, and at our right, the reception room. Further east, on the north side, is the family dining room, which is separated by windows, only, from the much larger room where the boys will take their meals. Returning to the hallway, we enter the library adjacent to the beautiful school room. Here is shelf room for more than a thousand books, with a large table in the center. Here the call boy, with an electric indicator above him, will sit ready to answer signals. To select books for these shelves, will be one of the most delicate and, at the same time, most important tasks for the immediate future. Then we pass into the school room. It will be a revelation to most of the unkempt urchins who are to be trained here for manhood. More than one-half the school children of New York City are very far from having such comforts as this room promises. All day, the sun will shine upon it and with a sunny teacher within, we may expect glorious results from work done here.

In the attic, there is the tank, fed from a living spring on the hill-side, which supplies all parts of the premises. Also here is ample space for rainy day play and for drilling which the boys will, also, be taught. Should we go down stairs again, we might inspect the ample kitchen, with its range and oven, the room for sewing, the pantry, the refrigerator and the rooms for attendants. Descending still further, we shall find the laundry, the lavatories for the boys, the bath rooms, the heating appliances and the gas machine. The system to which these lads are to be subjected is admirable; but nothing in the whole scheme will strike an outsider more favorably than the individual bath rooms. There are Ascending an easy flight of stairs, we may enter the dormitory where every boy is to have a bed of his own. This room is quite as large as the school room, being just over it, both being in the south wing. The ceiling is finished upon the rafters and while there may be fifty boys here, all will have good air. The bedsteads are of iron, with wire-woven springs whereon are laid hair mattresses, good enough for a king. The attendant sleeps in an adjacent room, having windows connecting. A small room on the west side has numbered spaces where every boy, on going to bed, will hang his apparel. On the north side, just over the boys' dining room is the large room to be devoted to actual manual training, and it begins to look as though Worcester's mischievous boys were about to get what is sixteen of them supplied with hot and cold water. Contrast such conveniences with the great tub into which fifty boys at Westboro used to plunge, at once. Truly, the world moves. In boxes, provided and numbered, every boy will place his out of doors foot wear and will don a pair of slippers before going up stairs. When he enters the institution, his old clothing will either be sent home or destroyed. He will be clothed in a nice blue uniform and when he goes away he will be given a nice suit.

On the farm of thirty-six acres there will be work for the boys. There will be little idleness, nor will it be all work, for Mr. Johnson has reserved an excellent base ball field. On the pond, just made for the newly built ice house, the boys may skate in Winter. South of the school is a very large and convenient barn where will be kept six cows and a span of horses. Of course, as much work as is reasonable will be exacted from the lads, for their own good and for that of the public.

What will come of it? After going over and through this palatial outfit, one is possessed with the notion that boys will have to be driven away rather than restrained, for the restraint is no more than that of any good home. Nay, there is danger that its fame will so pass out that boys may play truant that they may be sent here for to the vast majority of the lads, whose temporary home this is to be, it will be, to their real home surroundings, like a palace instead of a hovel. This manner of dealing with juvenile offenders is an experiment but in competent hands it must prove a success for it is right. The County Commissioners, Hon. Henry G. Taft of Uxbridge, Hon. Emerson Stone of Spencer and Hon. Charles J. Rice of Winchendon have done what will redound to their credit for years to come. The Commonwealth is watching the Worcester County experiment. There is going in it and they will make it go.

When the County Commissioners had progressed so far as to nominate a superintendent for their new school in Oakdale, they did not have to look long for their man for they found him very near at hand, the Superintendent of the Spencer schools, a gentleman who had given to the school of that town a reputation much more than local. Assuming his duties, the first of November, the hand of Mr. Johnson has been evident in many ways. Early and late, he is on the grounds, planning directing and everywhere prompting the work now nearing completion. An enthusiast in the matter of electricity, he has so strung wire about the premises, that from his office he can signal and direct almost everything in the school. The system under his intelligent explanation, will itself be a school for all who have to do with the building.

Mr. Johnson is a native of Springfield, Vermont, where he was born thirty-seven years ago. His parents, also, were natives of the Green Mountain State. Though the elder Johnson was a manufacturer, his son spent a considerable part of his boyhood upon a farm where he laid the foundation of a vigorous body. He had the schooling of the country town, Barre, (Vt.) Academy and of the Montpelier Seminary.

Then, securing, through the influence of a friend, the appointment of school-master on board the U. S. Steamship, Swatara, in 1879, he sailed away from Boston on a cruise around the world, thereby ingraining geography as only travel can fix it. There were forty apprentices, whom he was to instruct in rudimentary knowledge. Their first stop was at Gibraltar, and thence they touched at Malaga, Malta and Port Said. From Malta, he made a run up through Italy and from Port Said he went to the Holy Land. Then came the Suez Canal, Aden, Bombay, Indian Ocean, Strait of Malacca, Bankok, Amoy, Foo Chow, Japan. The Inland Sea, Yokohama, Nagasaki and a multitude of other places. While in Japan, he had the misfortune to be seriously injured on ship-board by falling down an open hatchway. This necessitated his transferral to San Francisco, whence he returned home by way of the Isthmus of Panama, landing in New York, about two years after his departure from America.

Having been discharged from the Navy, he entered the Normal School at Castleton, Vt., whence in due time, he was graduated. Then he was Superintendent of Schools in that town. Next, he came to Worcester as a special student, in our Normal School, and between his two periods in that school, taught in Holden. Next he went to Spencer, about five years ago, as principal of the Grammar School. His success in it was so manifest that in a short time he was promoted to the Superintendency of Schools which position he continued to hold till his election to the present office.

In many ways he made the schools of Spencer noteworthy. The houses became models of neatness and our own Capt. Dyon, State Inspector of Buildings in one of his reports alludes to them as "banner buildings." His liking for electricity and his ingenuity combined to make pupils and teachers move almost as by clock work.

His round the world travels have furnished him with an almost inexhaustible fund of information which he has frequently utilized in giving lectures. In fact a large part of his school training was paid for by his lectures. One theme aside from those devoted to his travels is "What shall I do for my son?" Mr. Johnson was married before starting on his prolonged journey to a Vermont lady, and they have two daughters. Mrs. Johnson will be the Matron of the Truant School whose doors will probably be open for the reception of boys, some after the first of February. In the first building ever erected for such a purpose, Superintendent Johnson will undertake what his friends believe will prove an unqualified success. He loves boys; is tactful and ingenious. Above all he is enthusiastic and without doubt, years hence, scores of well doing men throughout this land of ours will unite to call him "blessed."

Police Cap.

He was not to the manor born, that was evident at a glance. Behind him walked his wife, probably. He stalks into a Hat, Cap and Fur Store and says, "Pleace Cap?" The affable salesman says "Yes," all the time wondering by what pull he got his place as a "peeler." Then he pulls down a great pile of boxes and fishes out a police cap; but the foreigner shakes his head, no go. Then he produces a paper on which is written something. The accommodating salesman glances at it and reads "plush." "Oh that is a different thing and down comes another pile of boxes and a plush cap appears. Again our "lately arrived" shakes his head and says "no, for her," pointing to his wife. "Ah," says the good natured tradesman "we don't keep hats for women. Let me see your paper again" and a second look, shows him that the Northman wanted a plush cape and he was directed to a place where feminine wearing apparel is a specialty. Quite a progress that, from a plush cape to a police cap. It is in this way that changes and corruptions come into our language.

The Enchantress.

There is life in Dorothy's eyes,
And under their luminous spark
New hopes and new joys arise.
When weary of worldly cares
I feel more than their words can tell
There is life in Dorothy's eyes.

From the wells of the paradise
Where her mind and her spirit dwell,
New hopes and new joys arise.

And into my heart each quell,
His trouble and pain to quell—
There is life in Dorothy's eyes!

All radiant glow the skies,
No matter what clouds befall;
New hopes and new joys arise.

Though fortune may frown and despoil
And fate ring funeral bell,
There is life in Dorothy's eyes!
New hopes and new joys arise!

Columbus.

The Outing Club of the Y. W. C. A. appears to have a good idea of the fitness of things in that it is now reading Edward Everett Hale's Life of Columbus. Tuesday evening Misses Millie F. Dyer and S. Bessie Whitcomb were the readers. A good time to get posted as to America's discoverer.

A Silver Service.

Mr. Thomas M. Rogers has served without compensation, for eight years as president of the Electric Light Company. In recognition of his services the directors of the Company have presented him with an elegant service of six pieces viz, a salver, coffee-pot, tea-pot, hot water kettle, sugar-jar and creamer. The set is to be properly engraved. The presentation was made by the Hon. T. C. Bates.

Worcester Art Society.

This society will meet in the lecture room of the Free Public Library building this evening at 8 o'clock. After the meeting an exhibition of portraits by Mr. F. P. Vinton and of landscapes by Mr. Foxcroft Cole will be open to the members and their friends. The exhibition will not be a large one, but what it lacks in quantity will be amply made up with quality. The portraits are nearly all recent works of Mr. Vinton and include those of Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Gen. Charles Devens, Stephen Salisbury, Waldo Lincoln, Hon. and Mrs. Joseph H. Walker, and Mr. Sims of Boston. The landscapes will number seven or eight. There will also be a portrait of Hon. Edward L. Davis, done by J. Hanson Walker. Beginning next Monday the exhibition will be open to the public every afternoon from 3 to 6 for two weeks. It will also be open Monday, Wednesday and Saturday evenings from 7 to 9.

Arrangements for three select subscription dancing assemblies in Colonial Hall have been completed and they will take place January 8 and February 5 and 26. The patronesses are Mrs. Waldo Lincoln, Mrs. Francis H. Dewey, Mrs. Halleck Bartlett, Mrs. Frank R. Maccular and Mrs. J. Fred Mason, and the managers are Charles F. Aldrich, James W. Allen, George T. Dewey, Rockwood Hoar, George D. Moore, Charles Ranlet, William B. Scofield and Charles M. Thayer.

Entertainments.

Old Folks' Concert.

An old folks' concert was given in Park Church last week Friday evening by the church choir, under the direction of Mrs. Edwin Sagendorf. There was a long program of old songs and readings and the singers were dressed in the costumes of "ye olden time." Even the printed program was in keeping with the spirit of the concert and on it were such notices as these.

Ye latche string of ye door, will be hunge out at half past 7 of ye clock, and ye musick will sound at earlie candle lite at 8 of ye clock, when ye sands in ye hour glass have all run out, so as to favor ye menne folks who can't get their chores done earlier.

N. B. Ye womin folks need not bring their tallow dips as ye church will bee lite with ye new fangled lites without wicks, if so bee they don't go out.

N. B. Positively no live stock or provisions will be tuk as barter, for ye benches, as singing mistress Bassett can't be pestered with them.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Si Slocum," an American melo-drama in which Frank I. Frayne created considerable of a stir several years ago, was presented, this week at Lothrop's Pleasant Street Theater, with Charles Barringer and Miss Kate Glassford in the leading roles. Mr. Barringer, as Si Slocum was the recipient of enthusiastic applause at every performance. Miss Kate Glassford as Ruth Slocum, his wife, is seen to good advantage. Miss Grace Hamilton, whose quiet marriage to Francis H. Kingdon, a member of the company, in Providence last week, caused surprise among her friends in this city, made her first appearance in Lothrop's Stock Company as Grace Townsend. She is the possessor of a charming voice and most winsome manner and is a young actress with a bright future. She has made many friends and admirers by her work, which is far above the average. Mr. J. Gordon Edwards as Roman Vasquez, the villain, was accorded a hearty reception. It was his first appearance in this city.

Next week's attraction will be Miss Ethel Tucker in "Light and Shadows," a melo-drama of intense interest. Miss Tucker has a character in which she has a splendid opportunity to display her many charms and talent of high order.

Dale Armstrong, who has been the local manager of Lothrop's Opera House ever since its opening, will be missed by the patrons of the house for a short time, as he has taken a vacation. On Monday Manager Lothrop presented him with a check for $100 and advised him to take a trip for the benefit of his health, which has not been of the best for some time. Mr. Armstrong has made many friends who wish him success on his trip.

Mr. W. B. Smith, formerly manager of Lothrop's Portland Theater, will be temporary manager of the local house.

Mechanics' Course.

The third entertainment in course B was given Monday evening in Mechanics Hall, when the entertainers were Miss Olive Mead, violiniste; Frank O. Nash, accompanist; Jessie Couthou Shandrew, recitationist; Willard E. Shandrew, baritone; Miss Jessie M. Downer, solo pianist and accompanist. It was originally planned to have the Lillatans quartet give the concert but the engagement had to be broken, on account of the death of the husband of Mrs. Lillian E. Wood, the first soprano of the quartet.

Bancroft's Books.

It seems a pity that the library of George Bancroft cannot come to Worcester, but after allowing John B. Gough's magnificent collections to pass out of our midst, it may not be a subject of wonder, if no special effort is made to secure the library collected by the historian, but we can wish for it just the same as though its possession were possible.

At Half Mast.

That is where the G. A. R. flag is a large part of the time. Wednesday, it was thus on account of the sudden death of Comrade Sanford B. Ring who died at three o'clock in the morning, the 16th inst. Heart disease was the complaint that carried him off. His home was at 14 Coral Street, where he had, for several years, conducted a market. He was in his 61st year and, off and on, has been a resident of this city forty years. He came to Worcester from Clinton. He served in the 4th Mass. Heavy Artillery. His funeral was held Friday at 11 a.m.

Plain Talk.

No one can tell what part, in the no license campaign, the meeting in Mechanics Hall, last Sunday afternoon, sustained, but this is certain that the people who thronged that vast room were not prompted, thereby, to take any backward steps.

Dr. Almon Gunnison, though a comparatively recent comer to this city, by his outspoken words on subjects pertinent to the city's good, has placed himself in the very front among those whom it is safe to count on. There was a practical ring in his address that particularly pleased his listeners, especially when he showed that the license fee paid in by the seller is only a small per cent. on what they take from the pockets of the drinkers.

It was a novel experience to hear a Catholic priest take the decided position that Father Scully of Cambridge maintained. He is an old fighter, first as a soldier in the Rebellion and since then against the drink curse. If his attitude could be imitated by every priest in the country more would be done to lessen the traffic, ten fold more, than ever has been done. Should the Reverend gentleman ever visit Worcester again, he may be assured of a big audience of sympathetic listeners.

Dr. J. O. Knowles, in a few pointed remarks brought the afternoon to a close. He knew just what to say though the hour was late and his words ended another of those gatherings that, from year to year, have assembled to help along the cause of humanity. Though Carthage may not be absolutely destroyed, her foundations have been shaken.

"A man of pleasure is a man of pains."—Young.

Knowlton's Jewelry Store.

They are bright faces that are thronging Frank A. Knowlton's stores, this week, at 350 and 354 Main Street, and the brightness of the faces is more than reflected in the wares inspected. The windows of No. 350 are a study. In the north one are onyx cased clocks fit to adorn the home of a millionaire and if an expensive present is sought, the seeker need go no further. In the south window is a display unequalled in this city. It contains a cabinet having gilded supports, mirror back and onyx shelves, a glittering array of beauty and art. Upon the shelves are costly china, vases and statuettes. Entering, the eye is charmed with the wealth of material collected for exhibition and sale. Here are clocks in all sorts and sizes as well as prices. No one need go away unsatisfied. In this store are the larger articles and about the floor are cases of elegant gold headed canes, umbrellas with the finest of handles and umbrella stands. Upon elaborate pedestals may be seen the finest statuary in Worcester. These are in bronze or clay, for Knowlton's is the depository for Rogers' famous statuettes. In the next room the figure of Henry Ward Beecher looks down upon the throng of buyers, and many other trophies of the sculptors' skill abound, while any group from "John Alden and Priscilla" to "Football," the very latest, may be ordered. Here too are lamps in every form and design, from that for the study to the tall one for the piano, with shades most exquisite in hue and finish. In this room, we find most beautiful stands with onyx tops, seemingly too delicate for use, but they have their own appropriate places. Upon the table in the center of the store is an assemblage that attracts the younger people, for upon it are engagement cups of workmanship so delicate that one wonders how it can be done. That maiden who is oft remembered from this collection will count herself many times fortunate. About the room and upon the shelves, at the sides, are other specimens of porcelain of every make and design. You will be sure to find what you seek.

Passing around the west end of this store, we are in the south room or, No. 354, where the articles for display and sale are more numerous if not more costly and beautiful. Here come the lovers to buy engagement rings and later to secure the circlets with which to say, "With this ring I do thee wed," for in no other place in Worcester is there so large a collection of jewelry as Mr. Knowlton is carrying. He has jewelry plain and again that of the most expensive character. He has diamonds that would make a connoisseur smile and the woman wearer, the envy of all feminine beholders. Diamonds, set for all possible purposes, are found within these cases in dazzling brightness. Watches, also, for men and women, gold and silver, big and little, plain and ornamental may be seen by the score. Souvenir spoons are not overlooked. Those same Bancroft spoons which a little less than a year ago attracted so much attention in Worcester. They have the picture of the eminent historian and of his birthplace. No American city has a handsomer memorial than this which Mr. Knowlton has devised.

"Colonel" Pinkham!

That is the way it reads and it all comes about through Commander-in-chief Palmer of the G. A. R., making our Post 10 Commander one of his aids. He could have not done better and all of us look forward to the next encampment in Washington with no little pleasure. Post 10 will be there and its old commander will ride ahead.

Only Words.

The following anecdotes are told in the Illustrated American of Mr. John Stetson, the Malaprop in trousers. Once, when Modjeska was playing at the Globe, she required a bier to lie upon in one of her scenes, and sent to Manager Stetson stating that she wanted a bier. "Wants a beer, does she?" said Stetson; "well, she can want and be blowed. I ain't providing beer for these furrin players. Tell her she can't have it." The messenger returned to Modjeska with Stetson's message. The countess was furious. "Go to Mr. Stetson," she said, "and tell him unless I have a bier I will not go on in the next act. The messenger duly repeated the message. "She won't, won't she?" screamed Stetson; "well, we'll see if she won't. That's the way with these furriners; they always want beer, beer, beer." Then, as if relenting, he took fifty cents from his pocket and said, with a deep sigh: "I suppose I'll have to let her have it. Here, go and get her a gallon." It is needless to say the countess got her bier.

Another story may appropriately be divided into the acts, viz.:

ACT I.

Manager Stetson (in a towering rage, appearing before a new drop-curtain for the Globe Theater)—Who painted that drop curtain?
Assistant (facetiously)—Michael Angelo.
Stetson—Discharge him at once.

ACT II.

Jones (of the press to J. H. Haverly, rival manager)—Did you hear that last story of Stetson?
Haverly—No; what is it?
Jones—(Repeats as above.)
Haverly—(with a forced and uncertain laugh)—Oh, I see! There ain't no such person.

ACT III.

Jones—Stetson, did you hear that joke on Haverly?
Stetson—No; what is it?
Jones—Well, you know I told him about your wanting to discharge Michael Angelo, and he pretended to understand the joke, and said; "Oh, I see! There ain't no such person."
Stetson—(after an embarrassed pause)—Oh! ha, ha! Yes, he ought to have said there warn't no such person.

The Song of the Stream.

Here by the foot bridge that spans the stream,
The willows are slenderly leaning
Down to the waters that flash and gleam,
And whisper their mystical meaning
Singing forever the self-same tune,
I fall joyous but not uncomplaining,
And ever like some old rock-learned rune
A deeper significance leigning.
Running its gamut of measured sound,
As it hurries down to the river,
Where sunnier hemlocks its margins bound,
And seeds in mid-current sliver;
Murmuring gently where elders dank,
Form a sun-filtred archway over,
Slipping through mowings under the bank,
Rime-touched by the blossoming clover.
The Kingfisher knows its secret well,
And the Cardinal flower has heard it,
Nodding and bending the breeze to tell
When its breath so languidly stirred it,
But I who have wooed the sweet coquette,
When her mood was one of caresses,
And where her banks she sweetlyly frets
Deep drowning her emerald crests,—
I know not what is the song she sings
But her melody aye doth linger
And oft its fancy the music brings
When afar from the ceaseless slier;
And oft in the crowded marts of trade,
Mid hurry and worry and bustle,
I hear her murmur in sun and shade,
Where the leaves overheading rustle:
And lo! the haunting song of the stream
Hath wrought a complete transition,
And things that are real seem but a dream
That clouded my recent vision.
I walk once more as in bygone day,
When the rills their tribute deliver,
And muse again on the mystic lay,
That the streamlet sings to the river.
—Francis Zuri Stone.

The Old Mill.

"I was also much interested the other day to read the article concerning a certain Mr. Parker's reminiscences of the "Old Mill," Burlington, Vt. Being an admirer of that "Old Mill" and having my early home in Burlington, I was able to verify every allusion. We lived on Goff Street, on which was located the old gambrel-roof "Goff Mansion," he refers to It was while I lived near there that the property was bought by a wealthy Burlingtonian, Dr. J. N. Pomeroy,—long since dead,—who removed the old house, and built a very fine mansion on its site, grandly overlooking the Winooki valley. In my childhood, I used to hear much of the "High Bridge" over the Onion river in Colchester, and later crossed it many times. With a class-mate I have followed the railroad track far up among the glens and gorges of the river, climbing up into the net-work of trestles and bridges. Strangely, notwithstanding all the years I lived in Burlington, I never visited the Juniper Island, out in the Burlington Bay, on which is located a light-house; and for the reason that it was never regularly visited by vessels of any kind. During two notable college winters, I taught school in Shelburne Point which so beautifully projects north ward into the lake, making at once Shelburne and Burlington Bay—the latter being by tourists said to resemble and rival for beauty the bay of Naples. Very Truly Yours R. H. HOWARD"

This book follows very properly after Physical Development and Exercise for Women, by Mary Taylor Bissell, M. D., reviewed in last week's LIGHT. A sound body is the first consideration, and then the sana mens or sound mind, which should accompany the sound body, else the latter may be only that of a fine animal. The writer treats her subject as one who knows it well. She may be a teacher, at any rate she must be one who has read and observed extensively. The importance of her theme is shown so conclusively that even the dullest will acknowledge it. Her topic is, by no means, a new one. Prof. Blackie of Edinburgh has used the title and so has our late Boston Divine, James Freeman Clarke, though these gentlemen may have directed their discourse towards men rather than their sisters. Times have changed since that period when a very small amount of learning was considered enough for a woman. She now wants all that her brothers may have and she bids fair to get it too. The long closed avenues are opening to her. Of the nineteen chapters some are conspicuously interesting. "What is Self Culture?" "How Shall We Read?" "What Shall We Read?" "Justice and Truth," "A Spirit of Love," "The Choice of Companions" and "The Meaning of Our Culture to Others" are some of the headings. In a word, this book is one that we could wish our lady friends had read in their girlhood; one that we shall insist upon our daughters reading now. The world of knowledge is very far from being shut to people even though there be no open school. Industry and determination will do much towards accomplishing what "Chill penury" may have seemed to prevent. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

The Inland Printer for December presents its accustomed array of excellent matter and superb engravings. "The Bugle Call" is the finest half tone that ever came under our notice. The form of the bugler stands out as clear cut as marble. The watered silk of her dress is perfect. A half tone picture can do nothing better. All the other engravings are also in the highest style of art, while the contributions and the letters are of unflagging interest. James W. Scott, publisher of the Chicago Herald, comes in for a good description and his full page portrait begins the book. His face has just a little of Grover Cleveland's look, but he can't help it, perhaps he wouldn't if he could.

Wolverton or the Modern Arena by D. A. Reynolds.

Religious dogmas, like scientific matters, are now being treated by novelists, and in "Wolverton, or the Modern Arena," a handsomely printed work just issued by Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago, the author has given a skillfully woven plot, which will keep his readers interested to the end. The story of Wolverton is designed to show the error into which the churches have fallen by a misinterpretation of Christ's gospel. The author makes war on no sect or denomination, nor upholds one doctrine above another, preferring to sustain that which is in accordance with Christ's teachings, and point out the error of misconception. With this aim in view, he has endowed the character of Thurman Wolverton with the doctrine of the modern churches, and then, by showing the errors of his life, points out the errors into which church people are apt to fall by reason of their imperfect understanding of the true Christian character. By the reformation and new conversion of Wolverton is shown that strength of character so noticeable in the true Christian and exemplifies the possible attainment of the Christian religion when once fully understood and appreciated. Wolverton is a worthy addition to the list of religious novels published of late years. The story is well conceived and the characters strongly drawn. This novel should find a place in every Christian household. Extra cloth, 1.50.

An important paper on Boston, from Mr. Emerson's unpublished manuscripts, will appear in the January Atlantic.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, have just published an Italian composition by C. H. Grandgent, author of their Italian Grammar. Part I. supplements the Grammar by giving additional exercise work with references. Part II. comprises selections of simple Italian with exercises based on each. Part III. consists of additional exercises in composition and formulas used in letter writing. A vocabulary together with an appendix containing notes on pronunciation, and a list of irregular verbs, follows.

Early in 1892 Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney will publish, through Houghton, Mifflin & Co., a new story entitled "A Golden Gossip," a neighborhood story of the same sort as her "Acscutney Street."

Mr. John Fiske's work on "The discovery of America" will be published early in 1892. It has involved a vast amount of research, and Mr. Fiske is reported to regard these two volumes as his most important contributions to American history.

It is said that Mr. E. W. Kemble has for years wished to illustrate "Uncle Tom's Cabin." He has now done it, and with what success is shown in the two beautiful volumes of the Holiday edition of this world-famous story.

The death of any author naturally produces a demand for his works. Fortunately Mr. Lowell had just edited his writings, and they had been brought out in a very attractive form.

In the notice of Mrs. Taylor's admirable little book in last week's paper, the price was incorrectly stated. It is $1.00 instead of the amount there named. If you wish to keep track of your newly wedded friends, just buy this book and find how handy it will be. At the book-stores.

Chicago continues to send out marvels of typographical excellence. The Artist Printer is well named and the November number, like its predecessors, is sure to gladden the eye of many a disciple of the Art Preservative who would gladly emulate. Aside from the articles on pertinent themes, the letters from various parts of the country are very entertaining;

A Round Robin, illustrated by Harriette M. Bennett, Stories by M. A. Foyer, edited and arranged by Robert Ellice Mack. From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

One of the prettiest holiday books we have seen. The illustrations are beautiful, and the stories such as will please the children beyond measure. The pictures are in colors and many of them are full page. Children, animals, flowers and birds all show the genius of the artist. It is put into a binding sure to attract the little ones and we hope many a child will find it among the Christmas gifts. Price $2.00. Putnam, Davis & Co.

My Little Margaret, by Mary D. Brine. Illustrated by A. G. Plympton. From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.

A sad story of a flower girl, but with all the tears and misery there is a lesson and when at the end little Margaret finds a happy home as the result of her unflinching cheerfulness and happy looking for the best under all circumstances, we feel that it is only her just reward and rejoice with her as we have wept with her in her former troubles. The cover is white, gold and colors and the illustrations are all good and on almost every page some form of little Margaret or her friends looks out at us. The price is $1. Putnam, Davis & Co.

A Rose of a Hundred Leaves, by Amelia E. Barr, author of "Friend Olivia," "Jan Velder's Wife," etc. From Dodd, Mead & Company, New York.

It is a lovely story, but such a beautiful one that we wish all might read it. The heroine is an English girl, Aspatia, and so dainty, sweet and pure that Ulfar Fenwick falls in love with her. But after a while he tires of her simplicity and leaves the place. Her brother follows him and with threatening words extorts a promise to marry her, but though Ulfar keeps the promise he will not live with her but leaves the country. After he goes, Aspatia goes away to school and does her best to fit herself for a grand lady and so well does she succeed that on Ulfar's return he sees and falls in love with his own wife. The book is finely illustrated, the pictures on some pages leaving room for a line of type one side, and on some a few words above and beneath the engraving. A portrait of the author fills the first page. Price $1.50. Putnam, Davis & Co.

Odes, Lyrics, and Sonnets from the Poetic Works of James Russell Lowell. Boston and New York. Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1892.

Another of those beautiful books that this firm so well knows how to produce. It is in the White and Gold series and the elegant exterior gives promise of excellence within, nor is the promise broken. The odes are "The Harvard Commemorations July, 21, 1865," "Agassiz" and "Under the Old Elm." Among the Lyrics are many familiar friends as "An Incident in a Railroad Car," "Auf Wiedersehen" and "The First Snow-Fall." A delightful book to give to a friend, a genuine pleasure in every sense. Denholm-McKay Company.

Better Dead, by J. M. Barrie, Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York, 25 cents.

It is difficult to make out just what the writer is driving at. Apparently he has read Dr. Quincey's "Murder as a Fine Art," still this does not account for all his vagaries. Andrew Riach, an educated Scotchman, goes down to London and after many tribulations, enters a "Society for Doing Without Some People," or in other words a Society of Thugs or Assassins. Of course the whole thing is a satire, but of just what phase of English life is satirized, we still remain in ignorance. The book has the advantage of brevity.

Becker's Business College.

The advantages of this school are becoming more and more manifest. Merchants and other business men are employing its graduates and they naturally recommend young men and women, seeking places for study, to try Becker's. The result is that the rooms are filled. There is nothing for show, but everything for use. The means, resorted to, to utilize every inch of space is an excellent lesson in economy to the pupil. The telephone closet is one of the most ingenious contrivances in the city. The learner will observe that there are ways of doing a thing other than by calling in expensive workmen. It is this common sense way of doing things that has given Becker's College its reputation. Whether the work be Arithmetic, Book-keeping, Short Hand or Type Writing, the doctrines and rules of common sense are supreme. Call in and see for yourselves.

On Harvard Street.

A very pleasant social event of last week was the afternoon tea, given at 40 Harvard Street by Mrs. M. V. B. Jefferson and her daughter, Mrs. William H. Coe. About 200 ladies were present. Mrs. Jefferson and Mrs. Coe received, assisted by Mrs. O. H. Everett, Mrs. Charles C. Baldwin, Mrs. John Dewey, Mrs. C. G. Wood, Mrs. Jared Whitman, Mrs. T. S. Johnson. The young ladies who assisted were Miss Mabel Gage, Miss Alice H. Baldwin, Miss Bertha Putnam, the Misses Wyman and Miss Gertrude Wood.

The house was decorated with palms and potted plants by Lang. Music was furnished by John J. Heron and an orchestra

Hamilton—Kingdon.

Only recently, Miss Grace Hamilton was announced as having gone upon the stage. This week, she will appear at Lothrop's Opera House in this city, but she now has another reason for public notice in that she was married last Saturday, in Providence to Mr. Francis H. Kingdon, an actor of English birth, and a member of the same company with herself. By a quiet marriage in St. Stephen's Episcopal Church, the fret and worry of a public affair were avoided. That life's voyage may be happy is the fervent wish of many friends.

Anniversary.

Dr. A. K. Gould has a way of his own of celebrating his release from Rebel Prison. Friday, the 11th inst., was the 27th return of the day, so he called in his children and friends, hung out the flag and with them rejoiced that the perilous days were over.

Twenty-Fifth Anniversary.

Twenty-five years of married life and nearly twice as many of earthly existence, Mr. and Mrs. Albert H. Howard of 16 West Street celebrate their wedding anniversary on the return of their birthday, the 14th of December. Getting so many celebrations into one day is, really, a great saving of time. When in 1866, the young people were married, the groom was 23 years old, his bride 21. It was a merry company that took possession of the house, and congratulated the husband and wife on their silver milestone. There were 200 and more guests who thronged the rooms. Twenty-five years ago, in Spencer, by the Rev. James Cruickshanks, Mr. Howard was married to Miss Ruth L. Randall and in about three months, thereafter, they came to this city where they have resided since, Mr. Howard being the president and treasurer of the Card Clothing Company in Washington Square. Mr. Howard is a native of Worcester, Otsego Co., New York and Mrs. H. was born in Spencer.

Harrison G. Otis acted as master of ceremonies assisted by D. C. Turner and W. C. Haberley. Amidst profuse floral decorations, Mr. and Mrs. Howard received, the latter attired in the wedding dress of a quarter of a century since. Mrs. Caroline Randall, Mrs. Howard's mother, was present and with Misses Edith and Ethel Howard, daughters, assisted in the reception. Many employes of Howard Brothers, with their wives and children were present as well as relatives from a distance.

Among the Worcester people were Gen. Robert H. Chamberlain and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Lawrence, Mr. and Mrs. Edward N. Dean, Mrs. Harrison G. Otis, Mr. and Mrs. Joel Garfield, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. H. Larkin, Mr. and Mrs. M. M. Garfield, Mr. and Mrs. Ezra Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Wall, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Howell, Mr. and Mrs. Moses Church, Rev. Isaac J. Lansing and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. M. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Brannon, Mr. and Mrs. William W. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Charles G. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. N. A. Harrington, George Sessions, E. D. Cheney, Mrs. Frank H. Ruggles, Mr. and Mrs. B. D. Allen, Col. and Mrs. J. A. Titus, Mrs. Peter Rice and Miss Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Knight, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Nourse, Mr. and Mrs. Ephraim Tucker, Jr., and many others.

From their fellow members of Salem Street Congregational Church came the present of an elegant gold lined, silver service of eight pieces. The employes of the Howard Brothers sent a fine reclining chair and a piano lamp came from W. G. Warren Sons beside many other timely and beautiful gifts.

Rebholz furnished refreshments, excellent music was given by an orchestra and the following appropriate poem was read by the writer. The evening was a very pleasant one for all.

[Inscribed to Mr. and Mrs. Albert H. Howard, on the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of their Wedding Day, December 14th, 1891, by their Friend and Pastor, I. J. Lansing.]

From a hillside verdant and sunny, a silvery rivulet springs, Tinkling and splashing, runs down o'er the slope, where its sister goes singing.

Rippling among the grasses, where zephyrs the blue-bells are ringing,—
A ribbon of silver, she leaps in cascades, to the arms of her brother,
And the two, one brooklet henceforward, no longer apart from each other,
Flashing and sparkling, in sunshine and starlight, glide on to the ocean, their tropical.

Out of the sea depths, where tropical islets float on the wave,
Curves upward a billow, with bosom of beryl, the rose-tinted sea-shells to lave;
Then another bright wavelet springs lightly beside it, from ocean's deep cave;
And onward, in liquid embracings, they pass like the dance of a feather,
Over the fishing pebbles and on to the white sands together,
Brightening and scampering in gladness, as lambskins escaped from their tether.

Amid blossoming branches of springtime, a songster awakes with the day-dawn,
And lists, while he carols his lay, for an answering bird-note of passion;
Through the tremulous leaves, comes a trill in responsive confession:
With twitter and call, toward each other, these warblers in ecstasy move,
And, singing a sylvan betrothal, the two build one nest in the grove,
Where against each others warm feathers, they rest in delight of their love.

When the morning of summer is dewy and fresh, where before all was mute,
A song rising clear, carols forth like the voice of a flute;
Then harmonious, concordant, as vibrate the strings of a lute,

Another awakening, blends with it, the two are one stream of sweet sound,— Like lovers, the quavers of feeling embrace at a bound,
And, united in harmony perfect, one song they float round.

The boy born December fourteenth, by kind Providence blessed, if fated,
Meets the girl of his heart, seeking also that same dear birthday belated;

Hand in hand, together they walk, and on that natal night, when they are mated, Pighting vows of devotion whose sweetness two young hearts then fills;
And the two, as the birds and the songs, as the waves and the rills,
Blend in one stream, one wavelet, one nest; and one glorious harmony thrills.

The springs shall run dry and their rills, in the summer, cease flowing;

The birds end their warblings, as southward from chill winds and snows they are going;
The waves cease to break on the shores, in the calm of the starlight;

The songs of the singers sink silent, as darkness grows midnight;
But to children of love, the youth and the maiden, the bridegroom and bride,

The years bring accession of loving devotion, whatever betide;

And seasons and change passing by, are but read as a token,
That heaven unmeasured by years, shall leave love-linings forever unbroken.

Worcester Assembly, Non-Secret Endowment Order, will hold a bon bon party in the hall at 566 Main Street next Tuesday evening.

G. A. R.

A large party of veterans belonging to Post 20 visited Grafton, one week ago last night, to take part in a Camp Fire given by the Gen. A. B. R. Sprague Post of that city. Commander-elect J. B. Lepire was with the party and was one of the speakers at the meeting.

Old Middlemuth's Will.

Aunt Hephzibah Judkins, or Aunt Happy as she was usually called by her friends, was an elderly, single lady.

She was poor, and earned her living here and there as she could.

For many years she had sighed for a home and helpmeet to cheer her solitary hours, but as time sped away, it began to look as if her mission in life was to float about from place to place; to do deeds of kindness in homes where people were too poor to pay; and some times to do them in those in which money was more abundant.

She had been a familiar figure so long in the village, being without any relations, that she knew of, that somehow the people partially forgot she was flesh and blood. For when any of the folks in the neighborhood were sick, Aunt Happy was expected to come in and stay until all were well again.

Her services were in demand in so many ways that she generally had some place where to stay, but she thought many times that to have a home to herself was a condition in life to be desired.

One day while she was at one of the houses in the vicinity, a child of one of the poor families came past the window at which she was sitting. She had learned that there was sickness in the home a day or two before, and she stepped to the door to inquire of the child how all were.

The girl replied that the doctor thought there was no change in their condition. They must await further development in their disease: typhoid fever.

Aunt Happy was surprised to hear from the child, that three were sick at her home instead of one, and her heart flowed out in sympathy to them. The widowed mother, never very well, but always using every effort to get along and keep herself and little ones as respectable looking as possible, was all tired out with ceaseless toil by night and day, caring for them.

"O dear!" exclaimed Aunt Happy, "I pity your mother so much. I'll go at once and help her in her duties."

"Mama says," began the child sorrowfully, "that if we had the things to live on it would not be so hard to get along now." There was a strangely plaintive tone to her voice, that awakened Aunt Happy's interest to its fullest measure.

"Lor sakes," she said, clasping her hands together as she spoke, "ye don't pretend to say't ye haven't the things to live on, when ye're all so poorly like, do ye child?"

"Yes'm. The most we have in the house is some Indian meal, a few potatoes, and we have a little wood. Mother has tried to keep along and, until this morning, we have done so, but now she don't know what we shall do." The silent tears started in the child's eyes as she finished her recital. This was too much for Aunt Happy. "Well Aunt Happy 'll see't ye hav' som' pervisions if nobody else won't, 'n that right off too." She said this just as determinedly as though she had everything to do with herself. "When ye' goin' home, 'cause I'll go along with ye' or see what can be done for yer mother."

"I was going to the Post Office to ask about this before I went home," replied the girl as she drew an envelope from beneath her shawl, from which she took a slip of paper, which she handed rather shyly to Aunt Happy. "You see" she continued, "it just came through the mail and mother don't know what it means."

Aunt Happy took the paper a little suspiciously, opened it and read:

— Bank of New York.

Pay to the order of Mrs. Ida A. Long Fifty Dollars. RUBEN RUST, Cashier.

"Why," exclaimed Aunt Happy after examining the slip for a moment while a look of deep surprise settled upon her face, "it says to somethin' or somethin' to pay Mrs. Ida A. Long fifty dollars, but sakes me; what it does mean is more'n I know. Let's see," she continued looking at the paper very earnestly, and reading slowly adjusting the slip to the light as she read and looking sideways through her glasses, "Pay to Mrs. Ida A. Long, that's your mother sure, but that fifty dollars, where is it? Seem's if they'd ment sh'd hav' it, they'd hav' put it inside with this 'n sent it. It's too bad child! I wish ye could hav' it fer 't would do ye so much good now when ye need help."

"Mama thought it was altogether too good to be true, yet she did not know but there might be something in it," said the girl in a disappointed voice.

At this point, while Aunt Happy still held the piece of paper in her hand, upon which she began to look with distrust, an elderly man came past them. Seeing it was Old Middlemuth, as the people called him, and being always willing to exchange a word with him, she handed him the slip for his opinion of it. He took it, read it, and turning to the girl with a kindly manner said:

"It is a draft on the — Bank of New York to pay your mother fifty dollars. If you will take it up to Mr. Newton's store he will tell you just what to do with it. And I am glad for your mother's sake that she can have it." Saying which he went his way.

Aunt Happy was happily surprised at Mr. Middlemuth's ready solution of the contents of the paper, that were really so much Greek to her. And as the girl gladly started for the store, while the old gentlemen went the opposite direction, her head turned from one to the other of the receding forms, wondering within herself how Mrs. Long came to have the letter come to her.

This was hard to fathom, however, and she quietly prepared to go to help the sick ones.

The child was not long in going to Mr. Newton's who told her if her mother would come to him he would give her the money.

Mrs. Long was deeply thankful for this timely gift, and while she knew not the giver, her daily thanks went out to her benefactor as with Aunt Happy's aid and the things she was enabled to buy for her sick ones she at length saw them rapidly improving.

The fact of the draft coming to Mrs. Long brought to remembrance a few like circumstances, that had occurred in the vicinity, and it always proved that highly deserving people were the recipients of these gifts and someone, knowing the facts in the case, must have been concerned in making them, yet no one knew who that person was.

Just outside the village lived Old Middlemuth. He lived in a small wood colored house, where he had made his home for some years. He dwelt alone, doing his own work both in doors and out. He had a little land that he worked when he felt inclined to labor out of doors. He had few callers and was rarely seen away from his home. When his business called him away he transacted it as quickly as possible and hastened back again. He was a shrewd, kind man, always pleasant and courteous to all with whom he had to do. His personal matters were strictly kept to himself. He never alluded to them, in any way, to his neighbors.

It was but a few months after Mrs. Long had received her draft, that one day word came to the people of the place, that Mr. Middlemuth was quite sick. Friends readily took up the task of caring for him, but a few days after this he died. The day before he passed away he told those who were caring for him that when he should die they would find the key to unlock his secretary on a string about his neck. In that they would find instructions how to proceed with his affairs.

After the old man was dead, his attendants, with much curiosity, unlocked the bureau. The first thing that they noticed was a large card tacked to the inside of the door, on which was written in a bold hand:

"In case I die, inform Julius Cass, Esq., No. — Street, New York City.

MARTIN MIDDLEMUTH."

This was all. There was no chance to appease their inquisitiveness as to the sources of the dead man for money, and secretly chagrined at the shrewdness of Old Middlemuth, they finally sent word as indicated on the card.

The next day after, Mr. Cass appeared at the doorway of the house and having necessary papers he informed those who had stayed with the old man, that he would take matters into his own hands, which he did.

As soon as possible after the burial, Mr. Cass invited a few of the neighbors to the house. Asking them to be seated, he told them he had some things to tell them in regard to Mr. Middlemuth's disposal of his property, and believing they would be interested he had invited them to come in and hear them.

"In the first place," he began, "the homestead, with full use and control while she lives, goes to Miss Hephzibah Judkins, together with two dollars per week for her support, she to have the furniture and all household goods after the private papers of the deceased shall have been removed."

"Lor sakes alive! Do hear that!" cried Aunt Happy, glancing from one to another of her companions, while her face assumed a look of great astonishment at the sudden fulfillment of her long desire for a home of her own. The company were greatly pleased at this good fortune of their life-long friend, but it was beyond the scope of their understanding why the old gentleman had thus disposed of his property, and after quiet had been restored, Mr. Cass, who was richly enjoying the surprise of the simple inhabitants of the village, proceeded with his business.

"The next provision is of one dollar per week to each of Mrs. Ida A. Long's four children, until they are sixteen years of age, and similarly to each of the two children of Mrs. Jane Jennings."

LIGHT

SUPERFLUOUS * HAIR * AND * MOLES * PERMANENTLY * REMOVED

ELECTRIC * NEEDLE.

NO PAIN, NO SCARRING, OR OTHER INJURY, AND NO RETURN OF THE HAIR OR MOLES AFTER REMOVAL.

It is the triumph of science.

Electricity is the scientific king of the day, the synonym of progress, and the solution of the wildest dreams of thinking men.

The ancient Greek philosopher declared that there was "one universal force in matter." Modern scholars know that force to be all-permeating Electricity.

What will this prince of progress not accomplish for mankind?

For the woman whose feminine beauty is marred, and whose fatures are rendered masculine by a growth of hair or disfigured by moles upon her face, much to the mortification of her friends, and her own personal shame, it has brought release from the bane and curse of her life.

Thanks to Electricity, there need be no more sensitive dreading or public gaze, no more keen sorrowing in secret because she is not as other women, no more bitter shrinking from the pleasures of society, no more hateful using of the razor or tweezers.

I take this means of respectfully inviting the attention of ladies thus afflicted, and their friends, to the fact that I have opened quarters at room 17, Clark building, 492 Main St., Worcester, near the Boston Store, where I am prepared with every modern convenience and comfort to do work in this line, assisted by experienced lady operators, on the most reasonable terms possible.

DR. B. F. LONGSTREET, A. M., Physician and Surgeon,
CLARK BUILDING, 492 MAIN ST., ROOM 17. TAKE ELEVATOR.

This announcement was greeted with applause, for the two ladies whose children had been so kindly remembered by their benefactor, were highly regarded by their townspeople. But when Mr. Cass read the last legacy, of one dollar and fifty cents per week each, to poor old David Lanely and his wife, who were all but used up with rheumatism and were very old, if Mr. Middlemuth had been one of the company who were listening to his peculiar will, he would have been overwhelmed by the words of praise for him heard on all sides.

In the course of time, when the children should arrive at the limit of the provision in the will, and the old people should pass away, the property should be invested as a whole in some way, for the management of which three persons were named, so as to apply the proceeds to any poor, respectable people whom the committee might think deserving.

As Mr. Cass finished reading, there began to be considerable inquiry among the company how the old man was to meet these several requirements in his will. They had never given him credit for very much money, certainly, nothing in comparison to that which must be provided for. Finally they referred the matter to Mr. Cass.

"My friend Middlemuth had other ways of getting money than from his land in this place. As you all know, he lived alone in a simple way, and I think no one here knew of his odd way with money, for he always bound me to secrecy while he should live. As he is no more, I will tell you some things that he told me years ago, when I first came to know him.

DO NOT FAIL TO READ THE POSITIVE GUARANTEE OF SATISFACTION offered below.

Do not fail to call upon me. A visit to my rooms will cost you nothing, and may prove a life-long blessing.

The success of this method of removing superfluous hair and moles permanently from any part of the body is so universally acknowledged by men of science, that it is only necessary for you to consult your family physician, if he is a well-read man, and up to the times in his profession, and he will unhesitatingly tell you not only that it is beyond all question a success, but also that it is positively the only method known for surely and permanently destroying these obnoxious growths.

But, better still, your own intelligence will tell you that all argument on the subject must close when I say that if you are at all doubtful, you will not be required to place a single dollar in my hands until the work is completed, and a sufficient length of time has elapsed to satisfactorily settle the question of permanency. In other words, it will not be necessary for you to pay for the work until you are perfectly satisfied with it.

The method will be carefully, fully and convincingly explained to all who will call at my office.

I have scores of testimonials, but as I never gave publicity to the names of my patrons, I do not publish these testimonials here, but have adopted the better plan of placing those who are interested in direct correspondence with those for whom I have done such work, many of whom are easily accessible, personally, to people living in Worcester and vicinity.

I am just completing work for one of my patrons, from whose face and neck I will have removed, when the work is finished, no less than six een thousand hairs. This lady is so grateful for the results accomplished in the permanent removal of this enormous growth of hair, which for years has been the bane of her life, that she has voluntarily consented to see and talk with any one interested, and afflicted as she has been. I have photographs of this lady, showing her as she was, and you can see her as she is. Notwithstanding the immense amount of work accomplished, not a scar can be seen upon her face, which presents precisely the natural appearance of one upon whose face no hair had ever grown. What has been accomplished for her and others, may surely be accomplished for you.

For ladies living out of town, pains will be taken to secure suitable board and lodging, at reasonable rates, when required and unrequested.

All correspondence carefully and promptly attended to.

The utmost privacy strictly maintained.

Office hours, 9 a. m. to 4 p. m. daily.

They could claim no acquaintance with him there was a deep feeling of gratitude for his kindness. In view of the anxieties he had helped to drive away from so many aching hearts, it is too much to hope that when the time shall come the Master shall say to him: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

C. F. MATTHEWS.

Mrs. Jefferson Davis.

It has been suggested recently that the proposed monument to the women of the Southern confederacy shall take the form of a college for the education of the Southern girls, which shall be built by popular subscription and be situated at some central and suitable place. It would be a most appropriate selection to appoint Mrs. Jefferson Davis the agent to receive subscriptions to the college, and with the aid of a board of directors to provide for its construction and organization, and this work, we are sure, would be wholly agreeable to her, at the same time that her connection with it would insure the most active support on the part of the friends of the proposed institution.

When it is completed, of course, Mrs. Davis should be elected the first president of the college, to hold the position for life. If such a college is to be established in honor of the women of the confederacy, it could not have a more worthy founder and head, and its organization in the way we have indicated would emphasize its significance for all time as it could not be emphasized by any other means. —Richmond, Va., Dispatch.

Milestones.

The old milestone on Lincoln Street, Worcester, as seen in the heading, is of red sandstone with the following inscription:

42
Miles from Boston go to Springfield,

1771.

By a Provincial enactment made in Governor Hutchinson's time, this milestone was one of many placed in the year 1771 along on the "New Connecticut Road," which way was afterward called the "post road" from Boston to New York and Albany. This road left Boston for Marlborough thence to Quinsigamond (Worcester) and then to Brookfield and so on to Springfield.

In the history of the town of Northborough, once a part of Marlborough, it is stated "The oldest vestige of pioneer life still in existence is doubtless the great road to Worcester, as it is called."

Originally this road in 1672 was only a pathway or trail through the forests, when Marlborough was a frontier settlement with its garrison houses. After leaving Marlborough there was no habitation on the Eoston road to Springfield until the garrison house was reached at Quabaug (now Brookfield) with the exception in Quinsigamond (Worcester) of a little Indian town of huts on Pakachoag Hill, the highlands of which reach the town of Auburn. On or near the site of this Indian town is now located "Holy Cross College."

This Indian town is described by Gookin: "This village lyeth about three miles south of the new roadway that leadeth from Boston to Connecticut; it consists of about twenty families. This town is situated upon a fertile hill and is denominated from a delicate spring of water that is there."

Settlement of Worcester. "A tract of land eight miles square was purchased by the Indians for twelve pounds lawful money. The deed bears date July 13, 1674."

Dec. 2, 1675, Increase Mather writes: "This day all the houses in Quonsukamak (Worcester) were burned by the Indians."

"At what is West Brookfield, near to the south-west end of Wickabaug Pond, on a knoll below the junction of the waters of the pond with Quabaug river, stood Mark's garrison."

Quabaug (Brookfield) became the established English bridle path between the Bay and the Connecticut. "The single horseman or a cavalcade of riders and pack horses was a common sight to the Indians." The old Connecticut road had in a manner ceased to be used as the most traveled path to Connecticut and was already displaced by the new Connecticut road.

The old Connecticut road was the inland trail of Massachusetts of which we have the most ancient account. From Cambridge it proceeded to the south-east part of Marlborough, then passed to Wassanamesit (Grafton, a part of the township of Sutton) and thence to Oxford near the French fort Woodstock and so on to Springfield.

It is stated that in the autumn of 1630 the chief of the Indians of Wabquasset, now Woodstock, visited the English governor at the Bay to establish a trading house, and this Indian trading expedition brought this forest path to the knowledge of the English, who made it their way to travel to the Connecticut Valley.

John Oldham followed this old Connecticut path in 1633, lodging in Indian towns all the way. A well defined trail from Mount Hope and the Narragansett country, known as the Providence Path, intersected the old Connecticut Path in or near Woodstock. Another trail, known as the Nipmuck Path, came from Norwich to the same point of junction. From here a branch track proceeded to the north-west into Strubridge, where it separated, our track going westerly past the lead mines, and on to Springfield. Miss Ellen D. Larned, the author of the History of Windham county, writes of this "Connecticut Path": "This rude track became the main thoroughfare between the two colonies, Massachusetts and Connecticut. Hundreds of families toiled over it to reach homes in the wilderness. The fathers of Hartford and New Haven, ministers and governors, captains and commissioners, government officials and land speculators, crossed and recrossed this forest path."

There were milestones placed all the way along this "Old Connecticut Road" from Boston to Springfield.

On the southerly front of the residence of B. Frank Battcheller in Sutton stands the queen of all milestones; it is of red sandstone, five feet in height, two feet wide and eight inches in thickness with this inscription:

ML To Boston
B W

Col. Bartholomew Woodbury of Sutton was the proprietor of a country inn which was with a fine landed estate situated on this "old Connecticut Road." Col. Woodbury offered the Commissioners, who were directing the sites of the milestones, if they would make the last mile a little less than its limit, placing it near to his house, that it might attract travellers, he would be at the expense of erecting the milestone, and that it should excel all others en route from Boston to Springfield on this same old Connecticut road.

At every country inn there was a horse block for the convenience of travellers on horse back—a gentleman in the saddle, may be, and a lady on a pillion behind him. Ladies of high position had a separate horse with a side saddle, and were escorted by a gentleman or a servant, and to avoid the gaze of travellers wore masks of black velvet, as was the fashion of the time.

Long since the little brown house, with its huge cobble stone chimneys and oven outside of the house, has passed away and only its stately milestone with its companion, the horse block, covered in the summer time with greenery and flowers remains to mark the site of the "Wayside Inn." There is one notable milestone in Oxford on this old Connecticut road where the Sutton road enters the village street. It stands on Sigourney corner and was erected by Josiah Wolcott a resident of Oxford with this inscription:

53½
Miles to Boston
J & W 1771.

Milestones were anciently placed along the roads in eastern countries.

It is said by travellers at the present time in Palestine they may be seen here and there in that country.

Milestones were once common in England, viz., the roads leading from London to the Inrge towns.

"Tis such an easy walk, so smooth and straight
The second mile store fronts the garden gate."
—"Retirement", Cowper.

The Bay Path.

In 1673 this highway was established for the use of the country leading from Waterdown as the nearest and best way to Marlborough and thence to Quabaug (Brookfield). This new path left the "Old Connecticut Path" at "Happy Hollow" (now in Wayland) and passed through Marlborough, Worcester, Oxford in its northern section, Charlton on to Brookfield where it parted, one branch following the old trail or old Connecticut road to Springfield and the other leading on through Ware, and Belchertown to Hadley.

The late Hon. Salem Towne of Charlton stated that remains of the "Old Bay Road" were still to be seen lying in the western valley lands of Charlton; vestiges of this "Bay Road" are still remaining in Oxford on the old north Charlton road.

The "Old Bay Path" is beautifully described by Dr. Holland in his romance of that name.

"It was a path marked by trees a portion of the distance, and by slight clearings of brush and thicket for the remainder. No stream was bridged, no hill graded, and no marsh drained. The path led through woods which bore the mark of centuries, over barren hills that had been licked by the Indian's hounds of fire, and along the banks of streams that the seine had never dragged."

"It is wonderful what a powerful interest was attached to the Bay path, the rough tread of soil, chopped by the blades of a hundred streams, was the one way left open, through which the sweet tide of sympathy might flow. Every rod had been prayed over by friends on the journey and friends at home. If every traveller had raised his Ebenezer as the morning dawned upon his trusting sleep, the monuments would have risen and stood like milestones."
— M. de W. FREELAND.

Boys Make Men.

Let us try to add some pleasure
To the life of every boy,
For each child needs tender interest
In its sorrow and its joy.
Let home charm your boys by brightness;
They avoid the household when
It is cheerless. Make them happy,
For remember—boys make men.

To Mother Nature.

Oh, cloudless sky, oh, quiet sea,
My heart leaps out to thee,
And in the wavelets of the sea
Is dancing full and free.

Oh, Mother Nature mine,
Could I but ever know
How restful is thy lap,
How soft thy bosom heaves,—
Less often would I, sliding
From out thy close embrace,
Seek to carve a pathway
For myself amid the crags
That climb the mountain's height,
More clearly would I feel,
That from thy sheltering arms
And with thine eyes to teach,
More gently could I view
The land that stretches far Beyond my little grasp,
And haunts me in my dreams.

Good to Eat.

A properly boiled ham is a delicious dish. For this purpose soak in cold water over night a small ham, weighing about seven pounds. In the morning take it out, wipe it over the fire in a saucpan, covering it with fresh cold water. Let it boil slowly for about three hours, then remove the skin and sprinkle it with a little sugar, make a few incisions on the surface and cover it lightly with fine bread crumbs, sprinkling a little white pepper over it. Set it in an oven and bake till well browned.

For a dish of apples and rice, peel a dozen golden pippins, core them; make a syrup of a cup of sugar and a cup of water, and boil them gently in it till they may be pierced by a straw. Boil a cup of rice in two cups of water for ten minutes, seasoning it with a teaspoon of salt. At the end of this time pour off the water and throw over it two cups of milk. Arrange the apples in an earthen pudding-dish. As soon as the rice is thoroughly done and has absorbed the milk, pour it around the apples. It should fill the interstices between them, but not the hollows left by the cores. Put in these hollows a little sugar and a preserved cherry. Spread crabapple jelly over all, and serve the pudding with soft custard sauce.—Boston Budget.

Bakewell Pudding.

Line a soup plate with a rich crust: then spread over it a layer of red currant preserve, and one of red raspberry preserve or a layer of strawberry preserve alone, over which you must sprinkle two tablespoons of finely chopped blanched almonds, and one half an ounce of candied lemon peel cut in shreds. Then mix the following ingredients: one-half pound granulated sugar, one-quarter pound of melted butter, four yolks and two whites of eggs, and a few drops of essence of almond. Beat all together, pour over the dish and bake in a slow oven until the middle seems firm. When cold sprinkle powdered sugar over the top. To be eaten cold with cream. It is to be cut like pie, and as it is very rich a small piece will suffice for each person. I procured this recipe and the one that follows in England, and they have been very much liked in this country. MARY KIMBALL WALKER

Almond Custards.

Make a rich boiled custard of a pint and a half of fresh milk flavored with vanilla. When it is ready to be taken from the oven, stir in rapidly one-half pound of finely chopped almonds. When cold, after stirring well put into custard glasses or cups. Both appearance and taste are improved by placing a little sweetened whipped cream on the top of each.—Home Magazine.

MARY KIMBALL WALKER.

Apple Fritters.

Beat two eggs until light without separating; add to them a half pint of milk, half a teaspoonful of salt, and sufficient flour to make a batter that will drop from the spoon about one cup. To this add a teaspoonful of baking powder and four apples, chopped fine; have ready a deep pan of fat, smoking hot, and drop the batter by spoonfuls into the fat; when brown on one side turn and brown on the other; when done lift with a skimmer, as piercing with a fork allows the steam to escape and makes the fritter heavy.—Table Talk

Mt. Holyoke.

The new term has begun and the under classes are rejoicing that the groans of the Seniors over "that psychology" have died out. The old term has been a busy one to all, and the change of work comes gratefully.

The new catalogue presents few changes in the now well established college course. To strangers to the college who still associate with the school only the idea of the seminary as it was founded, fifty-five years ago, a perusal of the Annual would give much enlightenment.

Have the Worcester Alumnae fully grasped the fact that The Mt. Holyoke is full of interest to them, and a literary attempt on the part of the students that should be encouraged.

The musical course has been given a wonderful impetus under Prof. Blodgett's management. The concerts by Victor Hugo, Prof. Blodgett and Miss Sawin have been especially good.

The term closes the 22nd with a reception from the faculty. The Sophomores give the Juniors their annual reception this week.

High School.

The Rhetorical exercises of Dec. 15 consisted of an essay on "The Trials of an Editor," read by Miss Kingsbury, '92; a song, Weldon Quartet; recitation, "First Thanksgiving in 1620," Miss Woodward, '92.

Mr. Gardner's class in Political Economy has been studying the subject of money for the past two weeks. Both single and double standards have been discussed until, now, the majority of the class are bimetalists.

There is a great deal of trouble about the signals on Monday. Never before was there such confusion. A few scholars start off at the first signal they hear, without thinking whether it is the right one or not. These few have so annoyed the teachers, that now the whole school is obliged to give its undivided attention to the reading and explanation of the signals every Monday morning. We hope that the careless pupils will soon wake up and relieve both teachers and the other pupils of all this unnecessary annoyance.

The class of '92 is evidently well aware that time is on the wing. More or less electioneering is going on about the officers of the class, especially for the president. A number of names have been mentioned as candidates, and considering that it is not yet the middle of the school year, there is sure to be a lively time at the election whenever it occurs.

Amherst.

The Fall term closes at noon next Tuesday, according to the catalogue, but according to student chronology and the "cut" system it closed last night. Very few of the students remain in town after Saturday noon, and many leave earlier in the week.

The Ninety-three Olio appeared last Saturday with its burden of sorrow and joy to the various members of the college. It is fully up to the standard of former years both in appearance and material. The opening sale in college hall was the largest ever held.

The college lecture course has been very interesting and successful this year. Last Tuesday evening the Boston Rivals gave the entertainment in the course before a large audience of students and townspeople. The course continues through a part of the Winter term.

The Monday Club held its monthly meeting at Copley Square Hotel last week. Dinner was served after which Dr. W. I. Rolfe of Cambridge addressed the club on "Hamlet."

It has been said that Prof. Borden P. Bowne will spend next year in Europe and that his place will be taken by William M. Warren who was formerly an instructor at the college and is now abroad.

The "First Annual Record" of the Class of '91, B. U. C. L. A. was published this week. It is a twelve page pamphlet containing the addresses of all the members of the class of '91 and what they have been doing since they graduated. It was compiled by John Wenzel the secretary of the class.

Examinations at the College begin Friday, Dec. 18 and last until the following Wednesday. There will then be a recess of two weeks.

The college social Friday evening, Dec. 4th took the form of a contrast party. Over 150 students and a majority of the faculty were present. Miss Mabel E. Langford, '93, was toastmistress. Toasts were responded to by Prof. Marshall L. Perrin, Instructor Foy S. Baldwin, Miss Louise Symonds, '92; Wilmont E. Butler, '91, and Arthur W. L. Nelson, '95.

It is rumored that the members of the Gamma Delta Society will give two receptions to their friends during the year instead of one as formerly.

Howell's "Mouse Trap" was presented by the Philomathian Dramatic Club last week. It was a great success.

Polytechnic.

Quite a large number of students had arranged to attend the lecture upon electricity at Mechanics Hall last evening.

Vacation of two weeks, lacking one day, an unexplainable omission, begins next Wednesday night.

Several students are out, with the mumps. Dr. Fuller has also been absent from the Institute for a few days on account of sickness.

Fifteen or twenty Seniors, who have found life too prosaic and humdrum, recently organized the "Socialists of '91." The members of this society, secret of course, intend to indulge in a series of socials, theater parties, sleigh rides and skating trips during the Winter season with now and then a dance perhaps. In fact anything which promises pleasure and sociability is to be tried. The first blow-out is to be a banquet next Tuesday evening. It is also rumored that theater boxes have been engaged for the night Sarah Bernhard plays here. The Socialists represent a bold departure from all precedent, a departure that nearly takes the breath away from the average student, and their career will be watched with much interest.

Rev. A. Z. Conrad addressed the Y. M. C. A. meeting last Tuesday noon.

The subject of an Institute hat is just now agitating the minds of the imaginative. '94 a few days ago appointed a committee of six to consider the feasibility of "mortar-boards" or uniform hats of any kind, and invited '93 to co-operate with them. '93 also has appointed a committee and the two meet together this noon. The craze for college hats is rapidly spreading through the country and many colleges are adopting them. It has but just reached Worcester and with what result remains to be seen. One thing however seems to be pretty certain, and that is that the average student has not the moral courage to appear on the streets of this great country town, in a "mortar board."

Those who have looked in at the windows of Pinkham and Willis, during the past week have seen not only the excellent picture of General Devens, but the finest exhibitions of work baskets that any one Worcester window has contained for many a day. They are here in all colors, sizes and designs. In these, not alone the beautiful is found for usefulness abounds as well. That big window is much like a kaleidoscope.

The following concerning Trinity's late pastor, cut from the Lowell Mail, will be appreciated by many Worcester readers.

"At the regular Sunday evening service held at St. Paul's Church last evening, the usual large congregation so increased in numbers that after the church was completely filled hundreds were turned away, there being no room for them to be admitted. Even the vestibules were filled, and many stood during the entire service. A manifest interest in all the services was indicated by the eager listening and intense stillness of the immense congregation." His sermon last Sunday on temperance was one of the most stirring ones delivered in that city.

Free Text Books

"We do all need a well-equipped private library if our reading is to go very deep. Public libraries are a great blessing but I am afraid they tempt us to spend some of the money in bonbons which we ought rightfully to spend in books. Free school text-books have the same tendency. They were introduced in Massachusetts with the best of intentions, but I have always felt that they defrauded all but the very poor of their right to own their school-books. A young lady forgets a date in history. She knows exactly where to find it in the text-book used in school, and if she owns the book, she refers to it and remembers the date ever after. But if she must spend an hour in a public library looking up the matter the chances are, she never does it and is always at a loss. Of course, we still are free to buy our text-books, but when our purse is light, the temptation is strong to use those provided."—Eliza Chester in Chats with Girls on Self-Culture.

Edwin Morse.

The death of this gentleman removes from our midst one of the notable figures of the years ago. A native of Andover, Vt., he was one of thirteen children of whom only one now survives. He came to Worcester in 1846 and has been engaged in various manufacturing industries since, though for the last twenty years he has been retired. Always a Republican, he served in the Board of Aldermen in the Mayorality of Pinehas Ball. He has had to do with the First National Bank from the beginning, since 1867 a director, has been president of the Mechanics Association and was an attendant at the Salem Street Church. His first wife was Miss Smith of Grafton and his second Miss Abbie C. Goodhue. His son, Captain Edwin A. Morse, died two years since. His daughters are Mrs. Alice Morse Earle of Brooklyn, N. Y., the noted writer, and Miss Fanny of Worcester. His funeral was held at his late residence at 2 p.m. yesterday.

The boys and girls have had a picnic at Clark & Sawyer's recently, but that is what the firm set out for and they allow the youngsters to go twice round and then out. If there is anything, calculated to cheer the youthful mind, that has been omitted, the house would like to know it. Many a tea table conversation, Wednesday evening, was monopolized by the lads who had been the rounds in Clark & Sawyer's.

Christmas Work.

Crochet Lace Holder.

This is a pretty and convenient article for holding the crochet lace which is so popular. Cut from cardboard four stars, from which a square has been cut from the centre. These stars should be about four inches in diameter from point to point.

Cover these smoothly with white linen and overseam each two together, working on one side some pretty design in silk.

Pass ribbon one inch wide through the centre of each star, and upon this wind the crochet work. Then tie the two ends of the ribbon over it in a bow, which will confine the work and keep it securely.—Household.

A Lace Drape.

One calculated to delight a dainty housewife is made of white wash net, rather fine. A hem two inches deep is turned up all around, and feather stitched with pink silk. Then a number of pieces of net are to be cut perfectly round and four inches in diameter. Gather the edge of one of these, draw it up to the centre, pat it out flatly with the hand, then embroider loose silk stitches across the centre. Catch these together to form triangles containing six apiece. Sew these airy conceptions across one end of the drape, and put a slender pink silk tassel on the point of each triangle and between the two. This drape is twelve inches wide when finished, and over a yard in length. The other end is finished by a fall of Fedora lace. It is bewitching to twist about an easel that holds a white-framed etching, and the cost is trifling.

A Pongee Knitting Bag.

Make it twelve inches long by six wide, of Pongee silk, lined with the same. The sides are to be sewed up to a height of six inches, then cut towards the top in a curving line, which leaves but three inches of width at the very top. This narrowest part is tied with a rich bow of yellow ribbon, and rests on the upper part of the arm, hanging there; while the lower portion of the bag keeps your ball of wool or yarn, allowing it to escape freely through the wide openings at the sides. Embroider a design upon one side of the bag, large daisies outlined with gold Japanese thread, couched on, with centres of brown silk in French knots. Finish the curved side-openings with gold cord, also couched on.—M. R. Ramsey, Philadelphia, in House-keeper's Weekly.

Something That a Boy Can Make.

An easy thing for a boy to make for mother, sister, or invalid friend is a writing-board, which is far better than a portfolio, and for an invalid's use is invaluable, as the things are all held securely in place and in no danger of being overturned.

A plain pine board twenty-three inches long by fifteen inches wide should be covered with dark felt cloth of any color desired.

In the center of the board arrange a sheet of blotting-paper, held down by strips of the felt and gilt-edged nails. Pockets of felt to hold paper and envelopes may be put on to suit the taste, and places should also be made to hold pencils, penholders, a knife, etc.

The leather inkstand may be attached by cutting several notches in the felt, and setting the bottle on the bare board. Then glue the notched pieces up on the leather of the bottle, and this will hold it firmly, and have a neat appearance at the same time.

Make a pen-wiper, and glue to the left of the pad.

These boards fitted out with inkstand, pencils, etc., may be bought for $5; but, aside from the satisfaction, the expense of making one at home will be far less.—Mary F. Harman in Christian Union.

An Essay On Man.

Man that is born of woman is small potatoes and a few in a hill. He rises up today and flourishes like a rag-weed, and tomorrow or the next day the undertaker hath him. He goeth in the morning warbling like a lark, and is knocked out in one or two seconds.

In the midst of life he is in debt, and the tax collector pursues him wherever he goeth. The banister of his life is full of splinters, and he slideth down with considerable rapidity. He walketh in the bright sunlight to absorb ozone and meeteth the bank teller with a draft for $357.

He cometh home at eventide and meeteth the wheelbarrow in his path. It riseth up and smiteth him to the earth, and falleth upon him and runneth one of its legs into his ear.

In the gentle spring-time he putteth on his summer clothes, and a blizzard striketh him far from home and felleth him with cuss words and rheumatism. In the Winter he putteth on his winter trousers and a wasp that abideth therein causeth excitement. He starteth down into the cellar with an oleander, and goeth backward, and the oleander cometh after him and sitteth upon him.—Exchange.

New York Fashions.

For Young Ladies

numerous light weight silks in lovely striped patterns or showing sprays at intervals, are shown. Grape finished silks are also charming and both come for a dollar or a little more per yard, thus rendering the dress not expensive. As a change, are almost innumerable varieties of gauze, crepealine, crepon, chiffon, net or tulle, the last named when bestrewn with apangles or imitation jewels, having a rich yet light effect. These are made usually with very short basques or round waists and give opportunity for all manner of fanciful drapings on the corsage, together with jaunty corselets, peasant waists, ribbon suspenders, or ornamental belts that present just the right contrast to thin fabric. Velvet bodices with thin skirts are in high favor and like the coats mentioned previously, are economical because readily transferred to skirts of any character.

ROSALIND MAY.

Twenty-nine dollars a yard is the price of some rich pearl passementerie designed for wedding dresses. It is true that it is a collection of so many beaded wings, like butterflies, each one of which, about a tenth of a yard, serves for an aigrette or evening head-dress. Nearly all of these expensive passementeries can be separated into their figure patterns, and each distinct figure is a pretty decoration.

The man's overcoat, paletot, or box-coat, furnish the latest models for some of the heavy cloth wraps for woman's wear.

A good arrangement for a showy tartan is to make sleeves and side breadths of it, with one black breadth, combined with darkest blue cloth, the perfectly fitting blue cloth waist buttons on the left side, with button-holes of the exact shade, in orange, that is found in the tartan, and the scanty blue cloth skirt is slashed to the waist, in three places, to display the tartan panels.

METHODIST.

The annual meeting of the Worcester M. E. Social Union was held in Grace Church, last Monday evening. After partaking of an excellent repast, served by Caterer Yeaw, the report of Secretary Charles H. Carpenter was listened to and, also, that of Treasurer N. H. Clark, showing the financial condition of the Union to be healthful. The committee appointed, two months ago, to report a list of officers for the ensuing year, reported and, on motion, the secretary was instructed to cast a single ballot for the following list: President, P. Foster White; vice-presidents, C. O. Richardson, John Legg and H. C. Graton; secretary, Charles H. Carpenter; treasurer, N. H. Clark; directors, J. W. Stanton, C. S. Goddard, A. M. Thompson, M. G. Fuller, C. A. Richardson, J. F. Lundberg.

In behalf of a committee, on restoration of the old Worcester District, Rev. J. O. Knowles offered a resolution, setting forth the merits of the plan and asking the endorsement of the Union, which was unanimously made. The same will be submitted to the next annual conference.

Following this, Joseph K. Greene, Esq., gave a most happy half hour address, abounding in witty allusions and interesting reminiscences. Then the Rev. Dr. David H. Ela of Boston, a former pastor of Grace and who was the guest of the evening, spoke on the work that he is at present doing in Boston. He outlined the changes that time has wrought in the location of churches in that city; that in old Boston, only two Methodist Churches now occupy the territory where formerly were nine. Foreign population has usurped the old places and Methodists have moved out. It is to try to regain some of this lost ground that evangelical Boston is working. Baptists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians and Methodists are putting forth extra effort to render crowded centers better. The Doctor's remarks were filled with facts and were interesting throughout. Among out of town people present were Revs. George S. Chadbourne of Boston, S. C. Carey of Gardner, J. P. Kennedy and Mr. H. Maynard of Shrewsbury and the Rev. Mr. Stratton of Oakdale.

The gathering was one of the most interesting in the whole series, closing the fourth year of the Union's existence. It was brought to a close at about 10 o'clock with the benediction by the Rev. Alonzo Sanderson.

TRINITY.—The following officers have been elected by the Sunday School board for the coming year: Superintendent, Joseph K. Greene; assistants, Arthur E. Dennis, B. G. Luther; secretary, Herbert Greene; treasurer, A. E. Walls; librarian, Edwin F. Templeton.

THOMAS STREET SWEDISH.—The third quarterly conference was held on the 13th inst. at 6.30 p. m. During the pastquarter, forty-one members have been received on probation, seventeen in full connection and five by letter. In the same time, twelve have removed from the church. The average class attendance is from 80 to 100. A larger church is becoming a necessity. Something over five hundred can be seated in the edifice now. In addition more than 100 chairs are used every Sunday evening, and yet crowds of people go away unable to get in. If some of the vacant space in other edifices could be utilized it would be a good thing. The people and their pastor, Mr. Eklund, have perfect confidence in each other, hence the very flattering situation. Possibly, too, our Swedish friends are more given to church attendance than some of the native Americans. Dr. Geo. S. Chadbourn preached at 7.30 p. m. last Sunday.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The Lake View Endeavor Society has elected officers for the next six months as follows: President, Archie N. Goddard; vice president, Leslie M. Briggs; secretary, Miss Katie E. Hamilton; treasurer, Miss Louise A. Scott; lookout committee, Winifred S. Perry; prayer meeting committee, Miss Lilla H. Hacker; social committee, Mrs. G. A. Haggar; temperance committee, Warren A. Scott; calling committee, Mrs. Emma L. Barker; flower committee, F. E. Goddard; Sunday-school committee, Miss Ida Hacker.

As a No-license worker these societies seem to be very effective. Last Spring they succeeded in keeping the city's Summer resort, the Lake, free from the vile traffic and they were, beyond all question, one of the leading factors in bringing about the reversal, this week, of last year's vote. Their plan of work has been to deal with individuals and not with masses. The result shows that the work was well done. The Epworth Leagues of the Methodist Churches also deserve a share of the praise, as they co-operated with the Endeavor societies in the personal canvass.

The Pilgrim Endeavor Society has selected officers for the next six months as follows: President, Walter S. Davis; vice-president, D. B. Tucker; recording secretary, Charles F. Stetson; treasurer, Miss Effie J. Fletcher; corresponding secretary, Miss Emma M. Plympton; chairmen of committees—lookout, Miss E. M. Plympton; prayer meeting, Henry Coley; social, Miss Grace Larkin; Sunday School, C. C. Brown; missionary, Miss Sarah Gould; flower and relief, Jessie Duckworth; temperance, Edward S. Jones.

The executive committee of the Local Union will hold its regular monthly meeting next Monday evening.

BAPTIST.

The Baptist people living at Lake View have organized a mission and, with the assistance of the Baptist ministers from the city, hold meetings every Friday evening at the home of Mr. J. H. Hayden. This is the third denomination to hold regular services in the village, the Congregationalists having an organized church and owning a good sized church building, and the Methodists having a mission which meets in Wesley Hall. It would seem that the two were nearly sufficient before but the Baptists desired to worship according to their own doctrines and though they start with a membership of but twenty-one, they take encouragement from the fact that many successful missions have begun with less numbers.

UNIVERSALIST.

Miss Rose Fish has been appointed a lady visitor for the First Universalist Church.

CONGREGATIONAL.

PILGRIM.—At the annual meeting of Pilgrim Parish held Monday evening, J. M. Russell was elected a trustee for four years; A. H. Longley, auditor for two years; Benjamin F. Joslin was chosen treasurer; F. P. Knowles and George S. Boutwell were appointed a committee on music and $8,400 was appropriated for next year's expense.

SUMMER STREET. This church held its annual business meeting Monday evening when the annual reports were read and the following officers were elected: Clerk, C. W. Dodge; deacon, Andrew S. Merritt; treasurer, George Anderson; auditor, C. O. Wheeler; trustees—C. W. Dodge, C. O. Wheeler; standing committee, John Vincent, Mr. Currier, Mrs. W. T. Sleeper; Sunday School Superintendent, Rev. W. T. Sleeper; assistant, C. W. Dodge; clerk, Ralph Knapp; librarian, Charles Grover.

The first of a series of indoor athletic and gymnastic contests was held in the gymnasium last week Friday evening. The events were all handicaps. Several more will be held during the Winter.

Tomorrow the morning meeting will be led by Mr. Frank Jerome, the boys' meeting at 3 o'clock will be addressed by Mr. Edward Morris of Plymouth Church and the men's meeting at 4, by Dr. McCullagh.

The class in elocution met Tuesday and will meet again next Tuesday. There is an opportunity for two or three more to join the class. Prof. Hastings of Boston is the instructor.

The class in electricity also met Tuesday evening. If there are any others who desire to avail themselves of the opportunity of receiving instruction in this science from so able a teacher as Prof. Kimball, they can do so by attending the meeting next Tuesday evening.

A successor to Mr. Meade will probably be appointed very soon. It has not been decided whether there will be two assistants or one assistant and a clerk.

Over 2,000 invitations will be sent out next week for the annual New Year's reception. The program will be more elaborate than that of last year and will include music, refreshments and gymnasium exhibitions. The entire building will be suitably decorated for the occasion. The reception will be under the direction of the reception committee and the women's auxiliary.

These letters have grown to mean something. They need no interpretation to the readers of this paper, for friend and foe alike know what they mean, among other things, the destruction of the saloon. The present week has been a busy one for them. Sunday their "call to arms" was read from every pulpit in the city, or better, one was sent to every pulpit to be read therefrom. Then Monday, they put out 17,000 appeals to the voters of the city. These circulars were placed, if possible, in the hands of the women in their homes, not entrusting them to boys and the hired girls. With a chairman for each ward, sixty women were thus banded for work. The general committee consisted of Mrs. Helen DeCamp, chairman, Mrs. H. W. Ware, secretary, and Mrs. M. M. Townsend, Mrs. R. D. Oaks, Mrs. J. H. Martin, Mrs. D. E. Knight and Miss S. Pellet. The Romans of the days of Regulus were not more implacable in their hostility to Carthage than are these energetic women against the saloon. "Carthago delenda est."

Mrs. Frank J. Howe.

This lady who was, formerly, Mrs. George W. Shillaber died, Tuesday morning, aged forty-six years. Her serious illness is of recent date, though she has not been strong for the last twenty years. With her husband, to whom she was married in February, last, she has carried on the wall paper business on Main Street. The funeral was held at her late residence, 182 Main Street at 9:30 a. m. Wednesday, the Rev. H. J. White of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church officiating. Many friends were present and left there several beautiful floral tributes. The remains were taken to Peabody on the 10:30 train for interment.

The Light Infantry, Co. C, 2d Regiment, held the first of three socials at the armory last week Friday evening. The big drill shed was used for dancing for which Bicknell's orchestra furnished music. Rebboli was the caterer. Lieut. P. L. Rider was the floor director and was assisted by H. L. Adams, W. N. Brooks, S. F. Gates, George H. Learned, W. S. Lincoln, Henry Marsh, Henry Gross and E. E. Johnson. There was a very large attendance. The next in the series will take place January 8.

The Fairy Boat with its occupants has been the attraction in the north window of the Boston Store for a week and, scarcely an hour has a crowd been lacking to admire the craft and its crew. By concealed machinery, motion is imparted to the boat and Santa Claus, who sits in the stern, and looks with complacency on the multitudes who gaze through the great window at him. He does not, often, come by water, but perhaps he will have to, this year.

They were poorly dressed boys, but the Candy Castle in Rebboli's Store did tickle their fancy. "I tell you what," says one, "that's my kind of candy." But the other lad thought his taste would lead to another choice. No wonder they liked the sight. Sugar delights could not be more attractive. The castle is a great tribute to some candy maker's ingenuity and there isn't a child in Worcester who wouldn't gladly, be imprisoned in it, and thus have a chance to eat his way out. It is talked about, no little in the homes where the children have been out exploring. Of course all the surroundings of the castle are of sweets also and both windows open up vistas about which the children dream.

The window decorator has been at his work in great shape during the past week. Such sights! Edward L. Smith & Co. never had a finer display than their north window presented last Wednesday. The round track with the train of cars has become an elevated railroad in the midst of a bower, not of roses but one of handkerchiefs that is a wonder to behold. The maker has reason to congratulate himself on his success.

"Oh Papa!" says a small boy who had been making the rounds of the beautiful store windows, at Zahonyi's Candy Store, there are great big candy pigs. They look awfully funny." No wonder the sight pleased the boy and aroused visions of saccharine delight, for by the side of the pigs are cakes and candies of all description, enough to fill him up to repletion. Here are great piles of all sorts of candy, the very best ever made, and when bought, it is done up in such nice boxes it really gets added sweetness thereby. Zahonyi comes pretty near Santa Claus with the little folks.

The Ruling Passion.

Not long before his death, Barnum summoned his lawyer to the side of the couch where he was lying. "I am very much worried," he said, "about a certain matter, and I want to consult you. My neighbor keeps peacocks. Now, suppose some of them should fly over into my yard—which they are doing all the time—and lay some eggs here. Would those eggs belong to me, or could my neighbor compel me to give them up?" The lawyer, having duly scratched his head, answered: "Well, Mr. Barnum, I must take time to look into this matter. But the best thing for you to do would be to keep the eggs and let your neighbor sue for their possession." In that way your rights would be determined, and we should have a very valuable test case." "Well," said Barnum, "while you are looking into the matter, will you find out how it would be if the eggs were laid by peacocks?" The lawyer swore softly to himself, but never made any investigation.

Sick headache can be relieved, and often cured by the application of mustard plaster on the back of the neck, but it should not be kept on more than twenty minutes. The best way to make such a plaster is to take a tablespoonful of mustard and mix it well with the white of an egg that has been well beaten. Such a plaster will draw perfectly well and not raise a blister.

For sharp pain in the head an equal mixture of pounded rice and salt put in a cotton bag and applied to the head will generally cure it.

To purify a sick room set a pail of water in the apartment and in a few hours it will have absorbed the most of the respired impurities of the room leaving the air much purer. The water should be changed frequently, and water for drinking purposes should not be kept in the room. Water that has been held in lead pipes all night should not be used for cooking or drinking, until it has been allowed to run freely, as it is often impregnated with the lead. D.

Blacksmiths, and those who work in steel and iron, very often get a speck of hot metal in the eye; it adheres to the eyeball causing intense pain. When this happens a few drops of oil, dropped in the eye or applied with a small camel's hair brush, will remove it, and if the eyeball is injured the oil will heal it. The oil and brush never fail to remove all dust and specks that may get into the eye, without the least injury to the eye. If oil is not on hand wet the brush in warm water, but do not rub the eye with the finger or cloth. If the eyes are weak, wash them with a tea made of rose leaves, night and morning. D.

Pastry made with lard although it looks better, is not as healthy or as good as that made with butter.

If pumpkin is peeled, cut up and stewed rapidly, it makes coarse pies which have very little of the native sweetness of the vegetable. If it is cooked in a very small amount of water, in a thick, porcelain-lined kettle, where it will gradually steam for six or eight hours, it acquires a richness and sweetness that cannot be obtained by any other process of cooking it.

Every particle of fat cut from the kitchen meats should be carefully fried out. Coarse fats, like mutton, lamb and turkey, are for the soap fats, but are none the less valuable for that. Beef fat properly clarified and strained is equal to butter for shortening and frying. It is incomparably better than lard. Breadcrumbs saved from each day's cutting of bread, properly dried in the oven and rolled and sifted, go far toward keeping a stock of breadcrumbs on hand for veal croquettes and other dishes. If every particle of stale bread is saved, pounded and sifted, there need be not a jar of cracker crumbs purchased.

Chocolate Caramels.—One pint of New Orleans molasses, one pint of brown sugar. Cook till brittle when tried in water, and just before removing from the fire, add half a cake of chocolate. They do not need any flavor.

Nearly all colds are slight at first, but their tendency is to so lower the system that the sufferer becomes a ready victim to any prevalent disease. The use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, in the beginning of a cold, would guard against the danger,

About Folks.

Rev. I. J. Lansing spoke in Stoneham, Tuesday night, before the church of W. W. Sleeper, his former associate in the Salem Street Church. Mr. Sleeper is having a course of lectures and his former leader is one in the list.

Dr. David H. Ela, who addressed the M. E. Social Union, last Monday evening, was the pastor of Grace Church from 1882 to 1885. During his pastorate a vigorous and successful effort was made to reduce the church debt.

Dr. D. O. Mears spoke, Monday, in Boston, before the Congregational ministers on "The Sermon and its Limitations."

Rev. Dennis Scannell has been in Washington.

Grand Prelate, D. E. Denny and Grand Preceptor, Frank R. Hayden of this city went to Haverhill, last Tuesday evening, to witness the work of the Knights of Pythias of that city.

Mr. H. H. Merriam gave a very pleasant entertainment in Association Hall last Monday evening to the employees of the Knowles Loom Works, and for the benefit of the Relief Association belonging to them. Accompanied by stereoscopic views, the trip with the traveler was a rich treat to his listeners.

"It never rains but it pours." Principal W. H. Bartlett has reason to believe this, for scarcely had he gotten out from his five weeks "lay up" on account of his foot, before he had an attack of acute bronchitis. Then came malaria and lastly inflammatory rheumatism. There are a few more complaints known to the profession but our principal hopes to escape some of them.

Drummer Boy.

Everything points to a very successful presentation of the play at the theater the last week in the month. Post ho has so often rendered this drama, it has become almost second nature to the performers. The rehearsals are in active progress.

The National Conservatory of Music of America.

The Board of Directors of the National Conservatory of Music of America, 126 and 128 East Seventeenth Street, New York, respectfully ask your attention to the fact that the semi-annual entrance examinations take place as follows: Violin, violoncello, contrabass, harp, and all other orchestral instruments, January 4th, 1892; piano and organ, January 5th; voice, January 7th and 8th; orchestra, January 4th; chorus, January 6th; operatic chorus, January 7th.

The Reunion of Colonel Sprague's old regiment at the Lincoln House, Friday night, came too late for description here, but will be written up next week. EVERY FAMILY

Should be provided with Ayer's Pills. No other aperient is in such general demand or so highly recommended by the profession. Mild but thorough in operation, these pills are the best of all remedies for constipation, biliousness, heartburn, indigestion, flatulency, loss of appetite, liver complaint, and sick headache. They break up colics, fevers, and malarial, relieve rheumatism and neuralgia, and are indispensable to travelers, either by land or sea. Sugar-coated and compounded of the purest vegetable cathartics, they may be taken with impunity by old and young. Physicians recommend these pills in preference to any other. H. W. Hersh, Judsonia, Ark., says: "In 1853, by the advice of a friend, I began the use of Ayer's Pills as a remedy for biliousness, constipation, high fevers, and colds. They served me better than anything I had previously tried, and I have used them in attacks of that sort ever since."

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1891.

No. 17

A Christmas Carol.

"O clear and shining light, whose beams
That hour heaven's glory shed
Around the palms, and o'er the streams,
And on the shepherd's head,
Be near through life and death,
As in that holiest night
Of hope, and joy, and faith,
O clear and shining light!"

—Mrs. Hemans.

We love Christmas.

That is, everybody but the old Scrooges of whom there are still quite too many alive.

After all, while they live they may change. Possibly, even in their souls there are chinks into which a little of divine love may make its way.

Surely, no one can complain of any lack of sunshine for the past few weeks. The weather, except as it has lacked snow, has been perfect, and the shop windows a study.

How the shoppers have exulted and what glad faces the children have worn! They have been glad to part with their money and the tradesmen have been more than glad to take it, so all have been happy.

Twelve hundred pounds of candy over one retail counter, in one day, is just one record. Our little folks should be sweetness itself, if sugar can help the quality along. And as childhood is largely devoted to sweets, what a blessing it is that duty was taken off sugar.

And yet with this thought comes the sad compensation that doctors have discovered a new heart trouble and they call it the candy heart. Those people, little and big, who give way too much to any taste must pay for their satisfaction in some form of ailment. "We can't eat our cake and have it."

Do people buy more than they need at Christmas time? Surely not more than the merchants would like to sell. Quite likely, beauty and ornament are rated higher than utility and presents are intended, as a rule, to gladden the higher senses rather than to meet physical wants. The custom is a growing one. It is not so long since "A Merry Christmas" was not an agreeable greeting in New England.

In fact, it was not till 1856 that the Holiday was made a legal one and a judge of the United States Circuit Court, sitting in Boston, who adjourned over the day in 1852 thought he was making a great innovation. Yet Washington Irving had written his Bracebridge Hall years before and it is probable that forty years ago the day had its significance even in Massachusetts, but the influence reaching out from Plymouth was lasting.

The Pilgrims had little relish for memories of churchly rule, whether that of Rome or England and they preferred their own Fasts and Thanksgiving to Christmas whose origin they knew was, to say the least, peculiar. Everything, or nearly so, of stated religious form they ignored and then set up their own negatives that became, with them, as rigorous as the rules they deplored. In spite of this lack of Christmas thawing out, they managed to rear a pretty high type of manhood.

Join to the Pilgrim appreciation of right, to his high standard of truth and justice, just a grain of delight in the higher senses and we shall have the nearly perfect man. It matters not what modern critics and would be detractors may say as to the company, sheltered in the Mayflower's hold, the western world is brighter and better today for their existence. Better err on the side of morality and Godliness than towards the looseness and immorality of Continental Europe.

We have missed all these twenty years the delightful story sermons that Charles Dickens used to preach to us every Christmas time. We have had no "Mugby Junction," nor "Carols," nor "Chimes," since he died. "No Thoroughfare" was last threaded by him. This glad season cannot return without, at least, a hearty thanksgiving that Dickens gave us so much happiness over Christmas.

Notwithstanding the sunshine and the high temperature, La Grippe, has had its accustomed hold upon the people. It has been no respecter of persons. Rich and poor, old and young have alike suffered. Not only have suffered but are suffering for its grasp is not relaxed in a day. Schools have been invaded and teachers have had to lay aside their authority and yield to the Grip. The years bring queer ailments.

How can Christmas be merry at that hill-side home, whose little Johnnie Rice is burned to death. Just old enough to begin to talk of Santa Claus and the hanging stocking and then, in all his boyish beauty, to die so agonizing a death. The bon-fire, Saturday last, the stumping each other to do hazardous things as running through the flames are all sports of childhood, but little three years old Johnnie was only an infant. He could not do with impunity what others did and now a newly made grave is a sad reminder for Christmas time. We must look out for our darlings.

Again we are startled by a sudden death, directly attributed to drink. August Eckstrom whose name proclaims him a North European, sleeps off, in part, the effects of his debauch on the very edge of the precipice beyond the Normal School, then partially awakened he seeks his hat and plunges to his doom. There is nothing of romance in this to awaken a poet's lyre, but it is a piece of reality that should arouse a voter's remembrance. He had placed in his mouth that which stole away his brains. Was it right to allow this even though it was legal?

Christmas week cannot prevent the constant occurrence of the question, "How did it happen?" The opponents of License are as much surprised as are its friends. With the present outlook, it will be useless to claim Republicans as the sole friends of the measure, for in some cases the heaviest increase was in Democratic wards, not only in Worcester, but in Boston. In fact it will need but little more conversion to make the latter a no license city. Is there a cat in the meal? The whole affair is phenomenal, and more than this, the success of such a measure does not lie in merely getting it through the polls. It only begins there. Is the community ready to see that the saloon is the leper of modern society and to do its utmost to suppress it?

The Pilgrims didn't like Christmas and they would have punished the man who undertook to observe the day, but they couldn't help their landing/being very near the 25th of December, so near in fact that Fore-father's Day and Christmas come in the same week. The observance of the event, last Monday evening by the Congregational Club of Worcester was a noteworthy occurrence. New England tongues never wag more freely than when discussing t' deeds at Plymouth. Though Dr. McCullagh is hardly to the manner born he assimilates easily and he rose fully equal to the occasion.

Evenings we knew,
Happy as this;
Faces we miss
Pleasant to see,
Kind hearts and true,
Gentle and dust!
Peace to your dust!
We sing round the tree.

—THACKERAY.

Though dated the 26th, LIGHT comes out this week, on Christmas eve., so this stanza from Thackeray is entirely appropriate. Perhaps he was not like Dickens the writer laureate of Christmas time, yet he had a gentle soul and cheery voice. His dust lies in Kensal Green cemetery, hard by the ceaseless roar of great London, but his pleasant words live on. There is a wealth of running vine about the great slab of granite that covers his grave, and many a pilgrim's eyes grow dim as they linger over this last resting place of Thackeray, but with one accord all chant "Peace to his dust."

Mrs. Whiting Fames of Dix Street is just up from a spell of illness.

Walter Perley Hall, who is a graduate of the High School, '85, and who was later in Brown University and Harvard Law School, will take up his residence in Clinton, succeeding to the office of Herbert L. Parker, who goes to Fitchburg.

Before you start out on your Christmas round of shopping, be sure to look through LIGHT's list of advertisers and give them the benefit of your buying. Every business advertised here is first class, no matter what the line is, it is the very best. Read carefully every advertisement.

Though dated the 26th this paper is issued the day before instead of the day after Christmas.

If your piano needs tuning, don't fail to call on Elwyn H. Fowler, 16 Oberlin Street. LIGHT can testify to the efficiency of his work.

Professor George E. Gladwin's beautiful Souvenir Book is out and it should, forthwith, find a place in many Worcester homes. It may be had at Room 9, Burnside Building, until Jan. 1st.

The New England Stenographer, edited by Aldis Owen Hall, comes to LIGHT's desk from Boston. It has an attractive and helpful look. Just the thing for those interested in any branch of the art.

H. Spencer Haskel, Esq., receives from a Chinese client a queer gift in the shape of 165 coins arranged in the form of a sword. It is probable that the lawyer's pen was more powerful than this weapon, though it is hardly a surrender.

Light Infantry

The efforts that this company is making to secure portraits of all its commanders is a highly commendable one. Those of Levi Thaxter, first captain and of John W. Lincoln, captain in 1812, have recently been received from Captain Levi Lincoln. The company room will soon be a study.

As Ayer's Sarsaparilla outstrips all other blood-purifiers in popular favor, so Ayer's Almanac is the most universally familiar publication of the kind in the world. It is printed in ten languages and the annual issue exceeds fourteen millions of copies. Ask your druggist for it.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Dec. 26, 1891.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Next week Thursday the last entertainment in the first series of the Young Men's Christian Association course will be given by "The Chorists'" Glee Club, which is composed of twenty men and boys from the vested choir of Grace Church, Newton, Mass. This is considered one of the leading boys' choirs of the country.

The Oratorio Festival.

All is now ready for the festival of oratorio music at Central Church next week under the direction of Mr. E. N. Anderson. The soloists, who are nearly all Worcester singers, are as follows: Sopranos, Mrs. Henry F. Harris, Mrs. J. A. Rice, Mrs. J. W. Mitchell; contraltos, Miss Florence King of the South Congregational Church choir of Boston, Mrs. F. W. Ruggles, Miss Nellie Broadbent; tenors, Frank H. Mason, Alfred Thomas, Thomas Hamilton; basses, John H. Howell and W. A. Anderson. The chorus is made up of local singers and it has been rehearsing for several months under Mr. Anderson's direction. The orchestra for the first day will consist of 26 pieces and the second day of 33 pieces from the Boston Festival Orchestra. Mr. Emil Mollenhauer will be concert master and Mr. Anderson, conductor. The programs are as follows:

Thursday, Dec. 31, afternoon, 2.30—Public rehearsal of Handel's "Messiah."

Evening, 7.45—Performance of "Messiah."

Friday afternoon, Jan. 1, 2.30—Miscellaneous program.

If the experiences of past years are repeated there will be scarcely a vacant seat at any of the concerts.

Lothrop's Opera House.

Miss Ethel Tucker, supported by Lothrop's Stock Company in "Lights and Shadows" is drawing large audiences at the evening performances this week. Miss Tucker is seen to excellent advantage in her character of Mabel Bland, the Gypsy, and again as Edith Broughton, the long-lost heiress. The company will give three performances Christmas Day.

The patrons of the Pleasant Street Theater will have an opportunity next week to enjoy a novelty in the form of first-class minstrel entertainment. The Fisco Minstrels will be the attraction and it is needless to say that the public will fully appreciate such a change, as the continuous line of melodramas which have been produced since the opening of the theater would satisfy the most fastidious taste. The members of the minstrel company are artists of acknowledged reputation. They have played to large and enthusiastic audiences wherever they have appeared. The prices will remain the same.

Mechanics Course.

Monday evening, Leland T. Powers, the character impersonator, will give the fourth entertainment in course A. Mr. Powers has a very wide reputation as an impersonator. He has appeared in the Young Men's Christian Association course several times and has invariably given a very entertaining program. Monday night he will recite "David Copperfield."

Relief Corps Officers.

The Womans Relief Corps No. 11, elected these officerses Thursday afternoon, the 16th: President, Emma A. Savels; S. V. P. Addie A. Pinkham; J. V. P. Melinda A. Stiles; treasurer, Lizzie M. Taft; chaplain, Mary A. Bushnell; conductor, Mary A. Mills; guard, Esther A. Parker; delegates to department convention, Emily E. Ward, Esther A. Parker, Angie A. Robinson, Abbie M. Gasset, Amelia R. Cook; alternates, Mary A. Mills, Mary S. Hine, Julia A. Stone, Lydia A. Wellington, Jessie W. Verry.

CONGREGATIONAL.

OLD SOUTH.—The Old South Sunday School elected officers last week Friday evening as follows: Superintendent, Edward L. Smith; assistant, C. D. Nye; secretary, George B. Farnsworth; treasurer, Walter S. Bliss; librarian, Hugo Otto. George R. Bliss, who has been superintendent for eight years, declined a re-election.

SWEDISH.—The new chapel of the Swedish Congregational Society at Quinsigamond Village was dedicated last Sunday afternoon. The program was mainly in Swedish and included Scripture reading by Rev. Victor Witting of the First Swedish Methodist church; prayer by Rev. J. F. Hultman of Deerfield, N. H.; and address of welcome by John A. Cornell, the Sunday School superintendent; music by the Swedish brass band; a sermon by Rev. K. F. Ohlson of the Swedish Congregational church on Providence Street; remarks by Rev. H. W. Eklund, of the Second Swedish Methodist church; remarks by P. W. Moen in English; prayer of dedication, Rev. Mr. Ohlson and benediction by Rev. Victor Witting. The report of the building committee stated that the cost of the building was $3,406.50. Toward paying this P. W. Moen had contributed $800; Joseph S. Perry, $25; R. H. Mooney, $10; P. Borg, by outside collections $153.50. This leaves a debt of $2,406.50. A collection taken at the dedication yielded $80 more towards paying this debt.

PARK.—Park Church Sunday School elected officers for next year two weeks ago, but since then there have been several resignations. At a business meeting Wednesday evening the vacant offices were filled and the list is now as follows: Superintendent, Charles R. Peacock; assistant, Louis C. Chase; secretary, Charles A. Newton; treasurer, C. Herbert Colburn; librarian, Francis Kneeland.

CENTRAL.—At a meeting of the Central church parish Monday evening officers were chosen for next year as follows: Clerk, F. E. Williamson; assessors, F. H. Morgan, W. E. Sawtelle, B. W. Potter, C. S. Knight, Jr., E. D. McFarland; treasurer, J. S. Brigham; auditors, R. B. Fowler, J. E. Fish; music committee, James Logan, G. W. Mackintire, E. Whitman; supply committee, Dr. T. H. Gage, B. W. Potter, E. A. Sumner. J. C. Woodbury was moderator.

METHODIST.

PLEASANT STREET MISSION.—That is it was the Pleasant Street Mission until last week, when it was decided that the building at 209 Pleasant Street was no longer large enough for the needs of the mission and so hereafter the meetings will be held in the two story dwelling at the corner of Abbott and Tufts Streets. There will be three Sunday meetings held, a preaching service in the afternoon, followed by a Sunday School, and a prayer meeting in the evening. Mr. S. J.

Laws will continue to be superintendent of the mission. The old building will be used hereafter by the Bethel A. M. E. church.

There will be a union watch-eight service of Grace and Trinity Methodist churches at Trinity church, December 31, beginning at 9.30 p. m. There will be a praise service, love feast and sermon by Rev. Dr. John D. Pickles. The services will close at midnight in the traditional Methodist manner.

WEINSTEIN SQUARE.—The following Christmas music will be sung under the direction of C. C. Kenyon, leader of the choir, Sunday, Dec. 27, '91: Morning—"Gloria in Excelsis" (Festival) D. Dudley Buck; "The Birth of a King," Nirdlinger; "Nazareth," B. Solo and full chorus; "Father in Heaven," (trio) C. C. Stearns. Evening—"Come Hither ye Faithful," Chadwick; "Calm on the Listening Ear of Night," C. C. Stearns; solo, "Oh! Holy Night," Adam; duet, "In Bethlehem a King is Born," J. C. Mary; trio, (adies) "While Shepherds Watch," C. C. Stearns.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The Endeavor Society of Old South church held a Christmas morning consecration service at 8 o'clock Friday.

The Endeavor Society of the Old South church has elected officers for the next six months as follow: President, E. Roscoe McAfee; vice-president, Wm. I. Thompson; recording secretary, Mary E. Browning; treasurer, Addison L. Kerr; assistant treasurer, Herbert L. Pariseau; corresponding secretary, Marion A. Knox; usher, Albert W. Kincaid; chairmen of committees—Lookout, A. A. McLaughlin; prayer meeting, Wm. H. Lincoln; Sunday School, Waldo Woodward; missionary, Beulah E. Lewis; temperance, Geo. B. Farnsworth; calling, Frank Morrill; social, C. A. Bancroft; music, Marion A. Knox; flower, Florence Shaffer.

At the meeting of the executive board of the Local Union, held in the Young Men's Christian Association building Monday evening, it was voted to hold the next regular meeting at Pilgrim Church January 19; a special meeting in observance of the Endeavor anniversary, at the Church of Christ, February 2; the regular March meeting at Piedmont Church; the May meeting at Belmont Church; and an invitation from the Lake View society to hold a special meeting with them in June was accepted. The program at the January meeting will consist of reports from the recent state convention and there will probably be a short consecration meeting at the close. The resignation of the Auburn society was accepted. A committee consisting of J. H. Childs, President D. B. Tucker and Mrs. Robinson of the Church of Christ was appointed a committee to draft suitable resolutions, congratulatory to the Junior Endeavor Union on its organization

The Endeavor Society of Union Church has elected officers for the next six months as follows: President, Edward C. Whitney; vice-president, Everett Kimball; treasurer, Roscoe N. Clark; secretary (recording), Miss Stevenson; secretary (corresponding), Miss Reed; Chairmen of committees, lookout, Miss Clarel; prayer meeting, Harry S. Whitney; missionary, Mr. Blakely; social, Miss Lathé; music, Oliver Kendall; finance, Roscoe Clark.

Mr. Sumner A. Kinsley, "Tech" '91, teaching in Lawrenceville, N. J., is at home for the Holidays.

Harry L. Dadman, Worcester's well known amateur athlete, has joined the Telegram reporter staff.

As a residuary legatee of the late Deacon Josiah W. Cook of Cambridge, the Worcester Academy is the possible inheritor of a large sum of money, possibly $8,000.

The second of the series of cotillions held at private residences will take place Monday evening, January 4th at the home of Mrs. Thomas B. Eaton, corner of Crown and Chatam Streets. It had been intended that it should take place at Mr. J. H. Clarke's on Elm Street, but, as his daughters are in mourning, a change was necessary.

The Louisville (Ky) Courier-Journal published, Dec. 6, in connection with its account of the Centre college-Louisville Athletic club football game, a portrait of Captain Walter D. Berry of the Centre college eleven, who is a Worcester High School graduate, class of '90. Captain Berry's interest in athletics began while he was in the High School, where he was always a member of the school base ball nine and a successful competitor in the athletic games. He was also for several years a constant attendant at the Young Men's Christian Association gymnasium. After his graduation from the High School he went to the Springfield School for Christian Workers, taking a course of study preparatory to becoming a physical instructor. Last Fall he was offered the position of physical instructor in Centre college at Danville, Kentucky and accepted it. Beside being physical instructor he is captain of the baseball and football teams. In the game written up by the Courier-Journal Capt. Berry's team was a winner with the score of 14 to 0. The account speaks of the victory as the "proudest that the young athletes of Kentucky's famous college have yet placed to their credit." It also speaks in high praise of Capt. Berry's management of his team.

Mrs. Maria Marsh.

It seems only a few weeks since the venerable figure of Alexander Marsh was a frequent and pleasant sight in our city, but he passed away in June, 1890, and now his widow is at rest. She died Monday, at 2 a. m., at her home No. 2 Oak Street, at the age of 85 years and 6 months. She was born in Southborough and with her husband came to this city in 1840. In 1889, Mr. and Mrs. Marsh celebrated their sixty-second wedding anniversary, away beyond the golden milestone. Her long life has been a pleasant one, a blessing to the community. She leaves four children, three daughters and one son, Mr. Henry A. Marsh of the Central National Bank. Her funeral was held at her late residence, Wednesday, at 2 p. m.

Co-operative Banks.

It is evident that some people appreciate the advantages of these institutions. They are loaning lots of money to stockholders, whereby homes are secured.

Upton's Historic Houses.

NO. 3.

The Upton Historical Society.

It is proper here to insert in the series of articles relating to the old houses of Upton, some account of an organization which has had much to do with inaugurating the movement which leads to the use of the columns of LIGHT in giving the annals of our old houses. This society is destined, if properly managed, to preserve our local history.

Every town in the world has its history. Its own citizens are the ones who should preserve that history, beginning with the time when its first inhabitants began to make history and, from generation to generation thereafter, put on record the events of their own time. The town clerks in the main do their duty faithfully, but as they record only the doings of a town in its legislative capacity, their limits are circumscribed. Parish and church clerks give a history only of their particular parishes or church societies. Neither the town nor parish clerks are called upon to record or take official notice of the thousand and one events which never call for legislative notice or action by town or parish, nor the executive oversight of selectmen and pastors, but which of themselves are of such prominence for the time being, as to exclude every other subject from the minds of men, women and children.

Certain events become marked epochs in a town's history; all other events being dated in reference to that time either before or after. "Before the war," and "since the war," are expressions common all over the country. So in Upton, we date certain things in reference to certain events which were the town talk, and at the Post Office, store and fireside were the principal themes of conversation for a long time. "Before Priest Wood died" is when a certain thing "happened" to our older citizens, or, "about the time Major Warren's new road sunk out of sight" was when something else occurred.

Having in view the preservation of such local traditions and histories of important events, the thought occurred almost simultaneously to three or four of our citizens to devise some method of preserving them. Chancing to speak of this one day to Charles A. Davis, then clerk in Stephen B. Fiske's drug store, he said the same thing had been mentioned to him by James S. Le Sure and one or two others. These coincidences of thought led to a call for a meeting which was held in the Assessors' room, Town Hall building, July 23, 1890. Such was the general doubt in which the success of the undertaking was held that only the original movers in the matter were present. These were J. Harvey Le Sure, James S. Le Sure, his son, Henry A. Corbin and Aaron F. Greene.

As eclat was not what they sought but effective organization, nothing daunted they chose the senior Le Sure chairman of the meeting, while Mr. Greene was made secretary. After the pros and cons had been well discussed Messrs. Greene and Corbin were chosen a committee to prepare a constitution and report at the next meeting, which was decided should be one week later at the same place.

On July 30, 1890, the meeting was held and the following officers chosen: President, John Harvey Le Sure; vice-president, Henry Walter Cain, M. D.; secretary and treasurer, Aaron Fay Greene; custodian of the museum, Henry Alonzo Corbin.

The constitution as reported was adopted. Article II states the objects of the society to be "to procure and preserve such records and objects of historical value, relating to Upton and vicinity towns, as shall be of interest to citizens of Upton. It shall also have such papers read and such discussions held by the members as may be fixed by the executive committee." The name as fixed by the constitution is, "The Upton Historical Society." The date chosen for the annual meeting of the society was June 14, the date of the incorporation of the town of Upton in 1735.

The first historical report read to the society was that by Mr. Corbin, Nov. 5, 1890, on the Old South burying ground. As he gave in detail the odd inscriptions and called up names familiar in Upton ever since it was settled, they were so full of historic suggestions that our worthy president, now eighty years of age, overflowed with anecdotes and folk lore of the long departed characters whose names the young people are forgetting. It was the beginning of many decidedly interesting meetings. Upton, like all old New England towns, is replete with history which would be as full of charm as that of Oldtown if a second Harriet Beecher Stowe would but give its annals to the world. It is the Upton Historical Society that is searching out the hidden histories in our town and bringing them to LIGHT.

Our museum, though small, is valuable. Its present quarters are at Mr. Corbin's house; but the need is felt for a more public place. The pecuniary resources are small. Any who may read this article and who may be interested in the objects of the society are invited to join. The conditions are, signing the constitution and paying fifty cents. Non-residents, by notifying the secretary in writing and remitting the fee, may become members. With this explanation we will now resume our history by giving an account of

The Ruggles House.

About an eighth of a mile east of the Center, on the Milford road, at the corner of what are now Milford and Elm Streets, stands a two story house with an ell on the north side, known to Uptonians as the "Ruggles" house. The original house of which the north ell is the only remaining part, was built some time before the Revolution between the years 1755 and 1760.

John Ruggles, a type of the hardy yeomanry of one hundred and more years ago, came here from Westborough and built the house one and one half stories high. He lived there until his death in 1802 at the age of eighty-one years. The house was made in the old-fashioned style, low-studded, with great, square-hewn, white-oak beams, split, hard-wood laths, wrought-iron hinges and latches to the doors, which indicated that with them service should take precedence over ornamentation.

Yet ornamentation was not ignored in country houses in those days. I have seen old door hinges that showed how the blacksmith who forged them had an artistic eye as well as skill in handling hot iron and a hammer. The little curling finger pieces found on some old door-latches, the ornamental screw-plates of the old fashioned door handles, all hand forged, are often times good models for designing artists.

The chimney of the Ruggles house was of brick, resting on a stone foundation. It included a large old fashioned brick oven, which last was taken out but a few years ago. A wide walk of flag stones led from the door to the roadside. The house then faced the south. Directly opposite across the road, where D. Willard Morse now has his garden, Ruggles built his barn. At right angles to the Milford road ran the old Mendon road, now called Brooks' Street. This road, now disused from Dennis McNally's place southward, went along the side hill to the east side of the old south burying ground, encircling it one-half, coming out near where the old cellar is of the first house ever built in Upton; across the road diagonally from where Nahum Hall now lives. The first meeting-house ever built in Upton was in this burying-ground. I have been told by an old resident that the pewter communion service used in this church was bought with money raised by a lottery. The readers of LIGHT may sometime have an opportunity of reading an account of that affair, also the reason why the old meeting-house was abandoned, a new one built in a more convenient location at the Center and the lively scenes and incidents which took place there and are not recorded either on the town nor church records. That was just before the Revolutionary war began.

On this old road, beyond where McNally now lives, lived Joseph Brooks, the great-grandfather of Charles E. Brooks and Mrs. Eliza Corbin. From that family the name of the street is derived. The Brooks house was burned down a few years ago.

John Ruggles left one son in Upton, Jeremiah, who died in 1817 aged sixty-two years. He married Keturah Daniels of Franklin. Keturah had a sister Melita, who married Capt. Jonathan Ward. They were the parents of the present Capt. Jonathan E. Ward, himself now eighty-two years of age with his faculties unclouded by advancing years.

Keturah died in 1851, nearly one hundred years old. Jeremiah and she had six sons, Calvia, Nathan, Luther, Harvey, Merrill and Milton, and two daughters; Julia, who married Lewis Rockwood, the builder of the wall around the North Street burying-ground. He was the oldest brother of Adams Rockwood who is now eighty-eight years of age. There were seventeen years difference between the ages of these two brothers. The other daughter was Sukee, who married Samuel Lackey of the Lackey Place on Christian Hill. Samuel and his wife died in Princeton.

Jeremiah was a blacksmith as were also his two sons, Harvey and Luther. The shop stood two rods north of the house. He died possessed of much real estate, owning considerable land on both sides of the Milford road and up what is now Elm Street nearly to Deacon Johnson's. He left a will giving the homestead to Harvey for caring for his mother, Keturah, through life and settled with the others by giving them $200 to $300 each. Henry Alonzo Corbit, a relative, who gave me these facts, has a deed in his possession dated September 6, 1816, from Luther Ruggles of Shrewsbury to Jeremiah. Luther, Jeremiah's son, had gone to Shrewsbury to live and while there married Sally Fales, so he sold some of his land back to his father. He with his wife and one child afterwards returned to Upton.

By 1830, Harvey's and Merrill's children had so multiplied that a larger house was necessary, so the two fathers enlarged the old one, making the main part two stories high and having the house face the town as we now see it. Near the center of the square formed by the four corners of the two roads and about four rods from the house stands a great elm tree, of which the early history is lost. The oldest inhabitant cannot remember when the tree was any smaller. Thomas Rockwood, son of Julia Ruggles, Mrs. Rachel Johnson and Mrs. Julia White, daughters of Luther, J. Harvey Le Sure the President of the Upton Historical Society, now eighty years of age, and who was born in a house that stood not more than two rods from the tree, say they played under the tree when they were young, and it seemed to make as great a shade then as now. The tree measures in circumference one foot from the ground, fourteen feet, eight inches; and six feet from the ground, ten feet, four inches. The tree stands on a gravelly knoll and has been exposed to the winds and storms of many generations. Its growth has not been so great as the Johnson elms, as they are situated in rich soil, but it is undoubtedly much older.

Nathan, one of Jeremiah's sons, was father to Charles Ruggles, for so many years the trusted ticket agent of the old Boston & Worcester Railroad Company at the old station on Foster Street, Worcester, and afterwards for a time at the Union station. One of Milton's daughters married Benjamin Benson, the head of the firm of Benson & Nelson, of Upton, straw goods manufacturers.

Harvey Ruggles, with whom we have the most to do, as he kept the homestead, married Julia Mixer, June 30, 1819. She died in 1833. They had the following children, names being given in the order of their birth: Eliza Wood, Calvin Harvey, Daniel Wallace, Samuel Smith, Luther Leander, Henry Claudius and George Ralston Jeremiah. Beginning with the year in which Eliza was born, 1820, and adding two years at the birth of every child thereafter, you will have the year of birth of each one of them. Henry Claudius married Ann Taft, sister of the late Hon. Velourous Taft. Henry died in 1856 leaving one daughter beside his widow, Ann. She married for her second husband Moses H. Bullard and with him has for several years past kept the Mountain House at Mt. Wachusett. George, now living in Milford, is the only one now remaining of all Harvey's children.

Harvey married for his second wife, Eunice Churchill, a widow with one child, Catherine, who, when she grew to womanhood married Lewis Corbin, now of Hartford, Conn. She, Catherine, was the mother of Henry A. Corbin, previously referred to and who is the enthusiastic custodian of the museum of The Upton Historical Society. He has a family Bible containing the family record of Jeremiah Ruggles' family.

Harvey built a machine shop, sixteen by twenty feet, just north of the house, for the manufacture of shoe kit. Horse power was used, a large overhead, horizontal wheel being used as the power transmitter. He made all kinds of shoe-kit i. e. knives, awls, hammers, etc., some of which are in use in this vicinity to this day. Other small tools, such as screw-drivers, carpenter's edge tools, etc., were made by him, and such was their excellence that his business increased greatly. After his death orders kept coming in so that George Ruggles came up from Milford to run the business, but soon after returned, not caring to continue it. It ended eventually as such business often has in other towns in Worcester County, the city of Worcester absorbed it. It is not difficult to imagine what a great advantage such an industry would have been to Upton had it been continued by Harvey's descendants or other parties. Harvey farmed it a little, raising his own tobacco besides his hay and vegetables, but never sold any of his tobacco. He gave it away to his neighbors when he had more than he wanted for his own use.

It is not generally known, but it is a fact, that Upton was once a station on the Underground Railroad, a channel used for the escape of runaway slaves. Young people of today need to be told that this name was applied to the secret channels of escape for runaway slaves on their way from the south to Canada. Travelling usually at night they would be carried or sent to certain known friends of slaves who always aided such fugitives. One much used line of travel was from Connecticut and Rhode Island north-easterly, through southern Worcester County to Mendon and Upton, branching at Upton, one road to Hopkinton, another to Westborough, through which the slaves could make their devious way to a land of freedom.

In Upton, Harvey Ruggles, Louisa Hall, sister to Nahum B. and Thomas J. Hall, Mrs. Harvey Bradish, (née Polly Dean) were the foremost ones engaged in this good work. Harvey Ruggles and Mrs. Polly Bradish entertained and sheltered many of them, Harvey carrying them in his wagon or sleigh to other towns and keeping them out of the reach of pursuing officers. Harvey usually took the fugitives very early in the morning before daylight, some to Hopkinton, some elsewhere, not many in succession to any one place lest he should attract attention. William Wells Brown, a fugitive slave who afterward became a noted public speaker, called one night on Harvey, being sent by another friend on the "Underground Railroad." This was not long before the war. Harvey sent Henry Corbin, then a lad, to Polly Bradish with a note requesting her to entertain Brown over night, which she did. At three o'clock the next morning, Harvey harnessed his team and carried the slave to a friend in Hopkinton, who was another secret agent on the same route. The pro-slavery people of Upton little dreamed of what was going on.

Harvey, naturally a big-hearted man, had his whole generous heart in the cause of the emancipation of slaves. He often used to say that he asked only to live long enough to see them made free, and when the civil war set in, often dwelt on the thought that the strife would end in the freedom of the black race in the United States. The battle of Antietam was fought on Wednesday, September 17, 1862. According to a vow which Abraham Lincoln had made before that battle, the following Monday, September 22, he issued his emancipation proclamation. Harvey died eight days after, September 30, 1862. Thus was his hope realized.

Luther, Harvey's brother, upon returning from Shrewsbury, opened a blacksmith shop in the northern part of the town near the Partridge place. Afterwards when the town divided the school district at the Center, Luther bought the old school house on Elm Street and made a dwelling of it. It was small but there were born most of his children. The school house is now the ell of the dwelling house which was enlarged as the family increased. Mrs. Rachel Johnson and Mrs. Julia White still live there. Mrs. Johnson who, with many other children attended the school in her girlhood, took me into the old part. The windows are of the small old-fashioned kind. The wall casings come up to the windows and show the marks made by the boys seventy five to one hundred years ago. Nearly the whole of the north wall was occupied by a fire place, which held huge back logs. The old men and women of today well remember that fire place. Many were the pranks "cut up" in those days. The school house caught fire once, the charred timbers still showing the fruit of one of those pranks. One bitter cold morning the boys who got there early thought they would warm up the school room quickly. So they piled the big fire place full of shavings, chips, bark, pine cones, dry wood, etc., until the top was out of sight up the chimney. Then they set fire to it. It was such a success that the school house itself would have gone if some of their fathers had not appeared in time to save it.

When the district was divided, one new school house was built on North Street, near the burying ground and called the "Center" school; the other built near the Deacon Johnson place and called the "Middle District." One of Luther's daughters, Susan, married Anthony Bull, an Englishman. They were the parents of Charles H. Bull, our present postmaster and merchant.

Daniel and Samuel, two sons of Harvey, went to Toledo, Ohio, and opened a shoe store. Afterwards Samuel returned to Worcester and opened a boot and shoe store there, which was kept by his son, Frank, after he died in 1879. Most of Daniel's and Samuel's sons became dealers in foot-wear. Leander, another of Harvey's sons, moved to Salina, Kansas. When he died he left two daughters, Josephine and Emma, the first of whom is a rising poetess.

Dr. H. T. Fuller of the Polytechnic is suffering from a severe attack of illness. He has been confined to his home for some time.

Mr. James A. Donnelly of this city, Sacred Heart Parish, was ordained to the priesthood in Springfield, Monday. At the same time and place, Mr. John J. Bell was ordained. Both will re-enter the University in Washington.

As things are going, it will soon be easier to announce the well people than those who are ailing. At present it is about "Half and half."

The Dartmouth Alumni of Worcester and vicinity met last Saturday in Horticultural Hall and after partaking of one of Caterer Year's dinners proceeded to organize. The exact place of meeting was that inner sanctum, called Nirvana Hall. Sixteen men were present, the oldest class was represented by Chas. E. Stevens, Esq., and the latest, '91 by H. S. Hopkins of Millbury. Lt. Governor Haile of Springfield was made president, Vice. Pres. Judge Hopkins of Millbury, Sec. A. W. Edson, Treas., B. F. Robinson. Ex. Com. C. E. Stevens, Hon. E. B. Maynard of Springfield, Judge C. C. Conant of Greenfield, A. G. Lewis, and L. L. Conant. A banquet will be given in February.

A University course for the city of Boston, under the management of the School Committee, is now freely discussed. With Harvard and the Annex across the Charles, Tufts College only a little way off at Medford, Wellesley almost in the city limits, Boston College and University with the Institute of Technology in the city, it would seem that the educationally inclined, might be educated; but then those Hubites have queer notions.

Boston is to have a University Club. Those who have received regular degrees from college, West Point, Annapolis, or Massachusetts Institute of Technology are eligible. It will cost $40 to join and $36 a year thereafter. Non-resident members pay half rates. This movement is supposed to mark an intellectual advance in Boston.

Hard after the opening of the Drexel Institute in Philadelphia comes the presentation to it of a fine collection of rare prints, manuscripts, autographs, etc., by George W. Childs. The lot is valued at more than $100,000 and is said to be one of the best in the country.

The school fund in Connecticut is richer by more than a thousand dollars, the principal and interest of a debt incurred at the beginning of this century by Luke Hayden of Torrington. Those Wooden Nutmeg farmers are honest.

What's in a name? Cambridge people now want the streets, Harvard, Main and Front, connecting Harvard Square and Harvard Bridge, all united under one name and that University Avenue.

Clark University.

"The work of the Clark University is probably now the most advanced of any university work in America. Clark University is in reality a normal or training school, where men are being fitted to fill the highest chairs as lecturers or professors in our colleges and universities.

The only danger as it seems to us is that specialization may be carried too far—a danger that timid minds have feared ever since our young men began to be educated at the German university."—Boston Budget.

High School.

The Rhetorical Exercises of Dec. 23, consisted of a "Twilight Song" by the Junior Quartette, and some practical remarks upon the coming vacation by the principal.

He said that there is an art in keeping a vacation and that it is not a time for "uninterrupted study" as a college professor once told his student. We may reasonably expect to be happy after a long term of study and especially so, at this festive time of the year, but in our happiness we should anticipate something serious.

One of the good uses to which we might put our vacation is to cultivate a desire for literature. "Literature is the supreme achievement of man."

He advised books of essays that would awaken our thoughts rather than a novel "for there is always something unwise in a great novel."

Miss Bridgman was suddenly called away from school duties one day this week. Miss Alice G. Arnold is acting as substitute during her absence.

We are glad to see that something is going to be done in certain rooms about heating. During the last cold snap some of the rooms were not up to regulation mark. Every precaution possible should be taken not to encourage the epidemic that is still attacking people in large numbers.

Holy Cross.

The Dramatic Club gave a most successful presentation of "The Celebrated Case" before the students, Tuesday night.

The priests of the college will assist at the various Catholic churches Christmas day. Father Welch will preach at St. John's, Father Langlois at Notre Dame and Father Jones at St. Ann's.

Rev. A. A. Maes, S. J., officiated at St. Ann's, Sunday, as the three priests of that church were indisposed from slight attacks of La Grippe.

Rev. James J. Donnelly, '87, will say his first mass at Sacred Heart Church on Christmas day.

The class of philosophy held their Christmas disputation in Fenwick Hall, Wednesday morning. It consisted of a Latin essay by J. A. Riordan, an English essay by S. A. Jennings.

J. P. Gorham defended Major Logic against D. L. Gleason and W. A. Kelley, the objectors.

Mr. A. O. Hall's Shorthand School.

Mr. A. O. Hall, the well known shorthand author, writer and teacher of Boston, has opened a Branch Shorthand School in Knowles Block, 518 Main Street, Worcester. Mr. Hall is author of perhaps the shortest shorthand in the world. He has so much improved and simplified the older methods that his pupils are able to read and write rapidly and accurately after a very brief course of instruction. We are pleased to learn that many of our enterprising young men and women are attending his school who express themselves as highly pleased with their instruction. One young lady informs us that she could take dictation after two weeks instruction with considerable rapidity. Mr. Hall's school is advertised on the inside last cover of this paper.

The parks of Chicago cover 2,000 acres.

Ballads of the Boar's Head.

O esulent morsel delicious,
All garnished with cassia and clove,
What more could the epicure wish us
To bring from the wars, Christmas stove!
But the men and the hunters long sought these,
In the fen and the rannel's deep reed;
And wind-blown with labor we caught these,
There are many to feed.

Euroclydon blew in the valley,
The plantain was burdened with snow,
Yet forth did we merrily sally,
Athwart the wild world just below.
But thou in impetuous rushes,
Adown the white meadow didst lead;
And we caught thee among the thick bushes—
There are many to feed.

O sweet is the eating of pigeon,
And other such daintful wings—
The mavis, the rynchops and widgeon
And many a mad post sings
But covered with rusk and with spices,
And herbs of the mid-summer mead,
E'en the sated thy savor entices—
There are many to feed.

So served up at Christmas for dinner,
With relish we'll carve thee indeed;
For Christ's birth brought food to the sinner—
There were many to feed.
—John W. Heffer.

A Ball Dress.

One of the High School teachers didn't go to the Policemen's Ball but her dress did. She happened to want it on the evening in question and it could not be found. The next day, it was in place again. The servant had borrowed it and worn it. Apologies would not suffice, and it will take many week's wages to pay for that night's pleasure.

Our Clerk.

Isn't it a little queer that after all these years of existence, as a city, we still have a Town (e) Clerk?

Five Cents Savings Bank.

The staging is down and the latest accession to Worcester's big buildings is revealed. By common consent the verdict is, "Nothing finer in the city." Architect Stephen B. Earle is receiving a deal of merited praise.

Judge Putnam.

Post to has Judge Putnam in very high esteem and hopes to see him command the State Department of the G. A. R., some time; but not next year. That date is reserved for Comrade James K. Churchill who has done manful and honest service for two years in the third and second places. Opposition was expected but not from this quarter. If our eloquent comrade wish.s the honorable office of Commander, let him put himself in line of promotion and Post to will work for him with all possible ardor, but just at present the Post wishes to see the Senior Vice Commander moved up. Nor will any statement, however plausible, have the least weight in changing this attitude. Further, the Post believes in promotion, has always worked for it, and is unalterably committed to the plan. There is no doubt that James K. Churchill will fill all the requirements of the position with credit. He should have a chance to try. Of course, there are old debts to pay, but Boston must recognize that she can't pay all of such obligations. In fact it will be better for the Grand Army to allow some of them to outlaw.

The Fifty-first.

If Worcester people do not get the story of the Rebellion by heart, it will not be because it is not often told to them. Regiment after regiment has its reunion and fights its battles over annually. The latest was that of the 51st Infantry, Friday, the 18th, which followed General A. B. R. Sprague to the front. It was nearly thirty years ago that the regiment started for the South. Its reunion comes on the anniversary of the stirring times in North Carolina where the most of its service was performed, and this year, it was held in G. A. R. Hall, assembling at 11 A. M. About 125 survivors were gathered together and surrounded by reminders of the old time strife indulged in pleasant reminiscences of the days that tried their metal. During the year, the following have answered to the final roll-call, Asa Wheeler and James Lewis, Co. A, Corp. C. H. Porter, Co. C, Charles O. Parker and Andrew Cotter, Co. E, Chester Scarborough and Henry Maynard, Co. F, James Callahan, Co. F, Sergt. Henry A. Clark, A. Jillson and Frank A. Woods, Co. I. So long a list is sufficient reminder that time is fleeting.

The officers for the ensuing year are: President, ex Sheriff A. B. R. Sprague; vice-presidents, Lieut. Col. John M. Studley, Capt. John S. Baldwin, O. P. Winslow; financial committee, Capt. E. A. Wood, Charles A. Heywood, Capt. Joel H. Prouty; secretary and treasurer, Adj. J. Stewart Brown.

Dinner was served by Rebball and the menu was a souvenir, worth preserving, calling attention to this as the 24th annual reunion. Following dinner, General Sprague felicitously referred to the days of old and to his gratitude at the honor so long conferred upon him. He then called upon Lieut. Col. Studley to perform a part that had been assigned to him. This part was the presenting to Adj. J. Stewart Brown of an elegant reclining chair, as an expression of the regard in which he was held by his associates, for, during all these years he has been the very efficient secretary and treasurer of the Association. The adjutant made a happy response, expressive of his regard for his fellow-veterans and his thorough appreciation of their generosity. A letter of regret over necessary absence was read from Col. T. W. Higginson. Ex-Mayor Winslow, the only honorary member of the association spoke as did Alderman George C. Whitney, a member, for the mayor, Francis A. Harrington, who was unable to be present. Remarks, also, were made by Capt. John S. Baldwin, Capt. E. A. Wood, Dr. J. H. Darling, J. B. Brooks, H. J. Jennings, C. H. Burleigh, J. W. Greene, J. B. Lamb, Capt. Horace Holbs, Capt. J. H. Prouty, J. E. Gordon, Stephen C. Earle, O. P. Winslow and B. F. Gibson. It was a quarter past five before the very pleasant meeting adjourned.

Company C.

In the evening came a smaller but equally happy gathering of Co. C. survivors. They ate one of landlord Tower's good dinners at the Lincoln House and then in the parlors they told their stories over again.

These veterans were present: C. A. Goddard, Charles H. Heywood, S. P. Lyon Perry, Benjamin Carrico, Winthrop Davis, Alfred M. Eames, Stephen C. Earle, W. H. Estey, S. H. Fuller, Warren (Glover, Loren L. Hicks, George E. Kendall, Moses A. Lowe, Charles A. Moore, Franklin A. Muzzy, J. Edward Nichols, Franklin Nye, Charles F. Pierce, J. Marshall Puffer, Henry W. Putnam, David G. Tapley, George S. Whittemore, J. O. Hemis, F. Pierce.

The officers for next year are: President Samuel H. Fuller; vice-president, W. H. Estey; secretary and treasurer, Charles F. Pierce.

Ex Sheriff A. B. R. Sprague, and Colonel Charles B. Fry of Providence, George M. Kendall of New York, F. E. Nourse of Holyoke, and John S. Rogers of Saratoga, sent letters of regret at necessary absence. A museum of war relics was opened, C. A. Goddard showing a hard tack preserved in a gilt frame, also the musket he took from a rebel at Beaver Creek, N. C. C. F. Pierce exhibited the tin coffee dipper he carried throughout his war service, and also the cap he wore. J. M. Puffer exhibited a powder flask he captured in Baltimore July 4, 1863. Then came an impromptu concert of war music to which all contributed according to ability. Clasped hands "Auld Lang Syne" closed the happy evening.

Boston Letter.

BOSTON, Dec. 12-19, '91.

The holiday shoppers are out and about in full force and in all their glory, and seem to be enjoying themselves hugely, especially those of the female persuasion, and that covers about all of them, as male shoppers, as a rule, are rather scarce, and remain at home to audit the bills that are kindly sent them.

Along Washington Street from School to Boylston you will find the largest crowds, and at noon time it is as much as you can do to move along at a snail's pace. Tremont Street is fully as well occupied, while the large army of fair shoppers literally capture Winter Street, Temple Place, and West Street and really have everything their own way there. The windows of the dry goods and fancy stores, have, as a rule, their goods handsomely displayed, to tempt the eye and purse of the passer-by. In fact stores of all kinds vie with each other in making as attractive a show as possible, and the artistic dressing of windows has become quite an art within the past few years. Some of the wealthiest concerns employ men who do nothing else, and are kept pretty busy too, at that.

The giving of presents at this glorious season of the year is of course a beautiful idea, and one worthy of encouragement, but it strikes me that in these days it is very much overdone in anything but the right spirit by a good many worthy people we know.

Of course it is not the intrinsic value of a present that alone should make it valuable, but the spirit in which it is given. What does the great poet say, "Rich gifts wax poor, when givers prove unkind."

Nowadays there is a sort of a barter and exchange of gifts, too often sizing up their pecuniary value, and sending something in return of about the same price, making a sort of a clearing house of one's purse—and conscience. The result is the next few weeks find a good many "short" of the market, so to speak—but what would you?—The same human nature runs through most of us and Christmas would not be Christmas without the presents, so let us all go in and say with Tiny Tim, "A merry Christmas to us all, God bless us."

In spite of the amount of money being spent for presents, the theaters appear to hold their own pretty well, good houses being the rule at all the places of amusement.

At the Tremont, Rosina Vokes with Felix Morris and an excellent company are as usual attracting very fine audiences, as they deserve to, for they are all artists, and in their line of delightful light comedy are unexcelled by anything that comes here.

The new Columbia theater on Washington street up towards the south end is the theater this year as far as a big business is concerned. Ever since it was opened last October, the house has been crowded as a rule and it has been difficult to secure desirable seats unless one bought them well in advance. The piece they opened with, "Men and Women," was much the best of anything they have produced. Since then "Mr. Wilkinson's Widows," a rather comical play, but not much to it, has been given. Tonight is the last one for "Jane" a bright laughable comedy; for next week Harry Dixie appears with Frohman's New York Company in "The Man With a Hundred Heads." A good many heads for a man to have even at Christmas time.

He is a great favorite here and will have a splendid reception. It gives him a good chance for his imitations and wonderful "make ups," and caught the town, as they say, in New York.

"The County Fair" at the Park still holds the boards doing as well as ever, and doubtless will do so during the entire season.

Agnes Huntington at the Globe in "Capt. Thersé" has drawn well as usual. She has many admirers in the city and always has a hearty welcome.

Next week "Blue Jeans" with its saw mill and barbecue is the attraction.

"A Fair Rebel," a military drama is at the Boston Theater; and "A Sailors Knot" at the old Museum is as good as anything they have given us here this season. Eben Plympton is back again as tending man with his English accent and manner, though he says acting bores him. At least so it is reported. He is an admirable painstaking actor just as the same.

WATSON.

Saved by his Wife's Ready Wit.

The Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke, the popular Episcopal clergyman of Chicago, made a bad break the other day, but was helped out by the quick wit of his wife.

On the day in question he saw a lady about to call whom he was anxious not to meet. So he said to his wife: "Now I'm off, my dear. I'll run up stairs and escape till she goes away."

After about an hour he quietly tiptoed to the stair landing and listened. All was quiet below. Reassured, he began to descend, and while doing so he thoughtlessly but emphatically called out over the balustrade:—

"Well my dear, has that old bore gone at last?"

The next instant a voice from below caused the perspiration to bedew his ministerial brow and rooted him to the spot. There came a response which sounded in expressively sweet to him just then. It was the voice of his wife, who with true womanly tact replied:—

"Yes, darling, she went away over an hour ago, but here is our good friend, Mrs. Blank, whom I am sure you want to meet!"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Got or Gotten.

An eminent Shakespearean scholar writes in the "Critic": "Apropos of participles in en, gotten, los got has similarly become popular within the last few years. This is legitimate, of course, but the dictionaries all give 'p. p.' of get as got, gotten, implying that the former is more in use; just as under forget they give forgotten, forgot. Some grammars refer to gotten as 'obsolete' or 'obsolescent.' Mr. Aldis Wright, in the last edition of his excellent 'Bible Word-Book,' (London, 1834) calls gotten 'the old form' of the participle, 'now used only in the compound ill-gotten.' If I remember right, one seldom if ever hears it in England, but it is getting to be the more common form in this country; and I have heard of teachers who tell their pupils that it is the only correct form. Shakespeare uses it only five times, his usual word being got." This recalls the remark of another critic, who says: "Gotten is a Chautauquian revival of an archaism, chiefly used by speakers whose undue anxiety for accuracy leads them to use phrases as 'Between you and I.' No first-class American writer, until within the past few years, and no first-class author up to this time, habitually writes gotten. Its most harrowing use, of course, is when the verb to get is itself quite out of place, superfluous, inappropriate, e. g., 'I have gotten back.'"

They Married (Write) A Long.

For the past ten years two Alongs, one named Write and the other Jonson, have lived near each other in Blount County, Ala., about ten miles from Blountsville. Mr. and Mrs. Write have five daughters about grown and Mr. and Mrs. Jonson had five sons who had attained their majority. The families were neighborly and intimate. Two years ago the two eldest Jonson boys married two of the Write girls. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Jonson and Mr. Write died at about the same time postponing temporarily the marriage of another of the Jonson boys to another daughter of the Writes. A short while ago Mr. Jonson, Sr., was married to Mrs. Write, and one of the two remaining boys married the youngest Write girl. The marriage was a double one. A few weeks ago the remaining Jonson boy was married to the last Write girl.

Deacon Jehiel Todd.

Deacon Jehiel Todd, the announcement of whose probably last illness was made two weeks in Light, died Tuesday, the 15th at his home, 105 North Street. Deacon Todd was 73 years of age, being born in Hinsdale, N. H., Nov. 4, 1818, the son of Caleb Todd, Esq. He was married twice, his first wife being Melissa Hildreth, who died in 1843 and his second, Susan Elizabeth Whitman who survives him. Of seven children three are alive as follows: Martha, widow of Hon. Rufus Livermore of Orange; Minnie, wife of J. A. Long and Alice, wife of C. W. Gilbert of the Gilbert Loom Company.

Deacon Todd came to Worcester in 1864, from Lowell, where for seven years he had been superintendent of the Middlesex County Mills. On his arrival in Worcester he founded a wholesale coffee and spice business in which he continued until 1886, when he entered the employ of his son-in-law, J. A. Long, furniture dealer at 555 Main Street, where he remained until last July.

In religious belief, Deacon Todd has always been a Congregationalist and the record of his work in the interest of the denomination is a long and honorable one. He was one of the original members of Plymouth Church, where he has been a deacon for many years. He was one of the most active workers in the City Missionary Society and was a life member of nearly all of the great Congregational missionary societies. Though his death has been expected for some time it is none the less regretted. The funeral was held Saturday at his late home and was conducted by Rev. Dr. McCullagh. The burial was at Orange.

Man is a two legged animal without feathers.—Plato.

The Thirty-Fourth.

This was a three years' Regiment, formed from Worcester County companies and others from the western part of the state. Those from this county were A. Capt. H. W. Pratt; C. A. D. Pratt; E. Wm. B. Bacon; H. Henry P. Fox; I. David Holden. Both of the Pratt's became Majors and Harrison W. died of wounds. Capt. Bacon was killed at New Market. John A. Lowell and Robert W. Walker were the Lieutenants in Co. A. Lovell became a captain and was till his death a member of Post 10.

The first Lieut. Colonel was Wm. S. Lincoln who so long held a prominent place in all military matters in this city. He became Colonel and was in command on its return. The first colonel, George D. Wells was killed at Sterling Farms.

General Lincoln has told the Story of the Regiment in a volume published in 1879. It was a labor of love on the General's part, very far from being remunerative. Coming of a family long identified with military matters, it was natural that General Lincoln, though in 1862 beyond the prescribed military age, should enter the army. He served through, encountering a great variety of hardships and, for many years after the war his was a picturesque figure in our midst, arrayed as he generally was in a military cloak. His son, Levi, was a Lieutenant in Company E. The regiment did excellent work in the Valley and Western Virginia Campaigns and at the close of the war served with the troops before Richmond. There have been two men from this regiment elected to command Post 10 before Comrade Leprie. They were A. C. Soley, Captain of Company I, who was at the head from January 1870 to July of the same year and Cephas N. Walker, 1887, who was a Sergeant in Company C. There is a pretty large sprinkling of the General Lincoln's old soldiers in the Post, but regimental clannishness has never made its appearance there. In fact, all distinctions of rank and branches of service have little recognition in any Post of the G. A. R.

Commanders of Post 10.

Arthur A. Goodell, since deceased, was the first commander and his service extended with that of D. M. Woodward, from April to July of 1867. For the first five years of the existence of the Post, officers elected twice a year, hence the short terms, A. A. Goodell went out as Sergeant Major in the 3d Batt. of Rifles, and came home as Adjutant, succeeding John M. Goodhue who was promoted to the U. S. Army. When the 36th Regiment was formed, he became captain of Company A. and was discharged as Lieut. Colonel and Brevet Brig. General. The local Post of the Sons of Veterans is named for him.

D. M. Woodward, also passed on to the other world, succeeded Goodell. He was Lt. Col. of the 60th Regiment an organization that served 100 days.

Colonel J. A. Titus, of the 42d and 60th came next, viz., from July, 1867, to January 1869. The colonel has long been well known in Worcester, though he has recently removed to Orange, Franklin Co. His title came from service in the militia after the War.

From January '69 to July of the same year, there were again two commanders, R. E. Blake and A. M. Parker. R. Elliott Blake was a corporal in Co. C of the 36th and is now employed in the Post Office Department in Boston.

Amos M. Parker is well known as a member of the Board of Assessors and at the beginning of the War was in the 3d Batt. of Rifles Co. A. He is and has been Fanner Howard in the Play.

Major George F. Thompson held the command from July '70 to Jan. '77. He was an officer in the 21st and after his return home held the offices of representative and senator in the General Court. He is now employed in the Custom House, Boston.

Then two more men divided the six months from January to July 1870. They were A. C. Soley, a Captain of the 54th and James E. Dennis of the 51st. Captain Soley died a few years since.

No man in the Post is better known than Comrade Dennis. He was Sergeant in Co. C and since the war has been one of the most noted salesmen in the city. Then he had a term of his own till January '71.

This ended the six months business, and E. P. Halstead, now a Claim Agent in Washington filed the year 1871. He has this statement as to service, "Staff Corps, U. S. A." whatever that may mean.

Colonel Titus was again in the lead in 1872. In 1873 and '74 James F. Meech whose war record was made in the 26th Connecticut, was commander. For a number of subsequent years he was Assistant Adjutant General of the Department. His home is now in Lynn where he is connected with the electrical business. He lately presented a picture of General Devens to the Post.

Jairus B. Lamb, better known as "Jerry" Lamb, held the office for the three years 1875-6-7. He was a member of both the 51st and of the 1st Mass. Heavy Artillery. In Drummer Boy memories, he holds an important place, being the "Fatty" Smith beyond all compare.

James K. Churchill of the 5th Regiment followed, during 1878 and '79. He too is one of the well known members of the Post and is now the Senior Vice Commander of the Department. For some years he has, been with Pinkham & Willis.

Justin B. Willard was in the 42d Regiment Co. F and in 1880, he commanded the Post. Till recently, he was one of the State Inspectors of Buildings. In the Drummer Boy he is Brigadier General.

In 1881, there were again two commanders, first William H. King who died two years ago and then Theodore M. Remington. Comrade King was 1st Sergeant in Company G of the 36th Mass. and, after the war, gained the rank of Major in the militia.

Comrade Remington was a Corporal in Company F of the 60th. He also commanded in 1882. It was during his first term that General Sherman visited Worcester and was received by the Veterans in G. A. R. Hall. Remington is now in Providence.

William L. Robinson who succeeded and who held the office in 1883-4-5, is the only representative of the Navy to rise to the chief place in Post 10. He served on the gunboat Mangham. He has been a member of the City Government and is now employed at Police Headquarters. Naturally, he is Comadore in the Play.

Cephas N. Walker was Commander in 1886. He was, as already stated, a Sergeant in Company C of the 54th. He, too, has been a member of the City Government and is recognized as a political force in Ward Eight. His business is that of a market-man.

Charles H. Benchley, who held the reins in 1887 was a Corporal in Company F, 1st Batt. Mass. Heavy Artillery. He has only recently returned from a residence in Rochester, N. Y. His business is that of a book-keeper.

The year 1888 had two commanders, Comrades Josiah N. Jones and Clare W. Putnam. The former was 1st Lieutenant and Captain in the 6th New Hampshire Infantry. As he left the city before the end of his term, he was succeeded by Comrade Putnam, a member of the 25th, Company C. He is the Superintendent of the mailing department in the Post Office.

Amos M. Parker came in again in 1889 after twenty years. He says he is going to command in 1909. Look out for him.

This brings us down to the terms of Charles H. Pinkham whose life was sketched in LIGHT one year ago. He was a Lieutenant in Company H of the 57th. During his term the Post has increased in members to a remarkable degree. He planned and carried out the reception accorded to the Kansas City Veterans. He was a delegate from this department to the last National Encampment and has recently received the appointment of Aid with the rank of Colonel on the staff of Commander-in-chief Palmer.

In this record it will be observed that previous rank has not availed in holding elective office in the Post. In no other country in the world would the file possess the ability for such positions.

John H. Delvin, W. H. S., '86 and "Tech" '90, of the Wilmington Bridge building business has gone to Chicago to assist in the drawings for one of the World's Fair Buildings.

Memorial Hospital.

Saturday, the 19th inst., Mrs. Stephen C. Earle held a sale of goods at her home in behalf of the Washburn Memorial Hospital. A hundred people attended and the amount realized for the good cause was eighty-six dollars.

W. W. Rice's Gift.

The Society of Antiquity has received no more notable gift than that which the Hon. W. W. Rice has recently made. It comprises the complete proceedings of the United States Congress from 1774 to 1888. This collection has been made after much labor and expense and is one of the very few complete sets in the country. The collection comprises the following: Nine volumes Force's American Archives, 40 volumes Annals of Congress, 27 volumes Congressional Debates, 117 volumes Congressional Globe and 98 volumes of the Congressional Record. At the same time, he sent in 20 volumes of public documents.

Mrs. W. W. Rice has given the set of Worcester Directories left by her father the late Henry W. Miller. As this set reaches back to 1845 it is particularly valuable.

Two Quaker Girls.

A Reminiscence of Philadelphia.

"I say the tale as it was told to me."

BY JACK SHEPHERD.

Early in this century in December, two young Quaker girls were walking rapidly toward the Exchange, in Philadelphia.

Their simple dress of brown merino with large capes of the same and dark, silk, shined bonnets almost hiding their fair, rosy faces, would attract attention at the present day. They evidently walked with a purpose and soon reached the office of a wealthy banker of that period. Here they stopped to whisper together before entering.

"There had better go in alone Susan, I am trembling and will never be able to speak," said one of the girls.

"No, no, Ellen, I will ask him, if they will only come in with me," said the other.

After some parleying they entered and asked the clerk if they could see Stephen Girard.

He showed them into an inner office, where Mr. Girard sat at his desk. They stood shyly by the door until he looked up at them and said, "Good evening girls, what can I do for you."

Susan stepped up to him and blushed as she said, "We have come to ask thee to contribute to our fund, we, with four other girls, have started a society to make clothes for the poor, this Winter."

"Clothes for the poor," repeated Mr. Girard, "well, that is a good object, have you a book?"

"Yes," said Ellen, growing quite courageous as matters looked so promising and drawing from under her cape a book made of letter-paper and covered with nankeen.

He took the book, looked over it very carefully and at last wrote down ten cents.

Both girls colored and exchanged disappointed looks at this small amount. They had expected at least ten dollars from this very rich and benevolent man.

But Susan took the ten pennies from him and thanked him pleasantly as they passed out.

"Girls," he called, as he watched them closely when they had almost shut the door, "That won't do much."

Susan turned back, her face as fresh and innocent as a spring flower and looking at him said, "Oh yes, if every one gave us that much we would do pretty well."

They passed out hurriedly and after crossing a pavement or two heard his voice calling them again.

They looked and saw him standing at his door and beckoning to them to return.

"Oh dear," said Ellen, "I fear he intends to take it from us."

But they returned and followed him into his office. He asked to see the book again and wrote in it in the place of ten cents a contribution of one hundred dollars.

"Is that enough, girls?" he asked as he handed them his check for that amount.

"Yes indeed!" they both answered joyously, "we are very much obliged."

"Well, let me know when you have used that and maybe I will give you ten cents more," he said facetiously.

It was a bitter, cold Winter. The Delaware was so solidly frozen that sleighs and skaters crossed it with perfect safety. Coal and wood were high and the poor needed much help.

Returning from their school one afternoon, arm in arm, light-hearted and laughing, Susan Parry and Ellen Sharpless saw a neat and delicate looking woman with a shawl pinned over her head, picking up fagots and coals along the gutters and in the street, which she put in her large checked apron. It was not a common sight in those days and filled them with pity as they thought of their own homes warm and comfortable, with cellars piled with fuel.

"Let us follow her and see where she lives," said Ellen, "she must be very poor to pick up wood in the streets."

After a while the woman turned the corner of Sixth and Arch streets going toward Market, here she disappeared in one of the alleys in the heart of the city. The girls followed and saw her enter a very small frame house in a row of similar ones. The door opened into the front room and the wind blew it more than half way open as she had left it ajar, so they could see and hear what was passing inside.

"We are dreadful cold and hungry," said a childish voice.

"These dry crusts choke me," said another. They saw the speaker, a little girl of eight years and two younger children, boys, sitting huddled together, shivering, on an old settee, with a plate of crusts of bread between them while each was trying to nibble a hard, dry bit.

"Isn't it a pity," said Susan, with tears in her eyes, "I am going in to put my shawl around those cold, little children," and without waiting for Ellen she knocked lightly, then entered and threw her warm, double blanket shawl over the three, saying, "There, wait till I come back and you shall have something good and hot to soak your hard bread in." She ran out of the door and scarcely heeded Ellen who tried to throw her own shawl around her. "What are you going to do?" said Ellen.

"I am going home to get some hot cocoa for them," she said, running most of the way, a distance of about three squares, to her home on Arch Street near Thirteenth.

Ellen followed her friend closely and they entered the house by the side alley which led into the yard and to the kitchen. Here Susan began to coax black Clara, the cook, for a pitcherful of her hot cocoa. This was Wednesday and Clara always had cocoa for supper on this night, putting it on early in the afternoon, which she said, made it "good'n rich." Her cocoa was excellent and she took great pride in her cooking.

"No, no, Honey," she said to Susan, "Whar's de use ob spillin Clara's cocoa, missus won't like it no how?" But Susan said, "Oh, Clara, you can make more," and she breathlessly told of the three cold and hungry children only a few steps off who were suffering, this bitter Winter day.

Old Clara stood with her hands on her hips, before her pot of cocoa to keep Susan away, but good-natured and laughing till she showed her teeth to the red gums, she relented soon and sweetened and poured a quart pitcher full of the delicious drink, wrapped a towel around it and gave it to Susan only stipulating that she would return quickly and buy her more milk for a fresh pot of it as she couldn't make good cocoa "no how without plenty of milk."

Ellen and Susan retraced their steps and before the startled children could explain to their mother, who had been building a fire in the room beyond, about the stranger's shawl, they were soaking their hard crusts in the steaming, fragrant cocoa and warming their fingers by placing them around their mugs, which Susan's quick eye had seen on the dresser and appropriated.

The fire was now burning in the kitchen and the children fed and warmed, crept off the settee and brought Susan's shawl to her; she took it with a smile and kept the eldest boy by her side as she listened to their mother's story. Mrs. Wagner was a German woman who had lived with her husband in America, for nine years. They had had a happy and a prosperous home until early in the Spring. Her husband was a carpenter and during March had fallen from a roof and hurt his head. After awhile he had acted very strangely and becoming insane had wandered off during the Fall months, no one knew where. Mrs. Wagner had used up all her savings and now in the midst of this severe Winter was poor and friendless.

Susan became much interested and induced Ellen to join her in forming a small society of girls of their own age, to sew for the poor and provide food and fuel for the destitute.

They found help at first from their friends and acquaintances but realized after a while the great responsibility they had taken upon themselves. "Why don't you go to Mark Cooper and Stephen Girard for funds?" said Susan's father. "I believe Mr. Cooper will give your society some flannels and warm dress stuffs and I will speak to the 'Guardians of the Poor' and they will send Mrs. Wagner some wood and coal."

This advice influenced them to seek help from Mr. Girard and others. The little German woman's home had been warm and bright since the day Susan had discovered their poverty.

The fathers of the girls who formed the little sewing circle contributed much for the needy ones, the mothers cut out underclothing and necessary garments so that the society could use to advantage the money they collected; but the sewing and chief responsibility rested upon the girls and they realized that to keep even one family housed, warmed and fed was no easy matter.

Now they had over one hundred and sixty dollars in their hands, Christmas was almost here and what a fine feast they would give these poor children.

Teddie and Emil should have some toys, Gretchen a pretty dress and a doll and Mrs. Wagner's pale face would grow glad and rosy when she saw the Christmas basket come in, laden with chicken, ham and many good things. Mrs. Wagner had plenty of work among the best Quaker families now. Knitting, ironing and house-cleaning, which kept her busy most of the afternoons, on three of which the sewing circle met in her kitchen,

LIGHT
 SUPERFLUOUS HAIR AND MOLES PERMANENTLY REMOVED BY THE ELECTRIC NEEDLE.

NO PAIN, NO SCARRING, OR OTHER INJURY, AND NO RETURN OF THE HAIR OR MOLES AFTER REMOVAL.

It is the triumph of science. Electricity is the scientific king of the day, the synonym of progress, and the solution of the wildest dreams of thinking men.

The ancient Greek philosopher declared that there was "one universal force in matter." Modern scholars know that force to be all-pervading Electricity.

What will this principle of progress not accomplish for mankind?

For the woman whose feminine beauty is marred, and whose features are rendered masculine by a growth of hair or disfigured by moles upon her face, much to the mortification of her friends, and her own personal shame, it has brought release from the bane and curse of her life.

Thanks to Electricity, there need be no more sensitive dreading or public gaze, no more keen sorrowing in secret because she is not as other women, no more bitter shrinking from the pleasures of society, no more hateful using of the razor or tweezers.

I take this means of respectfully inviting the attention of ladies thus afflicted, and their friends, to the fact that I have opened quarters at room 17, Clark building, 492 Main St., Worcester, near the Boston Store, where I am prepared with every modern convenience and comfort to do work in this line, assisted by experienced lady operators, on the most reasonable terms possible.

DO NOT FAIL TO READ THE POSITIVE GUARANTEE OF SATISFACTION offered below.

Do not fail to call upon me. A visit to my rooms will cost you nothing, and may prove a life-long blessing.

The success of this method of removing superfluous hair and moles permanently from any part of the body is so universally acknowledged by men of science, that it is only necessary for you to consult your family physician, if he is a well-read man, and up to the times in his profession, and he will unhesitatingly tell you not only that it is beyond all question a success, but also that it is positively the only method known for surely and permanently destroying these obnoxious growths.

But, better still, your own intelligence will tell you that all argument on the subject must close when I say that if you are at all doubtful, you will not be required to place a single dollar in my hands until the work is completed, and a sufficient length of time has elapsed to satisfactorily settle the question of permanency. In other words, it will not be necessary for you to pay for the work until you are perfectly satisfied with it.

The method will be carefully, fully and convincingly explained to all who will call at my office.

I have scores of testimonials, but as I never give publicity to the names of my patrons, I do not publish these testimonials here, but have adopted the better plan of placing those who are interested in direct correspondence with those for whom I have done such work, many of whom are easily accessible, personally, to people living in Worcester and vicinity.

I am just completing work for one of my patrons, from whose face and neck I will have removed, when the work is finished, no less than six teen thousand hairs. This lady is so grateful for the results accomplished in the permanent removal of this enormous growth of hair, which for years has been the bane of her life, that she has voluntarily consented to see and talk with any one interested, and afflicted as she has been. I have photographs of this lady, showing her as she was, and you can see her as she is. Notwithstanding the immense amount of work accomplished, not a scar can be seen upon her face, which presents precisely the natural appearance of one upon whose face no hair had ever grown. What has been accomplished for her and others, may surely be accomplished for you.

For ladies living out of town, pains will be taken to secure suitable board and lodging, at reasonable rates, when required and requested.

All correspondence carefully and promptly answered.

The utmost privacy strictly maintained. Office hours, 9 a. m. to 4 p. m. daily.

Amateur Sport.

Tommie Conneff, the well known distance runner, of the Manhattan Athletic Club, announced last week his intention of retiring from the amateur ranks and becoming a professional. He sailed Saturday for Ireland, his native land, where he will begin his professional career.

Foot ball is beset by temptations which it befores all its well wishers to beware of, and no note of warning has been more opportunely raised than that by Walter Camp, in Outing for December, anent its two most dangerous problems—"The Spectator and the Professional."

It is an indication of the hold which rowing is obtaining in this country to find the critics even now casting up the probabilities of next Summer's events, according to the able critic of Outing. At Harvard nearly all of this year's crew will be available for next year. Some weak places may be strengthened by the infusion of new bone and sinew; but when work commences in the Winter the captain will have a lot of experienced oarsmen to coach, a most encouraging state of affairs. On the whole, although it is early to form any correct idea of the crew, rowing prospects look bright at Harvard, and there should be keen competition for the few places at all likely to be vacant.

Connecticut's Toe.

Many readers have wondered, no doubt, why the otherwise symmetrical boundary of the very square-cut State of Connecticut, reputed to be inhabited by a peculiarly rectilinear sort of folk, should have acquired that curious jutting knob or handle at its southwestern corner. This is the way it happened, and the explanation is pertinent: Toward the end of the seventeenth century the disputes as to territorial limits between New York and the New Haven colony were settled by an agreement to make a boundary twenty miles east of the Hudson River and parallel with it. Accordingly, a line was projected inland from the mouth of Bryan River, where now Port Chester stands, but so bad was their surveying, or their geography, or both, that this line, instead of paralleling the Hudson, would cross that river at west Point. When this was discovered a new line was determined upon to start just west of Stamford and Port Chester, who had fondly thought themselves safely in the land of steady habits, and now were suddenly to be made citizens of ungodly New York. At this woeful discovery such a clamor went up as compelled attention; and Connecticut, to save her loving but distant children, ceded to New York, in exchange for the townships on the Sound which now appear in the extension on the map, a strip of land two and a half miles wide along the whole Western edge of the State. This strip became popularly known as the Oblong; and when, in 1733, the cession had been accomplished, land there became very desirable because a perfectly clear title could be had from New York, whereas all the adjacent region was held by grantees whose titles were often doubtful and even yet give rise to litigation.

where everything was clean and bright. Gretchen, neatly dressed, was ready to take their bonnets and fold their shawls and then sit down and sew with them or run errands.

Emil and Teddy would each get very close to Susan and Ellen, Emil with his father's violin, on which he played a few tunes very prettily, and Teddy who was of an inquiring mind to ply them with endless questions.

"Oh, I do wish Christmas would come this minute," he said one afternoon in December.

"How many minutes till Christmas, Susan?" he asked, pulling her dress to get her attention, for she was busy counting the buttons for a night-dress and Ellen answered, "Hush, Teddie, there is too inquisitive."

"What is 'quisitive?'" said Teddy, undaunted by Ellen's reproof.

"There!" said Ellen, impatiently, "as fast as we answer one thee asks another; inquisitive means, asking a million questions in one afternoon."

"What is a million, Susan?" said Teddie turning to the good-natured girl who had grown very fond of the bright rusty boy of five years.

"How is he to learn if there does not answer him, Ellen?" she said, and taking him on her lap she began to count on his fingers, making him repeat after her the numbers up to ten.

Then putting him on his little stool beside her she said, "Now, if thee counts ten on thy fingers all the time we sew here this afternoon, thee will count part of a million."

So Teddy set to work and began in low tones his task, asking Susan no more questions for some time.

The Creedless Chimes.

I heard the bells across the snow,
Now rising loud, now falling low;
The air was keen with breath of time,
And seemed to tinkle with the chime
That told the merry Christmas time,
Now swelling loud, now hushed and low,
Where clear blue sky and white earth met,
The hills, in massive silhouette,
Heaved up their undulating line:
Their lasses girt by somber pine,
Cold in the clear and bright sunshine,
With myriad flashing jewels set.
The stream beneath the ice complained,
As some one in a ducegone chanted;
The smoke, that from the chimneys cur'd,
Caught by the wi' d and the southward whirled,
Cast shadows on the sheeted world,
Save for its phantoms all unstained.

The lonely elm, a seamy stark,
Stood like a pillar slim and dark,
And cut the background hill in twain,
With one black line, while on the plain,
The alders looked a spearsman train,
Close phalanx'd in a barren park.
I mused upon these days long past,
When earls in warded castles fast
With stalwart knights and stately dames,
Watched, by the Yule logs leaping flames,
Their merry vailla's' boisterous games,
When common faith had overcast

The fearless stream of blazoned birth
As with a bridge; and lightsome mirth
Supremely reigned; the archer drank
With noble, and dignified and stately dame,
While sang alike, of every rank,
"Good will to men and peace on earth."

More than John Bull, the priest of Kent,
More than Wat Tyler's dissonant,
Or Jarquerie that startled France,
When peasant's cudgel parried lance,
And Jacques Bonhomme led the dance,
Christmas to human freedom meant.

They fell a common brotherhood,
Although they little understood,
That what they knew, a friendly glow
Binding the highborn to the low,
In years to come would overthrow
Old systems, building new and good.
And if in those rude lawless times,
The heart's response to Christmas chimes,
Was one of thankfulness and cheer,
Why let us then be merry here,
In this the most propitious year,
That ever promised better times.

For every year Time shall unroll,
From out the vastness of his scroll,
Is better than the one unrolled.
For Centuries, like wine, I hold
Are better as they grow more old
In thoughts that lift the human soul.
Old wrongs die out; there is no thing
Creed, race or city, slave or king
But has the germ of both of these,
The good, the bad, and God decrees
The right shall live, the wrong shall cease,
Beyond mankind's remembering.

Rocking and reeling,
Brazens peeling,
Broadcast the seed of thy glad mission sow,
Till with thy cheering,
Doubts disappearing,
Leave the soul clean as immaculate snow.

Sound o'er death-stricken
Places and quicken
Faith in the fetter and faith in the race,
O Thou Fatheral,
Make us fraternal,
Shatter the structures that darken Thy face.

Phantoms and terrors,
Ghosts of old errors,
Exorcise thou to the place whence they came,
Wrongs apostolical,
Creeds diabolical,
Daughters of darkness and sisters of shame!

Scourge from thine altar,
High ones who palter,
Grinding the poor under heels iron shod,
Who in strong places,
Lift their hard faces,
Smite them O Lord! with thy levelling rod.

Misery-scorers,
Priestly suborners,
Selling thy garment for indolent ease,
Hearing none crying
"Help, we are dying!"
Let not prosperity tarry with these.

Where man's autonomy,
In King's economy,
Ho'd's not a place by the sanction of birth,
Let them not perish,
Brave hearts that cherish,
Freedom, in pits burrowed deep in the earth.

Shake with throes dire,
Purge with thy fire,
Lands where oppression stalks girt with a sword;
Let revolutions,
Red evolutions,
Teach them man's right Thou sustainer, O Lord!

Grant every nation
Emancipation,
Freedom of ballot, of speech and of press.
Call back the banished,
Feed thou the famished,
Throw down old systems and black crimes redress.

O Thou Supernal!
O Thou Eternal!
Lift we our voices as accents of one
This all we pray thee,
Still thy will may be
Here upon earth as in high heaven done.

A Soldier's Bible.

While Miss Winter of Emmittsburg was overlooking her childhood's treasures, she came across an old Testament which she found on the site of a soldier's camp near there during the war, after the soldiers had left for the field of Gettysburg. On examining the book her eyes fell on the name, "Samuel Wolcott, Griffin's Mills, Erie County, N. Y.," and Miss Winter decided to write to the address, thinking the owner would like to recover the book. In a few days she received a reply from Mrs. Weaden of Clifton, N. J., stating that she was a sister of the soldier and the only living member of a large family. She said her brother had returned home from the army in 1863, and died in 1864, and Miss Winter's letter had been forwarded to her as his nearest of kin. Mrs. Weaden seemed much pleased at the idea of recovering this long-lost memento of her dead brother, and Miss Winter sent the Testament to her.—Baltimore Sun.

Not long ago, two young girls were traveling "out West" (says a writer in the New York World). As the train stopped at a station, two ladies entered and took seats directly in front of them. Just as they were seated, a stout lady came forward, greeted them effusively, and the trio kept up a lively conversation until the train started. Then one of them said: "Sit down here, near us," and, in a little lower tone, "Tell those girls to sit somewhere else." So the stout one turned round and said, in the most freezing of tones: "I wish to converse with my friends, and would like that seat. I am Mrs. President R—, of this road." The girls stared at her an instant, and then one of them drawled: "Pleased to meet you, I'm sure. I suppose you know I am Mrs. President Harrison, of Washington," and the other girl, settling herself comfortably in her seat, said: "And I am Mrs. Queen Victoria." There was an audible smile from the other passengers, and the stout lady went to her own seat in the rear.

Sheridan's Wit.

Perhaps the wittiest of Sheridan's retorts was delivered, as it seemed, off hand in the House of Commons. He said that Dundas resorted to his memory for his jokes and to his imagination for his facts. Unfortunately for the extempore reputation of this jest, it is found set down in Sheridan's note book years before. He jots down the happy thought, "He employs his fancy for his narrative and keeps his recollection for his wit." Later on he expands this into, "When he makes his jokes you applaud the accuracy of his memory, and 'tis only when he states his facts that you admire the flights of his imagination." After this he uses the idea to the confusion of Michael Kelly, a composer of music who had been a wine merchant. "You will now impart your music and compose your wine." Finally he lets it off with a bang to the House of Commons.

A Born Lawyer.

A lawyer advertised for a clerk. The next morning his office was crowded with applicants—all bright, many suitable. He bade them wait until all should arrive, and then ranged them in a row and said he would tell them a story, note their comments, and judge from that whom he would choose.

"A certain farmer," began the lawyer, "was troubled with a red squirrel that got in through a hole in his barn and stole his seed corn. He resolved to kill the squirrel at the first opportunity. Seeing him go in at the hole one noon, he took his shot gun and fired away; the first shot set the barn on fire."

"Did the barn burn?" said one of the boys.
The lawyer without answer continued: "and seeing the barn on fire, the farmer seized a pail of water and ran to put it out."

"Did he put it out?" said another.
"As he passed inside the door shut to and the barn was soon in flames. When the hired girl rushed out with more water—"

"Did they all burn up?" said another boy.
The lawyer went on without answer: "Then the old lady came out, and all was noise and confusion, and everybody was trying to put out the fire."

"Did any one burn up?" said another.
The lawyer said: "There that will do; you have all shown great interest in the story." But observing one little bright-eyed fellow in deep silence, he said: "Now, my little man, what have you to say?"

The little fellow blushed, grew uneasy, and stammered out:

"I want to know what became of that squirrel; that's what I want to know."

"You'll do," said the lawyer; "you are my man; you have not been switched off by a confusion and a barn burning, and the hired girls and water pails. You have kept your eye on the squirrel."—Tact in Court.

"Were I not Alexander, I would be Diogenes."

"Free Trade is not a principle, it is an expedient."—Disraeli.

The "Vet's" Last Prayer.

[Dedicated to my pupil Lulu Isaacs.]
 Raise my head a bit, old comrade,
 Let me hear the bugle's call,
 Let me see the sun's rays casting
 Golden shadows on the wall.
 Let me see the clouds go flitting
 Swift across the evening sky.
 Hark! What means 'hat glorious music
 Floating far away on high.
 Am I dreaming, is this real,
 Can you see the picture too!
 All my comrades of the past time,
 All who wore the "army blue,"
 None are wounded, none are sightless,
 Not an empty sleeve in view.
 God be praised for now the soldier,
 In that land has his just due.
 Grasp my hand "old comrade," grasp it,
 I am drifting out to sea,
 And the scenes of army hardship,
 Seem to hover close to me.
 Once again, I hear the blunder,
 Of our cannon in the sky,
 Charge boys! Rally round the colors,
 One more charge before I die.
 Then his breath came short and gasping,
 And we thought his soul had fled,
 But a ray of sunshine golden
 Wove a halo 'round his head,
 And again he rallied feebly,
 There is one more boon I crave,
 Let those Daughters of our Comrade,
 Lay bright flowers on my grave.
 Bid the noble Sons of Veterans,
 "Fire a volley," at my side,
 Please let "Taps" be sounded clearly,
 Then what else you do beside,
 Don't forget my last prayer, comrade,
 Ere my bark drifts out to sea,
 Let those Daughters of our Comrades
 Lay bright flowers over me.
 —Fred. L. Hildreth.

He Wanted Potatoes.

A good story is told of M. Taine. Max Müller, it is a id, went to the dining-room of a hotel in Oxford, and there saw Taine sitting with a dish of roast beef and vast quantities of buttered toast. The learned German was surprised at the combination, and at the large quantities of the toast. "Is that a French dish?" he asked. "No," said Taine; "but they keep on bringing it to me, in spite of all I can say to the contrary." "What did you ask for?" observed his friend. "Why," replied Taine, "I keep telling them to bring potatoes, and each time they bring me a fresh dish of toast. M. Taine's pronunciation of "potatoes" was so much like "buttered toast" that the astonished waiter could not be blamed.

Mistletoe and Holly for Christmas.

The man, woman or child who wishes to use mistletoe or holly in their Christmas observance should call and examine the magnificent array at the store of H. B. Watts & Son, 545 Main Street, Franklin Square. This firm commenced business originally in Leicester some eight years ago, and push and enterprise combined with a practical knowledge of the art of floriculture, has compelled the opening of a branch store in this city to enable them to comply with the constantly increasing demand for their flowers. A specialty is made of furnishing floral designs of the most artistic description. Cut flowers formed into bouquets of the latest fashionable style can be obtained at short notice. John W. Cahill.

In rapid succession, the G. A. R. men are passing away. John W. Cahill of Post 10 died at 55 Franklin Street, Thursday the 17th.
He was a native of Ireland and had served in the Crimean and Indian wars. In this country, he was a member of the 2d Massachusetts Cavalry. He was a machinist by trade. He was buried Saturday from St. John's Church.

Good to Eat.

"Now, now the mirth comes,
With the cake fall of plums."

—Herrick.

Apple Gelatine.

Pare, core, and quarter six "Maidenblush" apples; put them in a granite kettle; add one pint of water; stew slowly until the apples are perfectly tender; add one pound of sugar and boil until the syrup forms a jelly when tried in a saucer; add a teaspoonful of vanilla, and turn the apples into a fancy pudding mold.
Stand aside until cold and firm. Serve with thick cream.—Table Talk.

Date Cake.

Make a light layer cake; bake in four sheets. When cool pile up with the following mixture: One cupful of sugar, three tablespoonfuls of water. Boil until it strings, and pour over the beaten whites of two eggs. Stir in well together, flavor with vanilla and mix with one cupful of stoned dates, chopped fine.
The top may be of plain frosting, ornamented with large dates.

Date Creams.

One cupful of molasses, one egg, one cupful of butter or lard, one cupful of hot water in which a spoonful of soda has been dissolved, one spoonful of mixed spices, and one large cupful of dates, chopped fine. Cut in squares like frosted creams, bake in a moderate oven, and frost with boiled frosting.

For a tea dish when fruit is scarce, take one quart of rich milk, one cupful of sugar, a small piece of butter, and a teaspoonful of almond flavoring. When boiling, thicken with corn-starch and two cupfuls of stoned dates.
Set on ice until served. Ice the top, and ornament with dates.

Figs may be used in every case where dates are mentioned, and even seeded raisins are not objectionable.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

A simple breakfast dish is a "quaking omelet." It calls for four eggs, half a cup of milk, a rounded tablespoonful of flour, and a teaspoonful of salt. Beat together the yolks of the eggs, the flour and the salt. Add them to the milk. Then stir in the whites of the eggs, beaten to a stiff froth. Add the salt to the yolk of the eggs before the milk is put in.
Put a tablespoonful of butter in a hot French frying-pan, and turn the mixture in. In about one minute put the frying-pan in the oven, and let it remain six minutes. At the end of this time have a hot platter ready, and a cup of cream sauce, well seasoned. Turn the omelet on the platter, but do not attempt to fold it. Pour the cream sauce around it.
Serve it at once, as it will fall if it is left to stand.

Boiled Leg of Lamb.

Trim off all the loose fat, cut off the shank, wash and wipe it dry; dredge it with flour and tie it in a clean cloth; put it in boiling water enough to cover it. The water should be salted in the proportion of two teaspoon-fuls of salt to a quart of water. Let it boil from two to three hours according to its size.
Serve it with drawn butter or rich parsley sauce, whichever may be preferred, and vegetables of any kind which may be in season.

John B. Lepire.

The latest elected Commander of George H. Ward Post 10, G. A. R., is a native of Canada. His ancestry, as his name clearly indicates, is French, but it was quite one hundred and fifty years ago that the first Lepire, meaning the Worse, left La Belle France to find in the new and western world something better in deed if not in name. Commander-Elect Lepire, was born in St. Aimé, on the Yamaska river in Richelieu County. There is considerable in those names to remind the reader of France and its history. The nearest considerable place is Sorel, while Montreal is not so very remote.

The family came to the States, in 1853, when John Baptiste Lepire, our comrade, was thirteen years old. It was the first of July and the Lepires got their introduction to the United States during an old fashioned glorious Fourth of July, a good time to give the new comers a taste of genuine American independence. In Canada, the elder Lepire was a farmer, but in Massachusetts he located in Farnumville, and worked in a factory. In his northern home our Commander had had the advantages of the French schools, but in Massachusetts, he had only such instruction as he could gain from evening schools.

There was a family of twelve children equally divided as to sex, but of all these, beside himself, only two sisters live in this vicinity, and they are in North Grafton. One sister resides in Paterson, N. J. The mother, who had made her home with her son, in this city, died Nov. 23d, full of years. The father, 86 years old, since his wife's death, has gone to North Grafton to live with a daughter, unwilling to see daily the scenes so long associated with his companion along life's journey.

From the factory young Lepire went to work in a boot shop and it was when thus employed in Shirley Village that he enlisted July 17, making one of the quota from that Middlesex town. He went into the 34th Regiment, Company E, the one commanded by Captain William B. Bacon, a son of the late Peter C. Bacon. Captain Bacon was slain at New Market, May 16, 1864. There were not many Worcester men in this company but Arthur M. Stone, who enlisted from Spencer, was a fellow member. Comrade Lepire was mustered July 31, 1862, and went with his regiment to Washington, participating in all the vicissitudes of camp life till late in the Fall of that year. He was seriously injured while in the city of Alexandria, and was discharged for disability while the regiment was at Fort Lyon. It was no fault of his, rather his misfortune, that he did not help make up the grand record that the Thirty-Fourth has set down in its favor.

Coming back to Worcester, when he was able to go to work, he sought employment on the railroad and in some way, has been connected with that service ever since. For the first thirteen years he was with the Boston & Albany, and since then has been with the Worcester & Nashua and Boston & Maine. For several years he has been the Canadian Passenger Agent for New England on the Boston & Maine railroad. His duties keep him pretty actively engaged and much of the time away from home.

He became an American citizen in 1873 and, just ten years before or in 1863 he was married to Miss Mary Snow of Rhode Island. They have six children living, John W., Lizzie, Celia C., Joseph D., Sarah and Eddie. Joseph D. is Junior Vice Commander elect of the Sons of Veterans while Lizzie and Celia belong to the Daughters of Veterans. The latter is Treasurer of Clara Barton Tent. The home of Comrade Lepire is at No. 10 Normal Street.

His Grand Army life began in 1873, April, and very likely no member of the Post has attended more meetings than he. There has been no duty that he could perform that he has not been ready to undertake. In 1887, he was made Officer of the Guard; in '88, Officer of the Day; in '89, Junior Vice Commander; in '90 and '91, Senior Vice Commander and December 3d he was elected Commander. He has thus served in all capacities save one, and early in January, he will be installed to act as the head of the second largest post in New England. His fellow veterans, recognizing his faithful services during all these years, have placed him in command and under his lead will, next September, march again through the streets of Washington, at the National Encampment.

The annual banquet of the Summer club alumni will be held next Monday evening at the Hay State House. It is expected that about forty or fifty will be present, an unusually large number of the early members having signified their intention of being present. Frank B. Hall was toastmaster, but the will be no formal toasts. Hoar H. Hill, the president of the club, will respond for the present members.

Board of Trade.

As Major E. T. Raymond has signified his acceptance of the position of secretary of this newly organized body, it would seem that he does not expect any favors from the governor and council.

Forefather's Day.

The Congregational club fittingly remembered this auspicious day, last Monday evening, at Association Hall. It was ladies night and the attendance was very large. Rev. I. J. Lansing was elected president for the ensuing year. The other officers will be elected at the next meeting. The following were elected to membership: H. Ward Bates, H. H. Merriam, John Hewitt, C. S. Merrick, H. L. Gale, Rev. Geo. P. Eastman. The Rev. Ebenezer Cutler, D. D., was made an honorary member. Dr. Archibald McCullagh was the speaker of the evening.

BARNARD, SUMNER & Co.Bethlehem in Judea.

BY JOHN C. CRANE.

O Bethlehem! What glory came
To give to thee a deathless name,
For to the manger on thy hill,
Came one, a Prince, who liveth still,
Humbly he came and humbly went
His weary way, on mission bent,
That mission was mankind to save
And heeded not death and the grave.

Fair Bethlehem! On thee the light,
Rested on that far-off night,
And shepherds on the lower plain
Heard the angel's glad refrain,
Earth hath no dearer spot than where
Was born this King Divinely fair,
Who lived and suffered, died and rose,
Triumphant over every foe.

Mr. H. W. Badger of Dix Street, foreman in the Washburn Machine Shop, has had a severe attack of the prevailing complaint. His son, John, is still suffering from the same ailment.

Miss Lottie Maynard, who is teaching at Irvington on the Hudson, is spending the Holidays vacation at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Maynard.

George Eaton and Charles Chambers of the Polytechnic, class of '94, boarding at No. 3 Dix Street, gave a party to some classmates Tuesday evening. There were twelve in all and they had a good time till the hour to go home came around. Then they waked the whole neighborhood with the "Tech" cry. Still, the folks always feel forgiving towards the "Techs."

When a Man's Lot is Very Hard.

It's Just Before Christmas When He is the Bachelor Uncle of Thirty-seven Nephews and Nieces.

"It's a pretty hard season of the year, isn't it?" he said, leaning on his umbrella, and smiling wearily.

"What is it—rheumatism?"

"No; worse than that."

"Gout?"

"Wish that was all."

"Threatened with pneumonia?"

"No; it's Christmas."

"Oh, I see," said the other, sympathetically. "Yes, it's just this way. I'm a bachelor, and have five brothers and four sisters. I used to think it was the finest thing in the world to be the most popular brother and uncle in the world."

"Yes."

"Well, it isn't—not at Christmas time. You see, they all got married, one after the other. When I had a half dozen nephews and nieces, I could go out and hunt around for a couple of days, and provide for them. Then for a month I was literally crushed to earth with youthful affection. I liked it then."

"But now," he said, with a grim smile, "it isn't the same."

"More nephews and nieces, eh?"

"More!" he groaned. "Why, man, I've got thirty-seven right in this city, and they're climbing up every year. I'm like Solomon and his wives, only he was luckier than I, because he wasn't bothered with any Christmas. I've done nothing but walk the streets and march through stores and shops for three weeks. I wake up in the night with a start, and remember that I forgot my third brother's fifth boy. When I meet one of my relatives, I turn pale and shiver. I have cold sweats at night. I've lost my appetite. I'm drinking like a fish to keep my nerves steady. I've had three attacks of vertigo and two of heart failure, and yet I've got seventeen more presents to get. My room looks like a warehouse, and I've engaged an extra one in which to store the presents yet to get. I'll bet you even money I forgot my youngest sister's twins, or my second sister's three-year-old girl. I'll bet you even money that I've made a miscout somewhere, and that I'll send five presents to Will's house, when he's only got four children, or three presents to Nell's house, when she is the mother of nine. I'll bet you I'll buy boxing-gloves for some of the girls, and bon-bon boxes for John's twelve-year-old boy, who wants to be a pirate. I'll bet you I'm a raving maniac before the week's out."

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" asked his friend encouragingly.

"Do? I'm going to plunge. I'm going to buy everything I see. I'm going to bankrupt myself. I'm going to own a Christmas bazaar. Then I'm going to get brain fever and send for 'Jack.' He's my youngest brother. 'Jack,' I'll say, 'I'm losing my mind over Wall Street speculations. I'm possessed with the idea that I haven't a relative in the world, and I know that can't be true. For heaven's sake take these infernal torments—I mean these little presents—and distribute them to the best of your judgement. Then cremate me, Jack. I guess that's my only chance.'"

"I'll tell you what I'm going to do," he said, shutting his teeth. "If I live out this experience I'm going to get married. I'll marry the first woman who'll have me. There never was a woman yet who did not like to buy Christmas presents. By George! I'd marry one today if it wasn't too late to save me this year. Do you know any woman—a first-rate shopper—who'd like to get married this afternoon?" he cried, wildly.

"I'm afraid they're all to busy buying Christmas presents," said the sympathetic friend.

"Well good-by, then. I've got to run up to Tiffany's. Say, do you know any place where I can get something appropriate for a young girl of sixteen? She's young looking but old in her manner. Nothing childish will do."

"I'm afraid I can't help you."

"Can you make any suggestion about a boy ten years old, who has run away from home three times, and been nearly drowned twice? I can't give him anything that shoots. He'd kill the whole family and blow his own head off."

"I'm sorry, but—"

"How are you on twins?" cried the uncle, eagerly; three years old, one fat and one thin, one dark and one fair, both terrors. Can you do anything for me in the twin line?"

"The twins floor me, too."

"Now, there is Isabella, twelve years old, dark hair and eyes, very motherly and quiet, affectionate and sweet tempered. Maybe you could—"

"Afraid I can't."

"Well, there's my nephew, U. S. Grant, aged nine—"

"I'm awfully sorry."

"Charles Augustus Cusar, aged eleven—"

"No."

"Caroline Virginia, fifteen; pretty, blue eyes and—"

"I'm no good at it old man."

"Harriet Lucille—"

"No, no, no."

"Jane Gray Clothide—"

"For heaven's sake, old man, spare me!"

"Why, man," cried the uncle, "I haven't made a start in 'em, and you are crying for mercy. You can't make a half dozen suggestions. What do you think of me? Thirty-seven of 'em; but I've already taken care of twenty, and you can't make one suggestion. I've got to find seventeen yet. Good-by," he shouted, running frantically for a surface car. "I guess I can fix Frederick William and Augusta Victoria this afternoon. Then I'll hunt up something for Marie Louise and—"

But the car was gone, carrying deeper into his misery the distracted uncle of thirty-seven nephews and nieces.—N. Y. Tribune.

Miss Mary L. Bridgman, of the High School was informed Tuesday of the sudden death of her mother at the family home in South Amherst, the night before. Her illness had not been announced. She was the mother, also, of Mrs. Charles M. Lamson, formerly of the Salem Street Church, Worcester.

One of the pleasantest social events of last week was a reception given at the Oread by Mr. and Mrs. Manton Van Shaack, the managers of this reorganized school for young ladies. The rooms were beautifully decorated for the occasion with flowers, palms and ferns. A large number of the school attended.

The third annual social of the Crescent Tennis Club was held last week Friday evening in Horticultural Hall. There was a large attendance and the dance order of twenty numbers was thoroughly enjoyed. The names of the officers of the evening were published in LIGHT two weeks ago.

Principal Wm. H. Bartlett is out again, having rallied quickly from his last attack of illness.

At the rooms of the School of English Speech Tuesday afternoon an entertainment was given by the youngest pupils to a company of children from the Orphan's Home. The program included readings, music and fancy dancing. The pupils taking part were Susie Sargent, Rosie Woodcock, Ethel Estie, Eva Townsend, Mamie Parsons, Effie Adams, Alice Casey, Zetta Parker, Eva Mayo, Ralph Rebboli, May Mellor, Arline Hall. At the close of the entertainment each of the thirteen orphans was given a Christmas present.

Edgar E. Putnam.

The death of this gentleman, Monday, removes from our city a valuable citizen. Sutton born, he was in the grocery business at 600 Main Street. His age was 39 years, 9 months and 15 days. He was a member of Piedmont Church. His funeral was held at his late residence, Thursday at 2 p.m.

The Week.

CITY.

- Dec. 11.—Dr. Thomas H. Gage elected president of the Washburn Memorial Hospital.
- Frank Willard suffers from broken arm in W. H. Warren's machine shop.
- 12.—City politics at white heat. What would happen if we should have nothing of the kind for a year?
- Le Courrier de Worcester appears under a new proprietorship. Victor Belanger has sold to Benjamin Linthier of Lowell.
- 13.—Large and enthusiastic meeting in behalf of No License in Mechanics Hall. Addresses by Rev. Dr.'s Gunnison and Knowles and Rev. Fr. Sully of Cambridge.
- Almost every pulpit in Worcester resounds with attack on the Kum power.
- 14.—Methodist ministers hold regular monthly meeting in Grace Church.
- Committee on municipal affairs of Board of Trade holds first regular meeting.
- The city flooded with political circulars.
- 15.—Worcester elections. Francis A. Harrington re-elected Mayor. Aldermen, E. L. Parker, Francis Plunkett, George W. Coombs, Charles H. Pinkham. Five Republican Wards elect Republican Councilmen and three Democratic Wards elect Democrats. In other words, the Dutch have taken Holland. In the contests for the school committee, the Marble candidate, Garver, wins in Ward One and the opposition to Marble in Wards Seven and Eight. More than 400 majority against License.
- 16.—Worcester Policemen hold the most successful ball in their history. More than 2,000 people crowd Mechanics Hall but even that number did not represent all the tickets sold.
- Many cases of scarlet fever and La Grippe.
- Sanford B. King dies at 14 Coral Street, a veteran of the 4th Mass. Heavy Artillery.
- Edwin Morse dies at 57 Chatham Street, 76 years.
- Jehiel Todd dies at 105 Austin Street, 73 years.
- 17.—Cricket Club of South Worcester entertains at the Bay State House.
- Jonathan E. Minott dies at 18 Leicester Street, 67 years.
- 18.—Reunion of the 51st Regiment at G. A. R. Hall.
- Company C of the 51st has reunion at the Lincoln House.
- Funerals of Deacon Jehiel Todd from 105 Austin Street, Edwin Morse, 57 Chatham, and Sanford B. King at 14 Coral Street.
- 19.—Republican members of next Common Council hold a caucus.
- Exhibition of paintings opens in Library Building.
- John Rice, three years old, burned to death on Millstone Hill.
- Meeting of Dartmouth Alumni in Horticultural Hall.
- 20.—Some clergymen preach on Christmas, other size up the No License vote.
- August Ekstrom plunges off the Normal School cliff, and is killed. Rum did it.
- 21.—City Government meets and re-elects chief engineer, E. L. Vaughn of the Fire Department, Alzirus Brown and Denis C. Leonard, Overseers of the Poor and Wm. H. McClure, city electrician. Dr. Charles A. Peabody and Alderman George C. Whitney are elected directors of the Public Library. Postmaster Greene receives tracings of the interior of the proposed new Post Office.

- 22.—The house of Mrs. Alex. H. Dean, 14 Cedar Street, invaded by a burglar. He was frightened away before getting all he had arranged for.
- Father Conaty at the Sacred Heart Church has a tussle with a thief who is finally captured.
- 23.—Sara Bernhardt appears at the Worcester Theater in La Tosca.
- Rain and sloop. The day much like a North Carolina winter day.
- John A. Thayer, Esq., confirmed as clerk at the Central District Court.
- At the Boys' Club 625 lands made happy by gifts.

COUNTY.

- 10.—County Commissioners visit the new Truant School at Oakdale and dine with Superintendent Johnson.
- 11.—Secretary W. S. Parks, of the Clinton Y. M. C. A., resigns.
- 12.—Hon. Harris C. Hartwell of Fitchburg buried, impressive ceremonies.
- A fire in Webster partially destroys the office of the Slater Cotton Works.
- 13.—Charles A. Forbush of Westminster takes a nine months vacation in the old world.
- 14.—John R. Conant of Gardner dies, typhoid pneumonia, 63 years.
- 15.—Expelled Russian Jews are finding homes in Oakdale.
- 16.—And now Millbury citizens are not so anxious for license as they were one year ago. They don't fancy Worcester's sewage.
- 17.—New church, the Conant Memorial, dedicated in Dudley. It costs above $35,000 and is the gift of Hezekiah Conant of Pawtucket, R. I.
- 18.—Moses Woodward dies suddenly in Princeton, 82 years.
- 17.—Fitchburg is getting enthusiastic over a new Athletic club.

Friday Populars.

Last week Friday evening Prof. J. B. De Motte of De Pauw University gave an intensely interesting lecture on "Electricity," the third entertainment in this truly popular course. He did not as was expected talk upon the applications of electricity now in use, but he gave a glimpse across the borderland of the science into the future. He has just returned from several years' study in some of the best German laboratories and he told of the advance which is in progress towards the discovery of the time nature of electricity. The tendency of the results of the experiments so far is towards proving that electricity is the manifestation of energy in wave motions, occupying in the scale of velocity of vibrations a position between heat and light. He prophesied that within a few years, possibly before two years have passed, we could light our rooms with the expenditure of only about one-fiftieth of the energy now required, because we shall be able to dispense with the steam engine which utilizes but a small portion of the energy given out by the burning of the coal.

The next entertainment in the course will be a concert by the Whitney Mockridge Concert Company which includes Whitney Mockridge, tenor; Mrs. Mayo Rhodes, soprano; Belle Warner Botsford, violin virtuoso; Arthur Heresford, the English basso, and Miss Hattie Mockridge, pianist and accompanist. The date is January 1st.

The Drummer Boy.

There must be something in the eternal fitness of things that makes this play so successful in this city. Of course, it has elements of success that would make it go anywhere but in Worcester it goes beyond precedent. From its first presentation, in January 1871, there have been ten seasons, this of 1891 making the eleventh. A generation of players has grown with it. If it continues, the drama will become to Worcester, what the Passion Play has long been to Oberammergau. In the cast, this year, there are some names that were found in the list twenty years since. For instance, C. W. Wilson, who was so instrumental in first getting the play before the Post, is as then put down for Farmer Elliott. James E. Dennis is once more Major General while A. M. Parker, then Major General, is Farmer Howard as he has been for several seasons. If ever "Jerry" Lamb has failed to be "Fattie" Smith it was when he was out of the city. This year he is on hand as portly as ever. George H. Conklin, then Frank Rutledge is now chief of staff.

The play has turned into the post's charity fund more than $14,000. The good that this sum has done, only God and the angels know.

"Why don't you try a new play?" This question is frequently heard and one answer is that no other drama has begun to charm the people with this. The Post has tried other plays and on some has lost, while on the nominally successful ones the receipts were very meager. But why not see the Drummer Boy once a year? Is there a better school for patriotism? Of course some of our non-resistant friends would not have a military play at all; but the spear-pruning hook metamorphosis will not come in our day and the best way to insure peace is to be ready for war. The History of the Rebellion will have additional zest for any child who witnesses the Drummer Boy.

Do those who clamor for a new drama ever think that "Joe" Jefferson really plays only one character, that of Rip Van Winkle and who has ever wearied of it. How many would not esteem it a favor to be able to look at Booth as Hamlet each year and how many would care if he never played another part? While many people have seen the Drummer Boy many times, there are still those who never saw it and each season brings along a generation of little folks who were too small to go during the last.

There is no good reason why the play should not have an annual success for years to come.

The following is the cast for 1891:

Farmer Howard	A. M. Parker
Mart Howard	Jas. A. Gettings
Harry Howard	H. C. Robinson
Johnnie Howard	Master L. E. Barnes
Farmer Elliott	C. W. Wilson

Woman's Club.

Miss Florence Rice of the Washburn Memorial Hospital gave a valuable address Wednesday afternoon, on "Hospitals and Nursing." While somewhat historical, the lecture was practical and very interesting throughout.

Mr. H. L. Fiske, a son of L. B. Fiske, left Worcester, last week, for a long trip to New Mexico. He will be private secretary to his uncle who is Attorney General of the Territory. He has fitted himself for this place by a course at Hinman's College. Before starting he was the recipient of many tokens of regard and affection. His new home will be in Santa Fe.

The special quality of Ayer's Hair Vigor is that it restores the natural growth, color, and texture of the hair. It vitalizes the root and follicles, removes dandruff, heals itching humors in the scalp. In this respect, it surpasses all similar preparations.

A Hair Tonic.

Take seven parts of water to one of acetic acid (five cents' worth from the druggist's will last quite a while), mix well, and rub well in the scalp with some sort of a brush every night. Of course it takes some time for the effect to become apparent, but in time it really does bring out the hair. I know it for a positive fact.

Vinegar bottles may be cleaned with crushed egg-shells in a little water.

If the color has been taken out of silks by fruit stains, ammonia will usually restore the color.

A good cement is melted alum; but it must never be used when water and heat are to come in contact with it.

Fine shavings from soft pine wood make a pleasant pillow. They have special curative virtues for cough and lung troubles.

Remove ink stains from silver-plated ware by rubbing them with a paste composed of chloride of lime and water; then wash, and wipe dry.

If varnish is defaced and shows white marks, take linseed oil and turpentine in equal parts; shake them well in a phial, and apply a small quantity on a soft piece of cotton until the color is restored; then wipe the mixture entirely off.

Great care is required in handling soap and such substances as are sold for cleansing and contain soap or will form soapy compounds with grease. The best way will be not to use soap or soap compounds at all for cleansing the kitchen utensils; use a solution of sal soda instead. The solution of soda should be prepared in sufficient quantity in proportion of two pints hot water to one pound sal soda.

Pour the boiling water on the sal soda and stir until dissolved. If not stirred, the soda may remain undissolved at the bottom of the vessel, and it will then become troublesome to dissolve it; but if stirred immediately after the hot water has been poured on it will dissolve very quickly. A stone jar will be very suitable in which to dissolve the soda and keep the solution.

In addition to the solution of sal soda, powdered pumice-stone, sand-paper No. 1½, plenty of clean rags and sticks about one-half an inch thick, 1½ inches wide and a foot or more long should be kept in full supply in any kitchen.

A novel way of conducting that tiresome business, washing currants, is given as follows in Good Housekeeping: Look over them, just to pick out any large stems and gravel-stones, then put them into Indian meal and scour them. Have a pan large enough to work the hands freely; sit down, and take it in your lap, then rub between your hands, around and around, which will take off both the dirt and those wretched little stems. Put them in the colander and shake out the meal, and, presto! there are the currants floured ready to use.

New York Fashions.

With the commencement of Opera, the fashionable season has fairly begun and entertainments follow one another in rapid succession. Viands in dishes, having been banished from fashionable tables, thought has had full play among that which is ornamental; new fancies in flowers, fruits and bonbons arise perpetually and have been the chief cause of those entertainments in color, which are sometimes fairly like in beauty. Pink, yellow, heliotrope, blue, crimson or white are usually selected, with great partiality for the two first named, because of their greater adaptability. Blue must in truth be toned by yellow touches. It is a hue but lightly played upon in Nature's symphonies and when produced by art cannot be dealt with in entirety. The same is true of heliotrope. Crimson may readily become overpowering and white easily grows monotonous and must have a finish of gilt. But the lovely blush of pink greets the eye with continual charm: from deep to pale there is no sameness and it is not surprising that it leads in favor. Yellow comes next and like pink, is capable of endless variations from gorgeous orange to soft, dawn like suggestions of hue.

Flowers

though forming central adornments, are arranged with great freedom and sometimes so lavishly used as to render the table a floral parterre, but room is always given for a completion by fruits and bon-bons and generally the flowers are set to show off the two former, especially the bon-bons, because they are capable of such constant variety. They are of course colored to suit the feast: ices, creams and other rare delicacies follow suit and it has been a question how to produce coloring matter that might give artistic shades without an injurious result. Burnett's Color Pinks have solved the problem and colors even so pronounced as green or orange, are free from anything unwholesome. They are endorsed by the chemist of the State Board of Health and possess in addition to superior strength, the special advantage of solubility in milk, spirits or water.

ROSALIND MAY.

The college students are home in large numbers; just in time for Christmas presents.

Willis S. Putnam, "Tech" Class of '89 and before that a High School boy, has severed his connection with the Delaware Bridge works in Wilmington and will, after Christmas, take up his abode in Harrisburg, Penn., where he has secured an excellent situation.

Patrick E. Ratigan.

This Patrolman, whose illness has been noted for some days, died Tuesday morning from pneumonia. He was born in Ireland and came to America when a lad. He had resided in Worcester forty-six years and was appointed to the force in 1862, and his service has been nearly continuous since. Since 1883, he has done office duty at the No. 2 station. He leaves four children, John B. Esq., William E. and Frank A. All three sons have been pupils in the High School. There is one daughter, Harriet. He was buried, Thursday, from St. John's Church.

$4.00 a year; 35 cents a number.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

The January Wide Awake comes with a store of good things for young and old that are as entertaining as they are varied. It brings to its readers stories by Molly Elliot Seawell, G. Adams, Captain C. A. Curtis, Maria McIntosh Cox and the two bright story tellers who write under the nom de plumes of "Dorothy Holcomb" and "Abdel Ardavan," the Arab. It has sketches by Amanda B. Harris, Lieut. Col. Thorndike, Harriet Maxwell-Converse, Zitella Cocke, Otis T. Mason and Sally Joy White. It has poems by Celia Thaxter, Anna J. McKeag, Clara Doty Bates and others. It has pictures by L. J. Bridgman, George Foster Barnes, Virginia Gerson, Childre Hassam, Hy Sandham, Irving R. Wiles, Clifton Johnson, Charles Mente and E. H. Garrett. Such a combination of talent in story tellers, verse-makers and artists should produce most absorbing as well as most interesting reading matter, and one needs but to glance over Wide Awake's attractive January pages to find the promise fully carried out.

Wide Awake is published at 20 cents a number, $2.40 per year. All booksellers keep it. D. Lothrop Co., Publishers, Boston.

D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, will soon issue the first four books of Dichtung und Wahrheit, edited expressly for them, with introduction and notes by Professor C. A. Buchheim, editor of the Clarendon Press Series of German Classics. The edition will be especially adapted for pupils preparing for entrance to colleges, offering an advanced requirement in German, but will also have in view the numerous colleges that devote a portion of their time to the reading of Goethe's prose.

Beowulf, translated into Modern Metres by Jno. Lesslie Hall, Professor of English and History in the College of William and Mary; with footnotes giving variant readings, as well as suggestions of eminent Beowulf scholars and critics. The translation is based upon the Heyne-Socin text, rarely deviating from it. The translator has aimed at a close, but not slavish, rendering, reproducing sentences, but not verses (or lines). The chief characteristics of Anglo-Saxon poetry have been retained. Parallelisms, frequent alliterations, archaic forms, and occasional ruggedness, will please the scholar; while the non-technical man of letters will have a tolerably regular cadence to take him quite smoothly through the poem.

Friends: A Duet, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward. From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, Mass.

A novel from this well known author is always sure of readers and this is one of her best efforts in the way of writing and expression. It was published some time ago as a serial in the Atlantic Monthly but now that it is in convenient form no doubt many who could not have the expensive magazine will purchase this. The story is of a young widow who thought she could make a friend of her dead husband's friend without his falling in love with her, but finding she cannot have the friend without the lover she accepts both. The book is published in the Riverside series and is, in paper covers, only 50 cents.

Ciphers, by Ellen Olney Olik, author of The Story of Margaret Kent and Sons and Daughters, etc. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., publishers, Boston.

As the title might indicate, this is a society novel, but one that is very true to what it describes. The principal characters are a widow whose money brings her every thing but love and happiness. She falls in love with a young architect, and he, fearing people will accuse him of being a fortune hunter, makes haste to bind himself to one of his acquaintances so that he may have no temptation to see or care for Mrs. Childre, but alas he loves her just the same, and, by and by, when his betrothed finds out she likes money better than her lover, she breaks the engagement leaving Sidney Breck free to marry where he chooses. The pictures of society are well written and bring in ciphers of all sorts. One needs to read it to find the charm. For sale by the Denholm, McKay Company.

Professor Gildersleeve, of Johns Hopkins University, was in the Confederate army and a firm believer in the cause for which it contended. In the Atlantic Monthly for January he will state with frankness and force the reasons for his course, in an article entitled "The Creed of the Old South."

Sir Edwin Arnold does not seem to have met, in the West, the warm reception that his merits deserved. In St. Louis, the Spectator says, his audiences were meager at each one of his three appearances. On his Saturday matinee, he had less than a hundred listeners. In Chicago, he quite vexed those Lakeside dwellers by not going to a reception they had planned for him. In return they would not go to his readings. It was a fair turn about.

Two Worcester girls, one a present and the other a past member of the High School, recently made bold to call on Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. They found the genial gentleman in his Back Bay residence and he most kindly accorded to them a few moments of his valuable time. There was a common bond uniting them, for these girls are familiar with the Doctor's writings having studied them in school and they found the writer the soul of humor. The half hour will be to them, a life long memory. Among other things, Dr. Holmes was sorry that he had not six feet to show them. Most folks would think that two would do for a man, but the Wit referred to his stature. Of course, the girls did not overstay their welcome and when they went away, the Doctor might have said, perhaps he did say, "Good Day girls."

A piano recital was given last Saturday afternoon at B. D. Allen's studio, 173 Main Street, by his pupils, assisted by the Pilgrim Ladies' Quartet. The pupils who took part were Misses E. A. Pratt, Catherine Pratt, Eva Finnelly, Eva F. Lindley, C. M. Milliken, Florence Holt, C. L. Lowell, M. L. Starr, E. G. Whittemore, Mrs. A. J. Harrington, Mr. Frank E. Muzzy.

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1892.

No. 18

91-92.

The bridge was only a foot way
So tiny the brook it spanned,
But it led to the beautiful meadow,
Sweet land.

The path from the year that's passing,
Seems only a step at night,
But it leads to a beautiful future
Of light.

A Happy New Year!

Every thing depends upoo the way you regard it.

You may look down and be as unhappy as sin, or you may look up and beyond and see pleasures infinite.

Would that there were more Mark Tapley's in life, men whose faces are wreathed in smiles, no matter what happens.

Was Dickens too imaginative in depicting the character? Are there any such? Yes, there are many and we need justsuch to counteract the Job Trotters and other lacrymose individuals who would speedily reduce us all to a semi-liquid condition.

The past, we cannot change and the future is what we make it. Day by day we come up with calendar dates and pass them. The book of fate is unrevealed and a merciful fact it is. Of the future, we know little save the recurring days of the month; but, from the past, we know that we must move on breast forward, prepared for weal or woe.

Scarcely a writer of the English language, the long line of worthies whom we revere and love, has neglected to have his say when the old year ended and the new began. Who has not read with tearful eyes Tennyson's, "Will the New Year Come Tonight?" After all it is not a matter of one day but of many; our Happy New Year should go with us through the twelve months.

"Of all sounds of all bells, (bells the mightiest bordering on heaven) most solemn and touching is the peal which rings out the old year. I never hear it without a gathering up of my mind to a concentration of all the images that have diffused over the past twelvemonth; and I have done and suffered, performed or neglected, in that regretted time. I begin to know its worth, as when a person dies."—Charles Lamb.

Christmas and the New Year found Worcester in the pangs of the grip. The pestilence of which we heard, two years ago, as making havoc in far away Russia came nearer and nearer and finally had us in its grasp. Every cold became an attack of the disease. Many were scared into it. A brave mind is always desirable and never more so than when an epidemic rages.

The season of 1889-90 is ended. With the coming of warm weather came a cessation of the distemper. The next year, the complaint returned but with less intensity, at least, in this vicinity. The stinging cold weather with snow seemed to lessen the evil, but the present Winter seems to be the chosen season of La Grippe. North Carolina weather transferred to our locality seems to have given the trouble the strongest kind of a hold. If the Clerk of the Weather, in his New Year's rounds, will distribute a nice covering of snow, the public will be much obliged.

In New England dame nature needs covering up during Winter and when she fails to get her blanket of snow, everything seems out of gear. The only interest that profit by this kind of weather are the street and electric railroads. If the season had entered into a compact to especially help such corporations the results could, hardly, have been different. It is an ill wind that blows no body any good.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new."

Tears and regrets for the old love,
Tears and hope for the new,
Tears and lament for the false heart,
Tears and trust for the true;
Tears and sorrow for old wounds,
Tears and courage for new;
The Lethæan bowl for the old year,
The red-rose wreath for the new!"

—Aoon.

In view of the proposition to use a part or all of our Common for a new City Hall, the following is significant reading.

"Attacks Upon Public Parks.

The fight to prevent the injury and impairment of public parks, large and small, appears to be a perpetual one. There is always springing up some new person or persons possessed with a craving, as absorbing as it is mysterious, to get into a park of some kind and do harm to it in one way or another. If the park be a small one in a great city, the hostile attack takes the form of a request to run a railway across or over a corner of it, or to be granted a section for a railway station or some other semi public use. Plausible reasons are always advanced in support of such propositions, the chief of which usually is that the public convenience will be greatly enhanced by the incursion. A few years ago it was proposed with much seriousness to run an elevated railway across the Central Park, and it was claimed that the structure might be of such architectural beauty as to constitute an additional charm for the park. Again it was proposed to construct along the entire length of one side of the same park a speeding-track for horses which should be devoted to fast driving by the owners of blooded horses. In Boston and other cities the proposition is made anew every year to allow the city parks to be used as training and parade grounds for the militia.

The attacks upon the great parks, those of the Adirondacks, the Yosemite, the Yellowstone, differ only in degree. Somebody wishes to run a railway into or through them, or to construct a highway across them, or to use portions of them for some kind of private enterprise of a profitable nature. The mere sight of so much property lying idle appears to be irritating to the utilitarian spirit of the age. Men wish to get at it and make it earn something for them. And the first excuse that they make is that their particular project will be a great public convenience. If it be a railway that they propose, they say it will not injure the park, but bring its beauties and delights within easy reach of thousands of people who otherwise would never be able to enjoy them. If they wish to cut down trees, they say they only desire to do so in order to improve the views, to 'open vistas' from hotels and thus increase the enjoyment of visitors. 'Opening vistas' has long been the favorite device of park desolators all the way from New York city to the Yosemite Valley, and is one of the most extreme and violent forms of park vandalism ever invented.

All these attacks are open to the same objection, which is unanswerable, that they remove, in part if not entirely, the very qualities which are essential in a park.—Century Topics of the Time."

Miss Lydia M. Sumner.

A name, long honored in Shrewsbury, is recalled in the death of this lady, last Saturday. She was eighty years of age, a daughter of Erastus Sumner and a sister of Mr. George Sumner of this city. Her grandfather, the Rev. Wm. Sumner, was long the pastor of the Congregational Church in Shrewsbury. Her home, for many years, was with her sister, Mrs. Seth W. Howe.

Silas Dinsmore.

The name recalls an unusually tall and erect form, that of a man who for many years conducted a drug business at the north end of Main Street. He was a native of West Boylston, but for the most of the time, since his boyhood, he has resided in Worcester. He has engaged in various occupations, and in some or all of them managed to accumulate a fortune. He died at No. 10 Gertrude Avenue, Christmas day at the age of 78 years. He leaves an only daughter, who had lived with him. His funeral was held Monday afternoon.

Miss Agnes R. Whalen.

This young lady, a daughter of Mr. John Whalen of 151 Canterbury Street, a prominent member of the Father Matthew Society, died at her father's home last Tuesday, aged 22 years, 4 months, and 18 days. She had been ill a number of weeks. She was, several years ago, a pupil in the High School. Her funeral was attended Thursday, 9 A. M. at St. Peter's Church.

The St. Anne's Temperance Society will have a dance at Unity Hall next Friday evening.

Attention is called to the card of Dr. B. F. Cough in another column. His new duties as surgeon of Post 10, G. A. R., necessitates changes in his office hours.

The Monthly Calendar for January is received from Rev. Thomas J. Conaty. Aside from valuable matter, pertinent to the month, are found an interesting sketch of James J. Donnelly, recently raised to the Priesthood, and a smooth bit of verse by F. R. B. entitled, "Through the New Year."

Prize Speaking.

There is to be a contest in declamation in Horticultural Hall, Jan. 21st. The prizes will be worth struggling for. First prize, $10 in gold. Two second prizes, $5.00 each. Two third prizes, $2.50 each. The lists are open to all. Any one desiring to enter should address B. R. Simmonds, Box 646, from whom all particulars may be obtained.

Worcester has a host of good declaimers who will welcome this opportunity for a contest with a deal of pleasure. The Demorest contests have had too much sameness. This offers a wider range. No better chance was ever offered to declaimers.

The first of the three select assemblies, announced several weeks ago in LIGHT, will be held next Friday evening in Colonial Hall. The patronesses are Mrs. Waldo Lincoln, Mrs. Francis H. Dewey, Mrs. Halleck Bartlett, Mrs. Frank R. Macullar and Mrs. J. Fred Mason. The managers are Charles F. Aldrich, James W. Allen, George T. Dewey, Rockwood Hoar, George D. Moore, Charles Ranellet, William B. Schofield and Charles M. Thayer.

The second of the house cotillions will be held at Mrs. Thomas B. Eaton's on Chatham Street next Monday evening.

From the Past.

Albert Curtis is the sole surviving selectman of Worcester, 1840 and '41. H. W. Miller and Albert Tolman who have died during the past year, being the latest to go through their periods of office holding were after Mr. Curtis's.

The Hon. W. W. Rice is senior ex-mayor, his term of office having been in 1860, and though, since his day, five ex-mayors have died, ten still survive.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are give here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Jan. 2, 1892.

Entertainments.

Y. M. C. A.

The last entertainment of the first series in the Association course was giving Thursday evening by the Choristers Glee Club. This club consists of twenty men and boys from Grace Church, Newton. The program consisted of glees, part songs and solos. Master Gaun Wilson sang twice, his first selection being encored. He responded with "One Solemn Thought," which he rendered very well. Mr. Leach's singing was a decided success; he was heartily applauded both times he appeared, but responded only to the first. The audience greatly desired to hear him again. Mr. Sladen also sang twice. The director and pianist was Mr. H. B. Day.

The second series begins Jan. 21st, when the Temple Quartet will appear instead of the Fadette Ladies' Orchestra.

The Oratorio Festival.

The oratorio festival, arranged by Mr. E. M. Anderson and conducted by him, opened Thursday evening with a performance of Handel's "Messiah," the most popular of all oratorios and one very appropriate for the season of the year. The work was performed by a chorus of about eighty voices; an orchestra from the Germania orchestra of Boston with Emil Mollenhauer, leader; Benjamin Bowrin, solo trumpeter; Charles H. Groat, organist and the following soloists: Mrs. Henry F. Harris, soprano; Mrs. J. A. Rice, soprano; Miss Florence King, contralto; Mr. Alfred Thomas, tenor; Mr. John Howell, bass and Mr. W. A. Anderson, bass.

Considering the performance as a whole, there is only the highest praise for all concerned. The chorus was very well balanced and brought credit not only to itself but also to Mr. Anderson, who has conducted its preparation. Only once did it fall short of the requirements of the work and that was at the most trying part, the "Hallelujah" chorus, where the orchestra almost drowned the voices. Yet the fault was more in a lack of numbers than in the efficiency of chorus members. In the "Amen" chorus, however, where the requirements are the same, the difficulty was considerably overcome. The chorus was at its best in "Lift up your heads" and in the closing choruses.

Of the work of the orchestra not much need be said, for it was, of course, very excellent.

It would be difficult to say which of these soloists achieved the greatest success, but if pressed for a decision, the choice would be Miss King, for she was good in every selection while the others varied in excellence. In the air "He was despised" she sang particularly well, her voice full of the pathos which is the very soul of the air. She also won a triumph in the air, "He shall feed his flock."

Mrs. Rice, Mrs. Harris and Mr. W. A. Anderson should be mentioned next as successes. Mrs. Rice's best work was done in the recitative "He was cut off," the air, "But thou didst not leave his soul" and the air "How beautiful are the feet." Mrs. Harris was at the summit of her powers in the air "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and it is seldom that it is sung as she sang it. It was perfect. Mr. Anderson's greatest success was in the air "Why do the nations." His strong voice fitted the spirit of the air to perfection. Mr. Thomas was in good voice throughout and Mr. Howell sang well the small part which he had.

But the greatest praise belongs to Mr. E. N. Anderson, to him belongs the credit for the successful performance. The "Messiah" as given Thursday evening will linger long and tenderly in the memories of many people.

The remainder of the festival took place too late for LIGHT to publish an account this week.

Lothrop's Opera House.

A deviation from the usual order of things was made at this popular house of amusement this week and the large audiences seem to imply that it met with favor from the theater's patrons. The Frisco Minstrel's have been the entertainers. The show opens with the usual first part introducing songs, sentimental and humorous, and jokes and conversations. Ad. Weaver is the interlocutor, Fayette Welsh and George Woods are on the bones ends, and Dave Reed and J. H. Mack jingle the tambos. In the excellent olio which follows appear J. W. Harrington, dialect comedian; Judson and Byrne in a musical act; Ad. Weaver in songs; Prince and Princess Tanaka, jugglers; William Hafford, ballad singer; Baggeson, the contortionist; Welsh and Reed in an amusing turn; Mack and Woods in a musical act; Healy and Costello in athletic feats, and the Brilliant Quartette. The after-piece is "Fun in a Boarding School." Lots of fun was the verdict of everybody who heard the minstrels.

The announcement for next week promises much pleasure to the lovers of sensational dramas. The piece to be put on is Augustin Daily's "Under the Gaslight." With three stars, J. Gordon Edwards, Charles Harringer and Kate Glassford and a good supporting company the drama should be given a capital presentation.

Friday Populars.

Last evening, in Mechanics Hall, the Whitney Mockridge Concert Company gave the fourth of the entertainments in this course. The company includes Mr. Whitney Mockridge, tenor; Miss Belle Botsford, violinist; Mrs. Mayo Rhodes, soprano and Arthur Beresford, basso. The next entertainment will be a concert, January 15, by the Swedish Concert Company.

BOOKS AND BOOKMEN.

"Professor Charles James Capen, principal or master of the Boston Latin School, has not missed being at his post on account of sickness a single day in forty years."

The above, from a western paper, is wrong somehow. There has been no such principal of the Latin School. Moses Merrill is the present head of the School.

"I could have only good words to say of the Chautauqua courses. It is the people's college. It is a step to something better, and that appears to be University Extension. This is the next natural step in the progressive development of the idea of furnishing the means of the highest education to all its people. It is feared by some that it will cheapen learning—that many who might otherwise secure the training of the colleges will hereafter be content to take the University Extension course. But on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number, it impresses me as one of the best movements of our time."—Dr. Bush in Boston Budget.

Sumner Club.

The former members of this club will have an interest in the following from the Boston Sunday Times. Mr. Kinsley who died Dec. 26, was one of the speakers when the picture of Charles Sumner was presented to the school in the Spring of 1889. He talked about personal recollections of the distinguished senator. He has also spoken before the Academy boys.

"EDWARD W. KINSLEY.

The Railroad Commissioner Dies Suddenly, at the age of 63.

Railroad Commissioner Edward W. Kinsley died suddenly yesterday afternoon. He was a native of Nashua, N. H., but had passed the greater part of his life in Boston. During the war he was prominent in the sanitary commission. In 1878 Gov. Rice appointed him a railroad commissioner, which position he held up to the time of his death, except during the few years when he acted as the representative of Jesse Seligman, the New York banker, in promoting important schemes. He was well known in New York and the West where he had considerable capital invested. He was 63 years old."

The Assembly.

Graduate High School boys to the number of nearly thirty assembled at Estey's restaurant, last Monday night to eat a good supper and to talk over former days in Room 6 of the High School where the Assembly meetings were held. For a starter, the gathering must be considered a great success. After regaling themselves on the choice viands presented, Arthur C. Comins of the Polytechnic called the young men to order and stated the purpose of the meeting. There were present the following former High School boys: A. E. Clark, C. E. Burbank, L. E. Booth, W. H. Ellinwood, E. H. Keith, A. C. Comins, H. J. Gross, G. B. Churchill, David Reid, John Reid, C. H. Andrews, F. E. Brayton, W. H. Larkin, Jr., C. T. Tatman, C. G. Rogers, W. H. Fisher, J. F. Healy, G. A. Prior, E. B. Fish, G. H. Hill, G. S. Bennett, H. P. Hopsen, E. H. Fish, L. W. Rawson, H. C. Lakin and W. E. Langlois.

Charles E. Burbank, the first president of the society, now a Senior in Amherst, was chosen toastmaster and at his instance, speeches were made by many of the young men.

For the ensuing year, Chas. E. Burbank will be president; Arthur C. Comins, vice-president; W. H. Larkin, Jr., secretary and treasurer. The officers will constitute an executive committee and to them was left the entire matter of a constitution and the next meeting. All who join before the next gathering will be considered charter members.

Francis A. Harrington.

When a man is elected, for the third time, to the highest executive office in the gift of the city it is meet and proper to set forth the manner of man he is. The first number of LIGHT, March 1st, 1890, presented a portrait of the Mayor, then in his first term, and a brief sketch of his life. In this number the engraving is used again. Though the two years have added much to Mayor Harrington's experience, they have not altered his appearance to any extent, so the semblance then is a good one today.

His face and form are familiar to those who walk Main Street. He is more often seen afoot than riding. He attends strictly to his duties, both official and private, and is as accessible an officer as any who ever filled the Mayor's place. Apparently, he has a high sense of the responsibilities of his position and is careful to slight nothing.

Of course, he has not pleased everybody; he would not be much of a man if he had, but it is probable that he has as few enemies as any decent man can afford to have.

Worcester born, reared and educated, it is not strange that the interests of the city should be very dear to him. His family name is as old as the town and he, himself, is only a little older than the city; his birthday being Nov. 19, and the year, 1846. His preliminary school for his office was an alderman's chair which he was occupying for the second term when he was called up higher. The stamp of the city's approval has, twice, been placed upon his record.

He is a thoroughly temperate man, a member of the Salem Square Congregational Church, a Mason and a Granger, has children in the public schools and in addition to his extensive business on Central Street, runs a farm over Bloomingdale way, a farm by the way, that has been in Harrington hands possibly from the days of the very first settler.

Our Mayor, who Monday next, will again be sworn to the faithful performance of his duties is not a pretentious man. He does not indulge in high sounding words, but in every place where he has been weighed he has been found fully up to the standard.

Board of Aldermen.

Associated with Mayor Harrington in his office, will be found an excellent array of advisers, many of whom have long discharged their duties.

Warren C. Jewett, from Ward One, is in his first term; but he had previously served in the common council. He is a farmer, like the Mayor, and just at present is recovering from an attack of illness lasting from the New England Fair in September last.

Edmund L. Parker who comes to the Board, new, from Ward Two, has had experience in the lower branch of the city government. He is a manufacturer of iron and steel goods on School Street.

A. Frank Gates who represents Ward Three, and who came into the Board as Mayor Harrington's successor, is a marketman and farmer with home, long in the family, on Plantation Street.

Francis Plunkett, the only Democrat on the Board, is a well known and popular lawyer, from Ward Four, this being his second term. He has been school committee man and in the lower branch. His election was a decided compliment to him.

Francis W. Groat, who is Ward Five's representative is another farmer and it is not a little queer that the bucolic element is so largely represented in the city government. It certainly is to the city's credit. He is just half through his first term. His home is on Vernon Street.

George W. Coombs comes into the government as a new member and Ward Six is his particular territory. The caucus contest was a hot one but he won fairly. He has been an extensive dealer in wool.

William A. Lytle, the clothing man on Main Street, is Ward Seven's alderman and he has just finished his first year. He is New York born but has long lived in Massachusetts.

Charles H. Pinkham who comes for his first term from Ward Eight has just finished two terms in the common council. As a member of the firm of Pinkham & Willis he is well known. He has also, just completed his second term as Commander of Post 10, G. A. R.

Probably there is not a man in this branch of the government who does not thank his stars that the license question was decided at the same time that he was elected. They will have more time for other business.

The Common Council.

Having three times the number of the aldermanic body, the council is the scene of activity and eloquence, that the adjacent chamber is a stranger to. Over this organization, Eben Francis Thompson, Esq., will preside, he being the choice of the Republican majority. He has resided, nearly all his life, in this city and knows its needs perfectly. He was graduated from the High School in 1877, having taken the college preparatory course, though he did not enter. Devoting himself to the study of law in the office of Colonel Williams, he has been a diligent student ever since. In school he was conspicuous for his forensic talent and there is a prize won at a Mechanics Hall contest in declamation, still remembered to his credit. Since leaving school he has enjoyed a more than local fame as a diligent student of Shakespeare and an inspiring reader of the Divine Dramatist. He has twice been abroad and has published a Students Kent, an admirable book for the use of the tyro in law. This year makes his fourth in the council and his promotion is well earned.

The other twenty-three men are: from Ward One, Frank A. Atherton, refrigerator manufacturer of Sunnyside; George W. Rice, 2d, photographer at 419 Main Street; and Alonzo A. White grocer at 143 Main Street. Captain White was in the 36th Regiment and this is his introduction to city office.

Ward Two sends Alvah W. Bigelow, book-keeper with Bigelow & Longley, 388 Main Street; James P. Crosby, iron dealer on Foster Street and Representative elect from the ward; and Josiah P. Shattuck, farmer, on Lincoln Street.

From Ward Three we have William W. Sanderson, coal dealer on East Worcester Street; John P. Fay, truckman, 35 Grafton, and John J. Flaherty, instructor at the jail.

Ward Four has David F. O'Connell, lawyer;

Michael L. Russell, reporter and former High School boy; Daniel F. Fitzgerald, manager at 122 Front Street.

The councilmen from Ward Five are Edward J. McMahon, lawyer and High School graduate of '81; John J. Murphy, armorer and John F. Riley, also a High School graduate and collector for the Gas Company.

Ward Six's men are Jos'ph M. Dyson, State Inspector of Buildings and an old soldier; George S. Dixon, dealer in machinery oils, paints, etc., on Pearl Street and at Washington Square and Eben W. Hoxie, the well known Main Street grocer.

Ward Seven has John F. Adams, inspector, 31 Hermon Street; Irving E. Comins, woolen manufacturer at Greenville, a High School graduate of 1879. Amherst, 1883; Daniel W. Darling of the extensive firm of Darling Bros., contractors and builders.

From Ward Eight are Eben F. Thompson, already mentioned as president; Homer P. King, farmer, Tatnuck and Edward F. Fletcher of the Waverly Shoe Company.

From Wards 3, 4 and 5 the councilmen are Democrats. The others are Republicans. Probably not another city in the land as large as Worcester can show so good a representation, all reputable business or professional men. The city is safe.

Mr. and Mrs. Stoughton.

Very rarely do husband and wife go, as it were hand in hand into the dark valley. It was a sad Christmas for the children of these aged people who, within a few hours of each other passed from this life to the next, the husband at about 4 A. M. and the wife seven hours later. They were, both, victims of the prevailing epidemic, though previous feebleness rendered them especially subject to the attack. Mr. Samuel Stoughton was born in Gill, Mass., where his father was one of the early settlers and where many of his relatives still reside. In that town he was a farmer. His wife, Hannah E. Spaulding, was a native of Jaffrey, N. H. They came to this city, twelve years ago, making their home with their son, Frederick S. 14 Crystal Street. Their other children are Charles S. and Mrs. George R. Bliss. Mr. Stoughton's age was 76 years, 10 months and 15 days; his wife's, 68 years, 10 months and 24 days. They were members of the Old South Church, whose pastor, Dr. Conrad is confined to his home by illness, and the Rev. Mr. Southgate of the Pilgrim Church officiated at the funeral, Monday at 3 P. M.

"They were lovely and pleasant in their lives and in their death they were not divided." The remarks of the clergyman were particularly happy and consoling to the bereaved family. The burial was at Hope cemetery. All the exercises were of the simplest character, being strictly private.

The sun was sinking in the west,
When two with staff in hand,
Started for that life of rest
Within the border-land.

Side by side, these two were laid,
A life of joy begun,
Just as the year began to fade,
Just at the set of sun.

My brush or pen would fail to paint,
How rich this glad fruition.
The boys held out for fullest saint,
Beyond my poor expression.

W. A. WHEELER.

Pagan or Nazarene ?

Suggested by Edwin Long's Picture, "Diana or Christ."

A day of golden sunshine and deep blue sky in Rome. Standing near one of the entrances of the Coliseum is a statue of Diana of Ephesus, the All-Mother, with arms extended toward her votaries.

Blood-red roses garland its base. White-clad maidens whose flowing tresses are circled by jewelled fillets group themselves in the shadow of the statue, and discourse sweet music on pipe and lute.

An aged man, white-bearded and wrinkled, is seated on a stone at their feet. His hands are fettered, his deep-set eyes are fixed on the central figure of the group in front of the statue—that of a young girl.

Scarcely past childhood is she, pale as Italian moonlight, slender to fragility. The flaxen tendrils of her hair shade the pure brow. Her widely-opened blue eyes have a wondering look. She seems to be listening to voices from afar.

At her shoulder a man reads from a scroll. He raises his serpent eyes to her, his lips spit venom.

A burly negro, whose ebony blackness is deepened by the yellow leopard-skin thrown across one shoulder, stands with one foot advanced and hands ready to seize her.

Suddenly, through the mass of glittering soldiery guarding the entrance to the amphitheater, a bare-headed young Roman pushes his way to the girl's side.

"Clytie!" he cries. "Flavius!" gasps the startled girl. The musicians are silent. The roar of wild beasts, the shouts of the spectators in the arena fill the air.

"What does this mean, my Clytie?" asks Flavius, as he throws a protecting arm round the girl.

"It means," interposed the snake-eyed man, "that she is a professed Nazarene, but because of her high standing and patrician blood she is granted the choice between scattering incense on great Diana's altar and making a meal for the lion."

"That dotard," passionately exclaims Flavius, pointing to the white-bearded man, "has cast some spell over her; to the lions with him! But twenty days have passed since I left Rome. Fall back, while I speak with the maiden."

Graceful as Apollo, brave as Mars, he stands, the proud young senator, favorite of the imperial city. Sullenly he is obeyed. The brass helmets of the soldiers form the background for the crisply curled dark head, the cameo profile rising from the sinewy sunburnt neck.

Hastily thrusting his hand into a pearly casket held by one of Diana's servitors: "See," he whispered, "my Clytie, throw these grains on the altar and let us begone from this foul mob." Clytie's lips quiver. Her eyes, now dilated with horror, involuntarily meet those of the old man. Strange that so much magnetic fire should dwell in that aged body.

"Flavius," she very faintly murmured, "tempt me not. Leave me to die in peace."

"This is no peaceful death, beloved. Even now the Coliseum reeks with the crowd clamoring for your sweet body. Hark! by all the gods you swore you loved me. Come with me then and teach me your new faith!"

The soldiers are gradually yielding to the pressure of the crowd. Desperately Flavius opened the clinched hand of the agonized girl, and pours into the palm the incense from his own hand.

A second's pause—a parting sigh—the grains drop—but on the ground; the lovely eyes are glazed—the slender form sways and lies strangely still in Flavius' arms—the wild beasts are balked of their prey. Clytie is at rest.—Home Journal.

Books and Bookmen.

The contents of the January Pansy will delight all its readers as well as help create more. The Pansy is peculiarly adapted to the needs of the young people, but every member of the household is always sure to find something of interest as well as help. Its stories are characterized by that high moral tone which stamp this magazine as the young folks' friend, its sketches graphic and real, its poems, pictures and verse replete with incident, interest and merit, making this publication one we can everywhere heartily commend to the family, the reading-room and the home. The price is only $1.00 a year; 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, Publishers, Boston.

One of the early issues of D. C. Heath & Co., will be White's Number Lessons, graded for second and third year pupils.

It has been carefully selected from the everyday blackboard work used in the Syracuse Schools, and contains no work that has not been long tried and approved by the very best Primary teachers.

It deals with number thoroughly and progressively from ten up to the thousands, using easy fractions, and Roman numerals throughout.

It has been a special aim to make the language so simple that children can use the book with little or no help from the teacher.

Original problem-pictures, and problem-making are features of the book.

Our Little Men and Women for January is a number well worth having. The pictures are bright, attractive and pretty, the verses and rhymes, expressions of melody and sweetness, and the stories are made for boys and girls, by writers who know how to make them. On the whole, the best thing to be said of Our Little Men and Women is, that it is really what it claims to be, a magazine for boys and girls (from five to nine years) and this to our mind is the best recommendation it could possibly have.

The price is only $1.00 a year; 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, Publishers, Boston.

Babyland for January, with its dainty pictures, sweet little stories and gay jingles is here. Baby never fails to find this magazine engaging from cover to cover, and so long as babies are in our midst, just so long will Babyland continue to be a source of comfort and delight both to baby and mamma. Adapted to children from one to six.

The price is only 50 cents a year; 5 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, Publishers, Boston.

One of the most interesting things in the New England Magazine every month is the critical, chatty talk "In a Corner at Dodsley's," by Walter Blackburn Harte, which this month comes out under a new and appropriate design by H. Martin Beal. It shows a glimpse of the interior of the old bookseller's shop in Pall Mall, in which Pope aud all the wits of London used to congregate. Harte has plenty of witty, wise, and ironical things to say, and Pope would have found him a congenial companion.

It should be noted that Prof. Gladwin's book has a peculiar attraction for all Polytechnic boys and graduates, in that the cover bears the Institute colors viz., steel gray and crimson. The effect is delightful.

Curtis H. Hartshorn.

Mr. Hartshorn was known to few Worcester people, his coming here having been so recent, but he was a man of sterling worth who had known much of the vicissitudes of living. He lived in the West for many years, but for the last twenty, Ashland was for the most part his home. While he had worked at boot making, he was also a farmer and this form of labor was his last. With his wife he came to Worcester, within the year, to make his home with his daughter, Mrs. Martin L. Parmenter and at her home, No. 24 Salem Street, he died, December 25 at the age of 73 years. The burial was in Ashland, Monday, the funeral being held at an early hour at his late residence. In the later months of his life, no one would recognize in his feeble bearing, the hearty, robust man of only a few years ago. Then, he was one of the most successful fox hunters in his vicinity and there were few haunts of Reynard in Middlesex or Eastern Worcester with which he was not familiar. He leaves a son who served in the Rebellion and Mrs. Parmenter of this city. A daughter Jennie died several years since in Minnesota.

Alfred Atherton.

The past week has been prolific in sudden deaths and seldom has Christmas presented such an array as did our last. Wednesday, the 23d Mr. Atherton was about the city in normal health, though he has not been strong for some time. The 25th at 6 P. M. his spirit took its flight to another world, a victim of La Grippe.

Mr. Atherton has lived in this city for about thirty years, for a long time manufacturing refrigerators near Chadwick Square, a business that he passed over, several years ago to his son, Frank. He was born in Still River, town of Harvard and his wife, who survives him, was Mrs. Abby (Adams) Stacy. Their children are Councilman Frank A.; Edward Herbert, a teacher in the Boston Girls' Latin School, and Walter E., dealer in paints, oils etc. on Pleasant Street. Mr. Atherton was long a member of Grace M. E. Church and his death is the tenth in that body since the first of last April. He was born February 27, 1823. His reputation was the very best and his going hence, takes away a kind and loving husband and father and an estimable citizen. His funeral was attended Monday afternoon by friends and neighbors at his late residence, No. 5 Hall Street, Sunnyside, Rev. W. T. S.

Just Before Christmas.

A Boy's Story.

You see it was this way, my mamma could'n go with me and I went down to see Tim could go. His father is a policeman and he sleeps days. His mother had been sick all the week and she was trying to sweep and so she wanted Tim to shake the rugs for her and she said, "Spos'n your father should wake up ann way you. I guess you'd better not go today;" so I had to go all alone, for I was bound to see some of the fine things I'd heard the other boys tell of.

I went to see the candy castle in Rebboli's window for mamma had been down that morning and she said "be sure to look at that." I didn't think the castle was very big but the rocks it was up on looked splendid all made of candy. I didn't stay there long for nothing about it moved and I wanted to see the Fairy Boat in the Boston Store window that rocked. That was fine and I went down stairs with a lot of boys who said you could see how it worked if you went down stairs. I found out all about it and I can rig one up myself if I had room enough in the house, but mamma says if I had all the room I wanted she wouldn't have any. I shouldn't want to have her move out. I'd miss her awfully I guess.

Well, I went round and round down stairs and by and by a man asked me if there was any one with me and when I said no, he said he guessed I'd better go now. Papa said if I'd gone and found Uncle Charlie, (he's boss down stairs you know) why, I could have stayed, but the man who sent me out didn't know that, I suppose.

There were a lot of boys waiting at Clark & Sawyer's and I went in with them and saw more things that go, and there was a man, purpose to wind them up, and when I tried to tell about it at supper time papa said he guessed he would me up, and Frank, he's my cousin, said I needn't holler so, but you see I go to Dix Street school, an' I have to yell because I couldn't make any body hear if I didn't. I like Mr. Jenkins because he's jokinified like my papa, but I do hate to carry my slate to him because he says in kind of a sorry way, "You must do better than that, my boy."

I stayed a long time in that store, but they have a man in every where to send the boys out and he came up and said, "Now boys, you've been round four times and I guess you may look for the door now;" but I knew where the door was because I took particular pains to notice the way out. All the boys went right up stairs and so I guess he meant for me to go. Papa laughed when I told him but I don't see what there was funny about that, do you?

Then I went to No. 385 to see the House that Jack Built. That was fine, for the rat and the malt and the priest and the maiden and all the rest except the horse and the hound and the horn, and those were left out. They belonged to the farmer that sowed the corn you know. I wonder if that store keeper has any children?

I stayed so long down town that I thought mamma would wonder where I was, so I came home for that day. Papa said, most as quick as I finished my supper, that I could be excused, so I took my little sister up stairs and told her all about it.

Next day after school Tim came up and wanted me to go down and show him the things I saw, so we started out and went over the same things, but when I got to the place we wanted to see most a man stood at the door and when we went in he counted us and said, "One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen boys, and there's the door," and he never let us so much as look over the railing down stairs. I felt sorry for Tim, though I had told him so he knew most all of it. But that isn't like seeing it your own self, is it?

I wanted to go down every day but mamma said she guessed I'd better not, but I saw lots the times I did go.

Living Whist.

The party at Mechanics Hall, Wednesday night, was a brilliant refutation of the oft repeated statement that there is nothing new under the sun, for to Worcester the whole affair savored much of an actual creation. The original suggestion of the entertainment for this city was made by Mrs. O. F. Rawson and the society of the Church of the Unity, that has presented already, so many novelties took it up with vim and energy. The rehearsals were under the direction of Mr. M. B. Gilbert who devised the scheme. Fortunately, clearing weather rendered a large audience possible, and many people assembled to see the most notable game of cards ever played in Worcester. Fifty-two persons under the direction of C. M. Thayer, E. D. Stoddard, John H. Jewett and T. K. Corbier, in costumes made specially for the occasion, went through graceful evolutions. The suggestion and the performance may be considered marvels of ingenuity. The mazes of the giddy dance are nothing to the intricacies of this network of interwoven complications, but the players were equal to the emergency and they went through in a manner to secure an encore. Following the play came a period of dancing.

The names of those acting the game are as follows:

Played by C. M. Thayer. Miss Lizzie Norcross, ace of hearts; Miss Maud Knowlton, queen of diamonds; W. W. Conkey, 10 of hearts; Fred Whittemore, 5 of clubs; Waldo Simpson, jack of hearts; Mrs. F. J. Darrah, 2 of diamonds; C. A. Wait, 6 of clubs; T. H. Blood, jack of clubs; Miss L. E. Gray, 2 of spades; H. A. Billings, 3 of spades; H. H. Ames, Jr., 7 of spades; Miss J. V. Hammond 3 of diamonds; Miss F. Buckingham, 4 of diamonds.

Played by John H. Jewett, Harry B. Fairbanks, jack of diamonds; Miss Annie Taft, ace of diamonds; H. W. Doe, jack of spades; George S. Taft, king of spades; Miss Alice M. Rheutan, 10 of spades; Miss E. Billings, 4 of spades; Mrs. W. T. Clark, queen of spades; Miss Mazie Longley, 10 of diamonds; Miss Catherine Burton, 4 of hearts; Edwin H. Dodge, 9 of clubs; Miss Josie White, 3 of hearts; Miss H. E. Fletcher, 8 of diamonds; Miss Theresa Gray, 2 of hearts.

Played by T. K. Corbier, A. A. Barker, king of hearts; Morton Crane, 7 of diamonds; Miss E. S. Rheutan, queen of hearts;

Miss Maud Longley, 4 of clubs; Miss Daisy Day, 8 of hearts; F. J. Darrah, 9 of hearts; Miss J. Robinson, ace of clubs; Miss F. Braman, 10 of clubs; George Eddy, 7 of clubs; Mrs. W. W. Conkey, ace of spades; Miss C. McClellan, 8 of spades, William Waite, 5 of spades; Miss Mollie Taft, 6 of spades.

Played by E. D. Stoddard, F. A. Leland, king of diamonds; R. G. Chandler, 9 of diamonds; Miss Ruth Goddard, 9 of spades; Miss Isabel Gray, queen of spades; A. F. Hyde, 8 of clubs; Dr. W. T. Clark, king of clubs; John E. Kennedy, 3 of clubs; H. Wheelock, 6 of diamonds; William A. Cile, 7 of hearts; Miss Mollie Day, 2 of clubs; C. F. Brown, 6 of hearts; J. O. Norcross, 5 of diamonds; Dr. A. F. Townsend, 5 of hearts.

The game was won by Messrs. Stoddard and Corbier.

W. A. Smith, secretary of the Mechanics Association, has had his share of the grip, but is again out and about.

Chas. W. Delano, Wesleyan '94, is spending the Holidays at home. He had a week of the grip, before leaving Middletown.

"Now is the Winter of our discontent made glorious Summer" by Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This wonderful medicine so invigorates the system and enriches the blood that cold weather becomes positively enjoyable. Arctic explorers would do well to make a note of this.

The new French club, Le Casino, held its New Year's social Wednesday evening in the club rooms, 215 Front Street.

Next week Tuesday evening Worcester Grange, No. 22, Patrons of Husbandry, will meet at Grange Hall, when the annual reports will be read and the officers for 1892 will be installed by Past Master James Draper.

The Laurel Hill electric line was opened Wednesday. It promises to be a very paying branch. Next should come lines to Clinton, Shrewsbury, Millbury and other surrounding towns and then Worcester will begin to have the influence through the county which it should have but has not now.

Whooping cough, croup, sore throat, sudden colds, and lung troubles peculiar to children, are easily controlled by promptly administering Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. This remedy is safe to take, certain in its action, and adapted to all constitutions.

Horticultural Society.

The first meeting for discussion will take place, Thursday, Jan. 7. Subject, "The Possibilities of New England Horticulture," chief speaker, J. Howard Hale of South Glastonbury, Conn.

Tin Wedding.

Mr. and Mrs. James E. Coffey have been ten years married. Mr. C. is the efficient clerk of the Board of Health. If the friends of these people chose to make them a testimonial more solid than tin ware, if not so resonant, they have no cause for complaint, for Monday evening from Pinkham & Willis' an elegant solid mahogany parlor suite was sent to their home on Ingalls Street. Illness in Mr. Coffey's family prevented a social gathering. That will come later.

Curious Corner.

Virginia's Nickname.

Inter-Ocean tells that the authorities in the colony of Virginia, at the time of the contest in England between the Stuarts and Cromwell, appear to have been devoted to the Stuarts, and when the Cromwellian government threatened to send a fleet to reduce the colony to submission, its officials dispatched a message to young Charles, who was afterward King of England, under the title of Charles II., who was then hiding in France, to come over and be King of Virginia. It is said that Charles was on the point of starting, when the collapse of the commonwealth and the Cromwellian regime took place, which sent him to the English throne. Charles never forgot this devotion of Virginia, to his fortunes, and that colony was subsequently classed with England, Scotland and Ireland as leading members of the empire. In this way Virginia came to be known among the American colonies as the Old Dominion.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, at the late National W. C. T. U. convention, told of seeing a group of Chinese ladies, to whom some one had given a magazine containing an American fashion plate. They were examining it with great interest, with their elaborately decorated heads all bent over the picture together. At length one of them straightened up and said to Mrs. Leavitt: "China woman pinch foot. You say China woman velly bad. Melican woman not pinch foot; Melican woman pinch here," laying her hands on her waist. "Life here, life not in foot. Melican woman velly more bad than China woman!" Mrs. Leavitt said a "Heavenly Foot Society" had been formed in China, of young men pledged not to marry any woman whose feet were smaller than heaven meant them to be. She wished a "Heavenly Waist Society" might be formed in this country, of young men pledged not to marry any girl whose waist was smaller than heaven meant it to be.—Woman's Journal.

Old Milestones.

On the old Boston and New Haven turnpike in the southern part of New London county, Ct., is an old milestone, notched and moss grown, that was set there by Benjamin Franklin. When the highway was laid out Franklin got the job of setting its milestones, and he did it in an original way. He set out from Boston in a comfortable chaise that he had built, and a gang of men followed him with a team that conveyed the stones. Franklin's vehicle had a peculiar machine that marked the miles according to the revolutions of one of its wheels. He drove all the way between Boston and the Elm city. The historic stone is alongside of the John Champion farm in Lynn.

Post Office Alley.

If you have time, take several trips through the alley by the side of the Chapin Block and note the looks of those habitues who, for years, have been wont to turn in at the side door of the Post Office. Their discomfiture is as good as a play. Some don't discover the change till they flatten themselves against the board sheathing where once were the swinging doors. Then they remember that they did the same thing yesterday and they wonder if any one saw them. Of course, somebody did. Somebody is always at hand to enjoy a good thing. The way people have, for years, threaded that alley and stumbled up those steps is a very good illustration of the automatic manner in which many of the duties of living are performed. Many a man can't tell whether he wound the clock or not and few Main Street merchants would be willing to tell how many times they have walked back to their stores to see whether they had locked the doors as they went out.

Postmaster Greene has made some of his patrons lots of trouble by his enlarged quarters, but they will settle down to the changed order after they get their minds automatized on that side door question.

Demorest.

At the contest in Christ Church Monday evening the medal was won by Miss Bessie Lawrence. Miss Gertrude Fuller receiving honorable mention. The donor, a resident of New York, has given away nearly 1500 medals. At this rate they will become quite common.

Well Done.

This must be everyone's verdict over the entertainment given to the sewing women of the Employment Society. Thirty guests enjoyed a repast prepared by Rebboli at the expense of Miss Frances M. Lincoln. In addition to a lunch, they were treated to music by Mr. Ben T. Hammond and Miss Ida Johnson. Each guest also received a souvenir. The Employment Society is one of our city's many beneficent institutions.

The Grange Hall.

If one were to be a farmer, it would be nice to own a farm in Worcester, then could be had all the advantages of city life along with the bucolic joys for which the country is famous. Not least among these are such assemblies as that of last Tuesday night, when Worcester Grange No. 22, Patrons of Husbandry met in Grange Hall and enjoyed a Poverty Party. The costumes were remarkable and promenades were reviewed by the city's farmer mayor, F. A. Harrington, but if all those enumerated in the procession were farmers, then any one ought to be able to ring in, at least by descent.

The Last Christmas Tree.

The very last of the season was that had Tuesday night, under the auspices of the West End Mission, corner of Tuft and Abbott Streets. The Rev. Alonzo Sanderson who has the mission in charge was present and spoke and prayed. Above 100 little folks were made happy. The following people made up the committees in charge: Finance, C. H. Tower, Mrs. Olivia P. Santum, Miss Alice Hill, Mrs. Pettit; on tree and presents, S. J. Laws, Mrs. S. J. Laws, Mrs. C. H. Tower, Mrs. Olivia P. Santum; on box and contents, S. J. Laws, Mrs. Pettit, Mrs. Margaret Nicodemus, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. Matthews, Mrs. Lovell. Mr. S. J. Laws, Superintendent, assisted by Mrs. Olivia P. Santum, conducted the exercises.

The Old Year and the New.

Today the Old Year breathes its last,
And in the vortex of the past,
With all its histories sad or bright,
Is whirled in Time's eternal flight.
On every sorrow, grief and pain,
Time's finger now is softly laid,
While melodies of happy days,
Shall echo o'er life's future ways.

Farewell Old Year! though hearts grow sad
To see thee go, yet memories glad
Of many joys that thou didst bring,
Around our lives shall ever cling;
While sorrow's hour that comes to all,
Its shadows dark none recall,
And Time with gentle soothing power,
Takes from us much of sorrow's dour.

Yet while the Old Year takes its flight,
And fades forever from our sight,
There swiftly comes to fill its place,
A younger, brighter, sower face,
And with its history still untold,
Its spotless pages yet unrolled,
It beckons us from grief away,
To greet the dawn of New Year's day.

Oh! glad New Year, we welcome thee
With joyous hearts, for thou mayst be
The messenger of hopes fulfilled,
The cup of bliss no one has spilled;
Yet if thou bringest in thy train,
Some mingled drops of joy and pain,
We'll take the bitter with the sweet,
And bravely all thou bringest meet.

Books and Bookmen

American State Papers bearing on Sunday Legislation. Compiled and annotated by William Addison Blakey, Counsellor at Law, New York and Washington, National Religious Association, 1891.

Here is a very laborious compilation made by a man who, obviously, believes in something most devoutly, and that something is the complete severance of church and state. It is barely possible that the book is an outgrowth of the troubles into which Seventh Day Adventists and Baptists have, at various times, fallen. From Legislative, Judicial and Executive sources, the compiler has drawn material, showing that many of the brightest minds have believed that the government should have nothing to do with conscience. With this abstract truth, only bigots would quarrel, but what are we to do with such religions as Mormonism with its polygamy at tactment or with the case of Freeman, the Cape Cod child murderer, whose conscience prompted him to emulate Abraham in sacrificing Isaac. Every man should have the highest degree of personal liberty, provided he is not trespassing on the rights of others. Few will question the propriety of according to Sabbatarians the rights and privileges that Sunday observers claim, but knowing the great stress laid by the former on the Seventh Day claim, what might the latter expect were they to find themselves in the minority?

But all this in no ways lessens the value of this book, just as a collection of thoughts on this important matter. It is a large octavo, of 368 pages, printed in excellent manner and having profuse marginal notes or summaries of the several pages. It may be had at the New York office, 43 Bond Street, New York, or at 267 W. Main Street, Battle Creek, Mich. In the Appendix, may be found all there is bearing on the subject in the various state constitutions as well as an abstract on Sunday legislation in every state in the Union. The celebrated King case, where there was prosecution for Sunday labor is given at length. In conclusion, the book is one to be possessed by all who wish to know what has been said and done concerning the important subject of Sunday observance. It matters not, what the readers, opinions are, this is a thoroughly unbiased, unprejudiced compilation, the result of much research and as such is worthy a place, along with Kent, Chitty and Parsons.

Stray Leaves from my Sketch Book. A few jottings with pencil, in my rambles over land and sea, East, West, North and South. Reproduced by Photoengraving. George E. Gladwin, Worcester, 1894.

There are hundreds of present and past dwellers in Worcester who will hail Prof. Gladwin's book with no little pleasure. He has long been known, not only as the faithful and successful instructor in drawing at the Institute but also as one who has taken great pains to sketch interesting objects and places, at home and abroad. In his book, which is an elegantly prepared oblong from the press of Lucius P. Goddard, he presents eighteen souvenirs from his sketch books. Each one is only a sample from the large number in his possession. His dedication is to the Alumni of the Institute, every one of whom has sat under his instruction. His preface is a very modest and well worded reference to the origin and purpose of the volume. Each picture is preceded by a quotation from some well known author who has written of the subject sketched. From Thanatopsis are taken the lines beginning

"To him who in the love of Nature, holds Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A common language; etc."

Surely an apt selection for the work that follows.

The "Tech" graduate will be glad to see as the first in the series the via ardua up which he and his fellows have climbed in heat and cold; just a glimpse of Boynton Hall and the path among the trees. It should be stated that the book opens with a very fine portrait of the Professor, followed by a picture of the Instructor in his room, the very one which was seen a few weeks since on the first page of LIGHT.

After the Polytechnic representation are sketches of Diomedes, recognized by "Tech" boys. Among the Berkshire Hills, prefaced by a timely quotation from Dr. Holland. A Chippewa Squaw and Papoose is a reminder of Western Rambles. In the Woods, Suffield, Conn., is just a bright bit of scenery in Prof. Gladwin's native state. Flora is also a trace of school work. Ah Mic Lake takes us to Canada as do the following two pictures those of Lakes Muskoka and Rosseau. Then we see Darkie Life in Georgia, in the semblance of a dumble little black with bristling hair and feet encased in gigantic shoes. The next step is to Provincetown with its Light, and then we stop in Newfoundland with a page of sketches, eight in number; then a touch of northern scenery among icebergs; next a page of English views, including four sketches about Chester and one in London, embracing the Obelisk, Somerset House, and Waterloo Bridge. Returning to America we are shown a Sioux Indian and then three studies of icebergs.

The book is every way creditable, both to artist and printer and it is a comfort to know that, amidst so much that is practical, Worcester can produce so beautiful a work. Prof. Gladwin had hoped to have the book out in time for the Holiday trade, but many things conspired to prevent. But it will prove an "all the year round" pleasure in many homes. May the success of this venture be such as to prompt the Professor to put out other specimens from his sketch books, filled as they are from all parts of Britain and America.

The Atlantic Monthly for January, 1892. Contents.

Don Orsino, I, III, F. Marion Crawford; Boston, R. W. Emerson; James Russell Lowell, Henry James; Birds and "Birds," Edith M. Thomas; John Stuart Mill and the London and Westminster Review. C. Marion D. (Robertson) Towers; Down by the Shore in December, Thomas William Parsons; The Creed of the Old South, Basil L. Gildersleeve; The Missiug Interpreter, Herbert D. Ward; The Greatest Need of College Girls, Annie Payson Call; Why Socialism appeals to Artists, Walter Crane; The Political Situation, Recent French Literature, English Composition, Comment on New Books, The Contributors' Club.

Many readers of the Atlantic will hail Marion Crawford's new story with no little pleasure, while an essay by Emerson, never before published will awaken precious memories in minds that in the early days of the magazine, read his writings first. Henry James' article on James Russell Lowell is one of the most readable accounts that the death of the Poet has called forth. The naturalist, young or old, will be pleased with "Birds and Birds." The experience of J. Stuart Mill with the Westminster Review is a chapter, omitted from his famous Autobiography. Publishing a review at an average loss of $500 a number is a luxury, that only the very rich can afford. Prof. Gildersleeve of Johns Hopkins contributes one of the most important articles on the War of the Rebellion yet contributed by a Southern man. It would seem impossible for any old soldier to read it without feelings of the utmost respect for the writer. He will conclude that our opinions are, as a rule, the result of our surroundings. Mr. Ward's story is a fine picture of life on the coast, but there was no need of killing the old fisherman just as he began to be lovable. Annie Payson Call's advice to College Girls is worthy of all such young ladies. Mr. Crane's article recalls the statement that a recent invitation to a swell Boston breakfast was canceled because of his appearance at a Socialistic meeting. "The Political Situation" is a very fair presentation of the peculiar attitude of politics in this country today, perhaps it is a trifle pessimistic. In the Contributors Club, the most notable items are those on the age of Scott's heroines and a little screed on Emily Dickinson but her reputation can afford any such detractor. She did not write for the public, but for her own pleasure. It matters not if her stanzas do not come within any established rule.

The Ladies' Home Journal.

Over 700,000 women in this country alone now buy and read each month the Ladies' Home Journal, and a study of the January number, just to hand, shows at once why the Journal is so popular. It is in complete touch with a woman's best needs, and covers everything in her life. No magazine covers its special field so thoroughly, and in such a fresh and capable manner. Mrs. Burton Harrison, for example, is selected to write of "Social Life in New York"—than which there could have been no better choice. "Wine on Fashionable Tables," whether its use is increasing or decreasing, is discussed by such royal entertainers and diners-out as Chaucey M. Depew, ex-President Hayes, Madame Romero, Mrs. ex-Secretary Whitney, George W. Childs and others. In the series of "Unknown Wives of Well-Known Men" we have the first portrait of Mrs. John Wanamaker ever printed, and a sketch, while "Clever Daughters of Clever Men" presents Ethel Ingalls, the pretty daughter of ex-Senator Ingalls. Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher reaches the call of Plymouth church to her husband and their removal to Brooklyn in her series of papers on "Mr. Beecher as I Knew Him," while the daughter of Charles Dickens completes her first story. Robert J. Burdette begins his work as a Journal editor with his new department "From a New Inland." Maria Parloa's department is full of good household ideas. The Journal is only one dollar per year, and is, needless to say, fully worth it. Published by the Curtis Publishing Company of Philadelphia.

Map of Worcester and Vicinity.

Anything that contributes to the good of the city is hailed with pleasure and a new map showing quickly, the immediate surroundings of the Heart of the Commonwealth is just out. It comes as a product of zeal on the part of the Appalachian Club. The Club has used the plates of the United States Topographical Survey and thereby has made the very best map of our city and approaches that has, as yet, been put forth. The map includes Wachusett on the north, Acton, and Holliston on the east, Millbury to the south and Hubbardston and Spencer on the west. By means of circular lines. Elevations of land are made apparent and figures are given in scores of cases. Every pond and water course are shown and every road, public or rail, plainly appears. To those good people who like to take carriage vacations it will be a great help, and to the pedestrian and bicyclist it must be invaluable.

This manner of map making was started in a map of Boston and surrounding country, the same reaching up to the eastern line of this one. This proved so successful from the start that Prof. Fay of Tufts college, a member of the Club suggested to Principal Russell of the Normal School the propriety of a similar map for Worcester and neighboring towns. A request to this purport was shown in the store of Putnam, Davis & Co., and having been generally signed was submitted. The map is here. It is prepared in three forms. As a roll map it costs $1.25. In sections with canvas back, for the pocket, it may be had for 75 cents and as a simple folded map with cover, it is sold for 25 cents. There seems to be nothing lacking in proclaiming this the most desirable map of this part of Worcester County ever printed. For sale by Putnam, Davis & Co.

"Ten editions of the first series of Emily Dickinson's poems have been sold. The second has already gone into its fourth."—Brains.

"Tennyson, is of course, a very great master of the noble language which he has so largely adorned. In Lincolnshire, his native county, the purest English in the world is spoken—with, to my mind, one exception, for I have heard the same English as correctly used in Boston, New England. If I am right, it is a strange coincidence. The capital of Massachusetts, peopled from the fens of England, and representing the names of its towns, should also preserve the purest traditions of English speech."—Sir Edwin Arnold, in Forum.

Educational Review.

With the number for January, 1892, the Educational Review opens its third volume. Professor Jenks of Cornell has a paper on "Educational Values," particularly with reference to the college curriculum, and controvert-ing the position taken by Professor Patten in an earlier number. Superintendent Marble of Worcester, Mass., makes some practical suggestions concerning the teaching of the Effective Use of English. Professor Richards of Yale contrasts the old and the new methods of teaching Geometry; and Principal Grant of Queen's College, Kingston, Ontario, replies to Bishop Spalding's earlier argument for religious instruction in state schools. Important articles appear also on school savings banks in England, and the effect of manual training upon health.

The discussion on city school supervision is continued by Superintendent Tarbell of Providence, and that on practice teaching by President W. J. Milne of Albany. Other discussions are by the editor-in-chief and Principal Owen of Saco, Me.

Book reviews are contributed by Professors McLaughlin and Cameron of Yale, Oren Root of Hamilton, Gill of the Smithsonian Institution, and others.

The Review publishes unusually attractive announcements for the February and March issues.

Prof. George E. Miller, the well known barber, is on the briny sea, headed for Fatherland. He should have the pleasantest kind of a visit.

It was a very kind and thoughtful act in the friends of Alderman Jewett, recognizing his long illness, to make him a Christmas present of a well filled purse. Three hundred and fifty dollars is a tidy little sum to help tide over the shallow places.

William Langlois is home from Philadelphia for the Holidays. He is studying medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, and is a member of the foot ball team. He played the same while at the High School.

Miss Ruth M. Pettit, W. H. S. '91 and now a Freshman in Boston University is at home for the Holidays.

Dr. Henry T. Cheever has returned from his trip to Washington where he spoke at the presentation to Howard University of the bust and library of his brother, the distinguished clergyman, Dr. George B. Cheever.

Dr. Wm. V. W. Davis has been quite ill this week. It was, of course, la grippe which made the trouble.

Dr. S. B. Woodward gave a card party to about fifty of his friends, last Saturday evening, at his home, 58 Pearl Street.

The Republican City Committee has reorganized and re-elected Samuel E. Winslow, chairman. This means business for the presidential year.

Mr. Salmon Putnam of Holden, father of Messrs. Otis E. and Samuel H. Putnam of this city enjoyed his 91st birthday Tuesday. An injury received several weeks since, confines him to his bed, but his mind is as clear as ever.

Hon. W. W. Rice, a graduate of Bowdoin College, will preside at the next Boston meeting of the Alumni. Jan. 13.

"Our Drummer Boy."

[Suggested by the Play.]

A ball in the battle's awful roar,
And among the dying and dead,
Lay our "Drummer Boy" in the foremost rank,
While the golden curls on his head,
Were matted now as the oozing blood
Marked the track of a rifle ball,
And so "Li, the John" answered proudly "here"
Who we heard the Sergeant's call.

"Say Bill," said a gray-haired hatterman,
As he leaned on his powder-stained cheek,
"There's many a home that our shot has wrecked,
Since the rising of the sun,
And there's many a heart that our guns have lulled
To sleep on war's gory bed,
What's that you say? 'Little Drummer John,'
In the foremost line, lies dead?"

Dead! dead! and the tears from his great honest eyes,
Coursed down on his powder-stained cheek,
"Why that drum saved the day, six months ago,
When we fought at Peach Tree Creek
And along the line at Mission Ridge,
And on Sherman's March to the Sea,
Our 'Drummer Boy' as he marched in the van,
Was a wonderful sight to see."

"Dead on the field; what'll 'Uncle Bill' say!
For he loved that Drummer Boy,
And many a time I've seen his grave eyes,
Light up with both pride and joy,
As he watched him beat with steady hand,
Gay cheering notes from his drum,
And pictured a pair of shoulder straps,
For him in the days to come."

"Dear Little Johnnie, so kith or kin,
But the child of our whole brigade,
There's many an eye that'll fill with tears,
When his form 'neath the earth is laid,
Perhaps, old mate, in a fairer land,
He'll wait for me and you,
And the first thing we hear when we cross the line,
'Till be his drum's 'tattoo.'"

Mrs. Thomas Bemis and son are spending the Holidays with her parents in Boston.

Mrs. Samuel Bemis has had a day off, spending it in Ashland with relatives.

Mrs. Alvah Metcalf of Ashland, spent several days at 5 Dix Street at Christmas time.

Mrs. L. M. Lovel had as guests on Christmas day Mrs. Pelton and daughter Bessie. Miss Bessie is home from Oberlin College for the Holidays.

FANCY WORK.

Pamphlet Cover.

Cut a piece of thin paste-board large enough to fit over and extend a little over the sides of the magazine you wish to cover; then cover the paste-board with gray linen on each side turning the edges under neatly, then overhand them together, concealing the stitches as much as possible. When done, fold in the shape of the book you wished covered, then cut two pieces of flexible card-board each of the correct size to fit on the ends and extend part way up towards the center of the cover.

These are to be covered the same as the large piece and sew them to it at the ends so that the edges of the magazine will slip into them easily. Tie a narrow bright ribbon through the center of the book cover making a bow with long ends to serve as book marks. This cover can be easily transferred from one book to another, thus each new magazine can be protected from finger marks and kept in nice order.

The Second Parish.

The Buildings.

January 1st, 1792, the edifice for the church to which the Rev. Aaron Bancroft ministered was dedicated. Up to that time, meetings had been held in the Court House which was afterwards moved to Trumbull Square and was, of an article in a paper, but to find the edifice still standing, after the lapse of a hundred years, makes reference to it almost a necessity. The settlement of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft was not effected without much trouble and many sacrifices. For several years, a third of his salary was given up that the building might be paid for. There were affairs of state as well as of religion to be considered in this

From the tower, since torn down, a bell called the faithful to worship and beneath it a town clock, presented by Isaiah Thomas, gave time for "Ye Northerners." Here Dr. Bancroft's associate pastor, Rev. Alonzo Hill, was ordained in March, 1827.

But a new and larger edifice was necessary and such was built on Court Hill, and the old building became a public house. As such, it for many years, the home of the Trumbull family. In that ter-centennial year of America's discovery, New Year's day came on Sunday and the good people of the parish assembled in their new church, to us known for many years as the Summer Street School House, and listened to a dedication sermon by the Rev. Zabdiel Adams of Lunenburg.

This subject is broad enough to merit a book, to say nothing of the prescribed limits new venture, a story too long and involved for discussion here. The structure, old as we know it, in its youthful days conformed to the prevailing idea of church architecture and made a good gathering place for the Thomases, Lincolns, Bangses, Allens and Paines of those remote times. In their square pews they listened to the sermons of their chosen pastor, though they did have to go into something akin to rebellion to attain this privilege.

remained till 1847, when the town purchased it and transformed it into a school house, for which purpose it was used till the school year of 1890 when it took a step down and became a store house for school odds and ends. "To what base uses are we come," but the old yellow sided structure is worthy a visit from all who love the ancient. It is on the east side of Summer Street, just south of Lincoln Square.

Then came the third edifice, dedicated August 29, 1829. To it were removed the clock and bell from the old church and from this building in 1839, the first pastor, the beloved Bancroft was buried. In 1849, Aug. 24th, it was swept away by fire, very little being saved from the ruins. But measures were taken immediately for rebuilding and in 1851, March 26, the First Unitarian Church, as the Worcester of today knows it, was dedicated. On its slightly pedestal, it is one of the most noteworthy buildings in the city. Its spire is a gem of architecture, and one can fancy it looking over the places of trade and manufacture, over streets and railroads, to its humbler predecessor on Summer Street and wishing that centennarian a Happy New Year, say a Happy New Century. But inexorable progress, long ere the next century has ended, will have compelled the destruction of the veteran.

A. Bancroft. —

There will be a Second Parish and an edifice but the scene of Bancroft's long years of service will have disappeared.

The Pastors.

Only four settled ministers in more than a hundred years! Few parishes, even in New England, with its long settlements, can excel this record. It was February, 1st, 1736, that the Rev. Aaron Bancroft was ordained to his pastorate which did not terminate till his death, August, 29, 1839. How many people have visited his old home, still standing on Salisbury Street, the birthplace of his famous son, the historian? What a benignant face his picture presents and what wonder that he drew to his side so much of the culture and wisdom of the Worcester of his day.

Twelve years before his death, or in 1827, the Rev. Alonzo Hill became his colleague and this pastorate, thus begun, lasted till the death of Dr. Hill in 1871, February 1st. Before the latter's death, or in 1869, February 10, he too was given an associate in the person of Rev. Edward H. Hall, who remained in Worcester till 1883, leaving the church in this city to become the pastor of the Unitarian Church in Cambridge.

Then in 1885, came the Rev. Austin S. Garver, who is still in care of the parish. He is a native of Pennsylvania and was educated at Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, and at the Andover Theological Seminary. He came to this city from Hopedale. His three predecessors were graduates of Harvard College.

There is not wanting material to make a connected story of these hundred years. Dr.'s Bancroft, Hill and Hall, all preached historical discourses which told graphically the re-

Retrospect.

1799—1891.

Living link of Past and Present, chain that bindeth
Then and Now

Bringing years with days remembered, say what phantoms we ye pass

Looking backward, calm, serenely as from some high mountain's brow
Down the rugged pathway travelled in the souls' inverted glass

How when throes of change were shaking to their deep foundation stone

Ancient wrongs and institutions, Europe's foul corruption heap

And mankind was being sifted through the hands of the Unknown

For the planting of a harvest where Humanity shall reap.

When mad Freedom from her dungeons broke the strong blood-rusted bars,

Girt a sword about her body, bore aloft a torch of fire,
In whose red and fierce reflection pallid swam the reeling stars

And the blood of slaughtered Tyrants streamed around the funeral pyre.

Till, embodied from the vapor of the Headsman's reeking block,

Rose stupendous, overshadowing with his bulk the cow-er'd earth,

That colossus Bonaparte who, secure amid the shock, Strangled in his steel-gloved fingers the Republic on his birth.

Ah! those days seem farther distant than a single life-time's span:

Not remoter to us children are the olden time Crusades,
For the world for us was builded when our petty life began.

Those who lived and died before us are less real than ghostly shades.

It is only when we listen to the tales of one who saw
With the eyes now dim and faded all the wonders that have been,

That we realize there was surely such a hero—such a war.

And those shadowy apparitions haunting history were men.

Years are but the stunted measure of the Present that we hold,

For the Past is never reckoned by its cycles save in scrolls;

Empty lies the barren blankness of chronologies unrolled

Time is but the ordained sentence of our clay-imprisoned souls.

One thing links us to what has been You that stay awhile to rest

Like a tired Palmer leaning on his staff beside the way,
When the sun is sinking slowly down into the rosy
West

And the first low star lights dimly in his couch the weary day.

As a sheaf of wheat left standing when the harvesters pass by,

In the field of barren stubble all alone upon the plain,
Drops its hoarded seed around it, sees beneath the Autumn sky

The rich increase of its sowing in strong spears of growing grain

Stay among till thy seedlings, though the reapers sickle be

Year by year the sheaves shall garner, bear a harvest for mankind!

Stay thou still though fair fruition, wait the One who comes to glean,

Taking all the good he findeth, leaving weeds and tares behind

cord of their pastorates. At our side, as we write, are Dr. Hill's sermon on the death of his venerable colleague, his sermon when he had been twenty-five years minister and also the exercises, when he had been forty-two years in service. The cuts that LIGHT is able to present this week were prepared for the printed account of that occasion. Then here is the sermon of Dr. Bancroft on the Sunday following Dr. Hill's ordination. Lincoln's History of Worcester has many pages of interesting matter pertaining to the Second Parish. Caleb Wall's "Reminiscences of Worcester" abounds in First Unitarian facts, while Smalley's Worcester Pulpit and Stevens' Worcester Churches give detailed accounts of the edifices, pastors and people.

The office of LIGHT has been made more pleasant, recently, by calls from college boys and girls, home on vacation. There were E. H. Warren from Harvard, George Burrage from Cornell, Florence Syvret from Mt. Holyoke and others.

Alumni Association of the College of the Holy Cross.

My Dear Sir:—

The Alumni Association of the College of the Holy Cross will hold their annual reunion, at the Parker House, Boston, Thursday evening, January 14, 1892, at 8 o'clock sharp. Reception at 7.30.

You are invited to attend. It is an occasion to meet the old boys and recall the days at Holy Cross. Yours fraternally,

THOMAS J. CONATY
President.

Worcester, Jan. 1, 1892.

The Summer Club.

Nothing indicates the character of a school more than the regard in which it is held by its graduates. The young men who gathered at the Bay State House last Monday night to talk over High School days as lived in their Summer Club found much to make an evening pass "Smooth and quick." Of course their reminiscent words could not claim the length of days that have inspired Dr. Holmes to poetic flights, but the time was when he was no further from Phillips Andover than are these young men from their school rooms.

Charles C. Milton, the secretary and treasurer was kept away by illness and in his absence, the meeting was called to order by Henry J. Kettell. Others were detained by the same cause. Necessary absence was explained by letters from Louie E. Ware, Sumner A. Kinsley, Ernest H. Wood, John M. Goodell and secretary C. C. Milton. A constitution for future guidance was adopted and officers elected, as follows, for the ensuing year: Secretary and treasurer, Henry W. Doe, '88; executive committee, Charles M. Thayer, '85, Frank B. Hall, '89, Henry Y. Simpson, Jr., '83, Chandler Bullock, '89, and Henry P. Nye, '89. Besides the officers named there were present, Frank B. Hall '83, toastmaster and chairman of the evening; Harry H. Hill '92, president of the Summer Club and guest of the association; Charles M. Harrington '85, Walter P. Hall '85, Harry H. Chamberlin, Jr., '91, William N. Stark '90, Willard B. Walworth '87, Harrison P. Eddy '87, Henry N. Smith '92, Fred M. Knowlton '94, William C. Howe '90, William P. Goodwin '92, Edward Mellis '91, Alba H. Warren '91, William C. Mellish, '90, Herbert P. Linnell '91, Lawrence W. Tracy '90, Edward H. Warren '91, E. Walter Smith '93, and Harry L. Dadman '87.

After a brown's justice to one of landlords Douglas & Brown's excellent dinners, the rem. niscient order began. Mr. Hall as toastmaster was in excellent form, while eloquent and witty responses were made by Messrs. Walter P. Hall, Charles M. Thayer, Harry Hill, Edward H. Warren, Harrison P. Eddy, Charles M. Harrington and others. Not the least amusing incident of the evening was the reading of a telegram, genuine or otherwise, from Arthur C. Smith. The boys hope for less of the grip t he next time they essay to meet.

At the twelfth annual meeting of the Maine Pedagogical Society in Portland, now in session, A. W. Edson, of this city, Agent of the State Board of Education, was down for a lecture Thursday night on "Our Public School System; How to Improve it."

The Polytechnic Institute has news that Harry D. Yates of Portsmouth, N. H., died suddenly Dec. 28. He expected to return to the Institute, immediately after the mid-year examinations and to graduate in 1893.

"The Greatest Need of College Girls" is the subject of an important article to appear in the Atlantic Monthly for January. It is by Annie Payson Call, author of the excellent little book Power Through Repose.

The University of Chicago has purchased the library collected by S. Calvary & Co., of Berlin, containing 280,000 volumes and 120,000 pamphlets, beside other valuable books which are yet to be supplied. The library contains 200 manuscripts, among which are three original letters of Raphael; 1,600 hundred volumes in paleography; 25,000 volumes of periodicals; 65,000 volumes of Greek and Roman archeological works; 65,000 volumes of Greek and Latin classics; 1,000 volumes of illustrated works on art; 5,000 volumes in natural history. The actual cost to the owner was nearly $125,000.

Marriage A Misdemeanor.

They have some funny ways "Out West." In Minneapolis, for instance, no married woman can be a teacher in the public schools. The Spectator of that city thus comments on a recent event. "The Board of Education made another startling discovery this week. Newspaper publication of the marriages at Hudson, Wis., disclosed the awful fact that for a month or more a married woman has been masquerading as a lawful public school teacher, under the innocent garb of single-blessedness. Though she was still giving entire satisfaction, as she had been for many years, as a teacher, the high moral judgment of the school board refused to allow any danger of corrupting influence by a married woman. The offending teacher was consequently discharged on short notice, not being giving even a day of grace. But for this prompt action, the contaminating influence of matrimony might have spread among the school ma'ams and have caused a disastrous epidemic. The growing evil of marriage must be nipped in the bud, and Minneapolis' board of education will stand at the front of this great reform movement."

Manual Training.

"A single special faculty, in a mind otherwise dull, detected and trained may make all the difference between a useful and a useless life, a happy and a miserable one," says President Eliot. Teachers who are adapted for and interested in their work quickly discover that no two of their pupils are alike, and many a child is usefully developed because the teacher comprehends him, takes a liking to him, or is peculiarly adapted to teach him and does teach him in such a manner as to bring out his individual trait. It is that fact carried out that makes the kindergarten, chemical laboratory, the manual training schools and the technical schools so successful towards supplying the men who are planning and doing the work of the world. The laboratory and manual training break up routine work, give the brighter boys more to do and discover the bent of mind of the duller boys. Seeing, feeling and smelling for oneself brightens the wit and fixes a lesson that exercise of memory alone will let slip before an opportunity given to put it into practice. Such a system of education is coming into favor. We call it manual or industrial training.—Fitchburg Mail.

A British Skull.

The Society of Antiquary has recently parted with a relic that has been for some time in its Museum. This is the skull of one of the British soldiers killed at the Old North Bridge, Concord.

The first blood of the Revolution was shed at Concord, April 19, 1775 and the two red-coats slain were buried in a single grave near where they fell. After sixty-five and more years, the graves were opened and the skulls removed. One of them was so far decayed as to fall to pieces. The upper part of the other was well preserved and the path of the bullet plainly indicated. The bone on one side was clean cut while on the other side, where the bullet passed out after going through the brain, the bone was shattered. This skull was owned for a long time by a phrenologist of Worcester County, Walton Felch, and at his death it came into the hands of Daniel Seagrave who held it till it was purchased and placed in the Museum of the Society of Antiquity. Here it has been till recently an object of interest to visitors.

There are in Concord and vicinity a number of Englishmen, who have at each recurrence of the Battle of Concord, decorated the graves of their countrymen near his toric bridge. A short time ago Senator Hoar was approached by citizens of Concord with the request that this skull in Worcester be returned and laid in the grave with the ashes of the body to which it belonged. After consulting with the officers of the society, and the one from whom it was obtained, the skull has been returned to its former resting place, and its dust will soon be mingled with the body of which it once formed a part.

It is a matter of comment that the selectmen of Concord should have allowed such an interesting relic to leave its borders. If it was to be exhibited to the curious, that town should have been the place. But now after nearly fifty years, head and body are together in the grave to which they were consigned on that memorable day when the red-coats were obliged to beat a hasty retreat to Boston.

Worcester has lost, but justice demanded the surrender.

Worcester has a Birthday this Year.

As Worcester was incorporated a city February 29, 1848, it has a birthday only once in four years, that is every leap year. Consequently the city will have a birthday this year. But, looking ahead a little, suppose that in 1898 the city desires to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary, on what day will the celebration take place, February 28 or March 1?

Two Quaker Girls.

A Reminiscence of Philadelphia.

"I say the tale as it was told to me."

BY JACK SHEPHERD.

[Concluded from last week.]

They were a busy, happy party. Behind a large clothes-horse, on which a blanket was thrown to screen them from the children, three girls were dressing dolls for Christmas. These were gifts for the Wagner's and two other families. Three jointed dolls were to be dressed in pink tarleton, black velvet and yellow and light blue satin.

Quaker girls were not allowed to wear these brilliant tints. Drabs and browns of many shades were the only colors they were accustomed to; so it was a new and delightful experience for them to handle these rainbow-hued materials. No extravagant expressions, however, escaped them; such as one hears frequently at the present day, "Perfectly lovely!" "Just elegant!" "Awfully pretty!" But a subdued "Isn't that handsome?" or "won't this doll look pretty in this velvet bodice and blue satin skirt?" or "Mercy and Harriet, see how well this orange and black look for my doll," was the extent of their appreciation, though it was very genuine.

One of them was stuffing a rag baby, a Captain Jack, and their mirth was excited to a high pitch by their criticisms uttered in suppressed whispers, for this was to be Teddy's doll.

"Oh, he looks as if he had a bad toothache, with that one cheek so big," said Mercy, "and his arms are longer than his legs," whispered another. Then a suppressed giggle would be heard and Emily and Gretchen would smile in great enjoyment of these mysteries, so near to them, yet to remain unsolved until the delightful Christmas time.

"There is some one knocking, girls, hush," said Ellen. "It must be that Mrs. Smith come to borrow your mother's clothes line, Gretchen, she comes every Friday and will wear it out."

"But mother always lends it to her," said Gretchen timidly, as she went slowly to the door.

"Wait, Gretchen," said Susan. "Girls, let us give it to her and buy Mrs. Wagner a new one."

"You can't do it!" said voices behind the screen, "You can't spend any money, Susan, if you are treasurer, without it is moved and seconded and approved by most of us," said Ellen.

"Well," said Susan, "I know that. I move, who seconds?"

"I," said Ellen and they all cried "Agreed, it is a vote," and Gretchen opened the door just as another timid knock came. A meek, pale-faced woman asked "if she could borrow the clothes-line?"

"Here it is," said Gretchen, "and you need not bring it back."

"What did you say?" said the woman in surprised tones.

"You can keep it," said Gretchen, pleasantly, "for mother is to have a new one."

"Oh, thank you," said the woman, whose voice expressed both chagrin and gratitude, at the unexpected gift of what she had borrowed so often that it seemed as much her own as Mrs. Wagner's.

At twilight they put up their sewing and before starting for home had Emil play on the violin. And what a rare treat this was for these Quaker girls, who were forbidden music in their homes and places of worship.

So the days passed till the night before Christmas. As yet nothing more had been heard of Mr. Wagner, though the Friends had done all they could to discover his whereabouts.

A gloom hung over the Wagner family that even the kindness of their warm-hearted friends could not dissipate. During the three months that had passed since his father's absence, Emil had expressed the belief that his father was safe and would soon return to them. But the mother had lost all hope. The severity of the weather and the fact that her husband had not been traced by the slightest clue made her despair. Still there was so much to be thankful for she would not depress the children by showing her grief. Kind friends had been raised up to provide abundantly for all their wants and this Christmas Eve the children were looking forward to a happy time.

Susan told Teddy this afternoon, to hang his stockings by the chimney and go to bed early or Santa Claus would not fill it. Emil, who was too mature to believe in the delightful legend of Christmas Eve, still kept silence and tried to delude even himself into the belief in St. Nicholas and the charming presents he prepared. Gretchen had finished just before dark, a pair of fine, blue, woollen stockings for her mother, and after supper she hung them both beside Teddy's and Emil's, putting on one her own name and on the other her mother's. Then a thought came to her of the dear, absent father and she quickly brought another stocking and while the tears streamed down her cheeks, she without a word pinned the name father on it. Her mother came in at this moment from the bedroom where Emil and Teddy were trying in vain to shut their eyes and sleep. She glanced at the five stockings hanging by the fire-place and throwing her apron over her head sat down on a chair to have a good cry. Gretchen came over and knelt by her, saying, "Don't cry!" at the same time putting her head in her mother's lap she sobbed as if her heart would break.

Her mother stroked her shining braids and said, "Dear child, we know God is good, let us still hope." As she spoke, a knock was heard on the door and with a start they both arose. Gretchen opened the door and Susan and Ellen, rosy and beaming with happiness, came in with their arms full of bundles.

"Waiting up for us?" said Susan, "Here Gretchen," and whispering to her for a few minutes she pushed her away good naturedly as she gave her a bundle, with "good-night, to bed Gretchen, we will do the rest."

She said "good-night," and hurried off with the package, which was a gift for her mother to be given her in the morning.

From her chamber above, she could hear their merry voices and the rustling of paper bags, a delicious odor of fresh candy, nuts and good things seemed to fill the atmosphere and looking from her little window she saw an ideal Christmas Eve. The snow lay pure and white on the roofs and chimneys of the city and over all the full moon shed its beautiful light making it seem like a new day. But excitement and grief had wearied the child and before long she was dreaming of a merry Christmas in which her father came among them as of old and they were all happy.

The girls who formed the Sewing Club had no Christmas in their own homes, for the Society of Friends did not make a festival of the birthday of our Savior.

The next morning Susan and Ellen went early to Mrs. Wagner's to see how they enjoyed Christmas.

Gretchen opened the door dressed in a blue merino made by the girls. The stockings were still hanging by the chimney about half emptied of their contents. Teddy ran to them shouting "Merry Christmas," a red candy shepherdess in one hand and his Captain Jack in the other.

Emil sat by the window dreamily playing on his father's violin, recalling many airs played by him. His mother said he was much pleased with his presents, a sled and new mittens, but he had not yet been out to coast, though the boys had often called him. He seemed determined to watch by the window, as if waiting for something to happen. Mrs. Wagner wore her Christmas gift, a pretty, woollen, plaid dress made by the girls, she was rosy and her curly hair brushed and glossy, a white linen collar and cuffs made her dress very becoming and the girls told Gretchen her mother was "very handsome."

There was a savory smell of chicken roasting and every thing was bright and clean, from the little dresser, with its white shelves filled with shining china and the handsome red waiters brought over from Germany, to the spotless floor and the small table, covered with a snowy cloth and set ready for their Christmas dinner.

Gretchen was telling the girls how much she liked her new doll, with its dress of blue satin and yellow slippers, when a knock on the door attracted them and Emil pale, and trembling, said as he pushed past them to open the door, "Why, there's father looking in the window!"

In a moment Mr. Wagner was in the room and embracing his wife and children. In the joy of that moment they forgot about his insanity and he appeared well and sane.

After being introduced to Susan and Ellen and told of their goodness to his family, while in trouble, he asked them to remain while he related the strange events of the past few months.

In the acute mania that showed itself after his fall and which the physician said was brought on by his efforts to keep on working, when his brain needed perfect rest, he was possessed by a desire to go to sea. He had accomplished this with the cunning one so often finds in an insane person and had been hired as one of the crew on a vessel bound for Hamburg.

The entire rest of mind and the sea voyage had completely restored him. On his arrival at Hamburg, he would have returned immediately to America, but he could find no vessel ready to sail for some days and as he was within eighty miles of his old home, where his father had lived, he hastened on through Germany, but only to find his grave. The news of his death had just been sent to him as his father had been dead but a few days. His neat, thrifty little home with a small piece of ground and some money had been left to him by his father. His sorrow at the loss of his only parent was deep but uppermost on his heart lay the burden of anxiety for his dear ones so far away and so helpless. He could now take passage in a vessel sailing homeward and so had come back to them on Christmas day. "The best gift of all," said Gretchen as she laid her head on his shoulder, while the little mother sat by smiling through tears of joy. Teddy climbed papa's knee once more and Emil sat on the floor at his feet, by turns gazing in his face and then drawing soft, plaintive strains of music from the violin he still held.

"Do let Susan and Ellen hear some of the dear old music father," said Emil. So while Mrs. Wagner placed the Christmas dinner on the table, he played the beautiful Christmas hymn, "See amid the Winter's snow," then such music as Susan and Ellen never heard before.

The dinner was soon smoking on the table and the girls rose to say good-bye and wish them all a "Happy Christmas," which was indeed possible now.

We have only to tell in conclusion, that the Wagners, happy and prosperous, left soon for their home in Germany, but though so widely separated from their kind friends, the young Quaker girls and that Christmas day was enshrined in their hearts forever, while the girls themselves had laid the foundation of a noble womanhood and had discovered the secret of the present happiness era can give.

Worcester, December, 1891.

He Was Cane.

A recent Kansas City Journal contains an account of the presentation of an elegant gold headed cane to Captain E. W. Gould of St. Louis, the oldest river captain in the West. It was at the time of meeting in Kansas City of a convention to consider the improvement of Missouri navigation, and the Captain was present as a St. Louis delegate and the cane was given on his birthday, Dec. 15.

Captain Gould is the oldest river captain in the West. He was born in Westborough, Worcester county, Mass., in 1811 and learned the trade of a carriage painter. At the age of 24 he removed to St. Louis and did the first carriage painting done in that town. In those days he "boarded around," as it might be called. There were only two or three shops in the town, and a good carriage painter was such a rarity that he was able to effect an arrangement whereby he worked first for one and then for the other.

Instead of taking to the woods, as many do, the captain took to the water and before he painted any phenomenal number of carriages he was captain of one of the first boats that ever steamed up and down the great father of waters. He has captained boats on the Mississippi, Missouri and Illinois rivers, and no river man between St. Paul and New Orleans is better known than he. Of course, he has retired from active service and of late years he has rested on his paddles, as it were, and lived in honored and well earned ease."

James Whitcomb Riley.

He is sometimes called "The Hoosier Poet" although it does not seem fair to so localize him, for his sympathies are world wide. He is not only enjoyed by the "average man" but, I am told that at the banquet given in his honor by Henry Irving in London those present laughed and cried by turns as he read to them and would not say "hold, enough." We find in his writings "those simplest and broadest traits, of thought and emotion alike, which make the brotherhood of the human race," and a noble simplicity which makes them mean something to all men." With him, no human life is commonplace—and he touches us upon the better side of our nature.

"The Lord loves common people, that is the reason. He made so many of them"—it is said Riley is their poet, but not for them alone does he write. No one rises above the thought of his poem "Tiny Tim" which poem he says is one of his favorites, part of which I quote:

"God bless us every one" prayed Tiny Tim,
Crippled and dwarfed of body, yet so tall of soul,
We 'tiptoe earth to look on him,
High towering over all.

"And thus he prayed 'God bless us every one'
Enfolding all the creeds within the span
Of his childhood; and so desisting none,
Was nearer saint than man."

It is natural to wish to know something of the personal history of the writers we like. His boyhood was spent at Greenfield, Ind., where he was born about fifty years ago. His father, a lawyer of large practice, wished to make a lawyer of him but the Muses said "No." He found that "Blackstone didn't rhyme." I suspect that the following refers to his school days:

"In the long, lazy days,
When the hum-drum of school made so many runaways,
How pleasant was the journey down the old dusty lane,
Where the tracks of our bare-feet were all printed so plain,
You could tell by the dent of the heel and the sole,
There was lots of fun on hand at the old swimming hole."

"Nature gave him at his birth what most he values" His writings show his keen perception of the beauties of nature. That he might be able to write for all men it was necessary that he should see somewhat of the "seamy side of life"—and in youth he tried his hand at several kinds of work, now a painter and then working on a newspaper as so many bright Americans have done. But whatever he did seems to have been well done, for speaking of this period of his life he says "one of Riley's hand-painted picket fences was a rapture to the most exacting eye." He early wrote for the newspapers and while connected with the "Kokomo Dispatch, he perpetrated a "Poe poem fraud" so called. This poem "Leonaine" was written in Poe's style and excited considerable comment at the time, but the fact that it was an imitation made to deceive reviewers, was soon known and, alas for the young poet, it cost him his job. The facts regarding this poem seem now to be forgotten by some for, in an article on Edgar Allen Poe, in the American "Catholic Quarterly Review" for October, 1891, this poem is republished and of it they say "This beautiful poem is not to be found in any of the editions of Poe's works and our opinion is that no edition should claim completeness without it." He afterwards wrote for the Indianapolis Journal with which well edited paper, I believe he is still connected.

Personally he is a very pleasant man to meet, with a bright eye and sunny smile. "Clean shaven as a priest." He is not in any sense an imitator, believing that to be at your best, you must be yourself, be natural, doing your work in your own way. He says he appears at his best in his writings, at any rate that "he tries to." One claim of his writings is that we feel he is sincere, and we trust him. We like to follow his thought, and can say in his words:

"We follow ever on and on,
We know the ways thy feet have gone,
Of roses richer in perfume,
And birds of every blooming tree
Sing sweeter as we follow thee."

His first book was "The Swimm'ng Hole and other poems."

In 1886 came "The Boss Girl and other stories."

1887—"Afterwhiles."
1888—"Pipes O'Pan."
1890—"Rhymes of Childhood."
1891—"Neighborly Poems."

His poem "That Old Sweetheart of mine," has been put in beautiful form and makes a book, creditable alike to poet, artist and to his publishers, the Bowen Merrill Co., Indianapolis. One might think from this poem he was a married man, but he is not. His last book is "The Flying Islands of the Night." Of this Dr. Ridpath says, "As a dramatic poem nothing since the publication of 'The Midsummer Nights Dream' has risen to a higher level of creative art."

Please note these gems:

"Ere day was dremt, I saw her face
Lift from some starry hiding place,
Where ourtold moon was kneeling while
She lit its features with her smile"

"Cipher out the problem of blind stars
That ever still do safely grope their way
Among the thronging constellations."

"Who will name us what the seas
Have sung on for centuries?
For the Song's sake—even so Sieg. O Seas; and breezes blow!"

Readers of his earlier writings need no urging to read all that he has written, and if there are any not familiar with his works, they have only to begin to read to find their "appetite grow by what it feeds on" and at the end will quote his own words and say:

"We follow thee forever on Through darkest night and dimmest dawn,
Through storm and calm, through shower and shiee Hear thou our voices answering thine."

CHARLES W. GRAY.

Another of those good deeds for which Worcester is noted and which help along the theory of the brotherhood of man was the giving to Joseph H. Mansfield, last week, a purse of above one hundred dollars by those who have known him as an obliging conductor on the street railroad. He was seriously injured while in the performance of his duties several weeks since.

Thomas P. Smith, once a High School boy and later of Holy Cross College, received Minor Orders at St. Sulpice, Paris, Dec. 19.

South End News.

The members of the Cavendish Club met with Mrs. Helen M. Davis last Monday evening at 9 Hawthorne Street. Sixteen members were present and during an intermission refreshments were served. The gentleman's first prize, a silver mounted bottle, was won by Mr. C. F. Stevens, and the lady's prize, a jewel casket, was won by the hostess. The club numbers among its players some of the finest in the city.

Mr. Harry D. Temple, who has been confined to the house, is once more able to be out. His many friends at the W. P. I. will wish him a speedy recovery.

The Brightside, Mr. Buck's new block on King Street, is fast being filled. Among the families who have recently moved in are Messrs. L. E. Livermore, S. E. Greene, F. L. Wright and Mr. Samuel H. Colton.

Miss May L. Goulding and Miss Mabel Norcross, students at Miss Mead's school Norwalk, Conn., are at home for the Holidays.

The Worcester County Philatelic Association held its regular bi-monthly meeting with Mr. W. L. Brown, 3 Norwood Street, Monday evening. The meeting was largely attended and much interest was shown.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. M. Woodward gave a domino whist party to their friends Thursday evening. Play was indulged in until one o'clock of the new year, when a bountiful feast was served.

Unfortunately the firm of Joslyn & Brown, grocers at 830 Main Street, has become insolvent and Wednesday a keeper was put in charge.

The engagement is announced of Mr. Thomas B. Hamilton, the local tenor, and Miss Bertha Bigelow, W. H. S., '91.

The Evans, Mr. H. H. Houghton's new apartment block, corner of Main and Hammond Streets, is nearly ready for occupancy.

Mr. Geo. B. Buckingham has recently completed the erection of a stable adjoining his residence, No. 20 King Street. The edifice is modern in every respect and a noble addition to a handsome estate.

Mr. E. S. Jones, for many years with White & Conant, has opened a hardware store at 822 Main Street. It is a great accommodation to the residents at the South End and will undoubtedly receive their support. All the Boston and New York papers, together with LIGHT, are on sale at this store.

A committee from the Church of Christ is negotiating for the purchase of the Fay estate on Allen Street, where they intend to erect a vestry.

Mrs. Emeline B. Brown.

Death has removed one of the energetic workers of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Brown was the superintendent of Sabbath observance and her home was at 29 Benefit Street, where she died last week Friday. She was born in Sutton in 1823. She and her family have long been devoted workers in the Temperance cause. Her funeral, last Monday, was attended by a large delegation of her associates in the Temperance Union.

Good to Eat.

Orange Snow.—Orange snow is delicious when prepared after the following method: An ounce of isinglass is dissolved in a pint of boiling water. It is then to be strained and allowed to stand until it is nearly cold. Now mix with it the juice of six or seven oranges and one lemon. Add the whites of three eggs and sugar to taste. Whisk the whole together until it looks white and like a sponge. Put it into a mold and turn it out on the day following.

Everton Toffee.

Half a pound of golden syrup, half a pound of Demerara sugar, lemon juice to taste, and from five to six ounces of butter are required. Mix carefully the sugar and syrup, and then add the butter in little bits, stirring slowly till it is all thoroughly mixed. Then cease stirring or the toffee will be "sugar," let it boil gently till a tiny bit thrown into cold water sets. If everything is satisfactory it will be beautifully crisp, and the whole should then be poured into a tin previously well rubbed with sweet oil or butter. When it is half cold, mark it into squares.

Cream Sponge Cake.

Beat the yolks of six eggs until very light, add one cup powdered sugar and beat with the yolks, then, beat the whites of eight eggs to a stiff froth, add one half cup sugar, three tablespoonfuls of cream, the juice of one lemon, a little salt, mix one teaspoon of cream tartar in one cup of flour, mix, and beat all the ingredients well together, and the last thing stir in one half teaspoonful of aqua ammonia, line the baking pan with buttered paper, allowing the paper to extend over the top of the pan, to remove the cake without turning over.

Stewed Kidneys

Make a good dish, if rightly cooked. Fry a tablespoonful of chopped onion in two table spoonfuls of butter until brown, then add one of flour and stir it in the butter and onion until it is smooth and brown, then add the kidneys cut in small pieces, one pint water, season with salt and pepper. Let it stew ten minutes, then add a tablespoonful of catsup and a teaspoonful of best Worcestershire sauce. This is an excellent dish for breakfast.

Rice and Chicken Fricassee.

Cut up chicken in small pieces, dip each piece in beaten egg and then in rolled cracker crumbs. Season with salt and pepper, fry each piece in half butter and half lard. When brown add half cup hot water, cover tightly and cook slowly half an hour. Then take the chicken when done and keep hot. Then take a bowl of cooked rice and put it in the frying pan the chicken was cooked in; add to the rice one chopped tomato, let it get very hot, then pile it high in the centre of a platter and lay the chicken around it, garnish with olives.

Sugar Cookies.

Three eggs, one cup butter, two cups sugar, one half cup milk, three teaspoonfuls of cream tartar, two of soda, a pinch of salt, two teaspoonfuls of vanilla extract.

It's concealed,
but it's there—
ammonia in baking powder widely advertised as "absolutely pure;"
'tis easy to detect it;

Boil up a heaping spoonful of the powder in a spoonful of water, and smell the steam.

There's nothing to conceal in Cleveland's baking powder; the composition is stated on every label.

The ingredients are all so wholesome we are glad to have people know what they are.

Those Portraits.

Librarian Green's last contribution to the public's entertainment in the exhibition room of the new building, is well worth careful observation and study. Passing the landscapes which, though of a high order, we will assume are in place merely as settings for the portraits, we will note the faces so well known in Worcester. These are for the most part representations of people who walk our streets and are a part of the City's active, throbbing life. First we pause to glance at the semblance of the Hon. Joseph H. Walker. The artist has not given him a single accessory. Only his face and figure look forth from the canvas but they are wonderfully life like. His posture is a favorite one, standing erect with fingers of his right hand, thrust within his closely buttoned coat. It is the attitude he assumed when he talked protection to the Harvard boys in Sander's theater and routed the free trade advocate, William Lloyd Garrison. Our people have seen him stand thus scores of times and it is a good position by which to pass his appearance along to coming generations. His wife looks forth from the next frame and the artist has succeeded in making a picture that should win him applause any where. Of course, the Worcester world does not so readily recognize the face of the wife as it does that of the husband who has, so long, been an important element in all that pertains to the city, but it has no difficulty in seeing, a strong face most faithfully delineated.

Next, we pause before the portrait of W. do Lincoln and try to find in it the ancestral traits for which the family is noted. Long identified with the city, the surname might almost warrant calling us "Lincolnshire," nor is his first name wanting in local significance. The face is a pleasant one, possibly bearing a trace of the father's looks as shown in the Horticultural hall portrait. Very likely, not so many will linger before it as in front of Mr. Walker's or Mr. Davis's, those men being better known, still many will not hesitate to award Mr. Vinton unstinted praise for his depicting of Mr. Lincoln.

The Hon. Edward L. Davis next looks pleasantly at us, so naturally in fact that it would not surprise us if he should proffer his hand for a hearty shake or if his mouth should speak some sentiment sure to be for the good of Worcester. When, a hundred years hence, this picture is shown along with others at the exhibitions of such in those future days, of it, will be said, "This represents that Mayor of Worcester who gave the tower at the Lake, who donated a part of the Lake-side Park, who placed the picture of George Bancroft in the High School and who used his influence to retain the Common intact. He was thoroughly public spirited."

In the portrait of Stephen Salisbury, Mr. Vinton has introduced more accessories than in any other picture shown. We instinctively glance from Mr. Salisbury's face to his hat and gloves and then to the table by which he sits. Very likely the style of the hat may be of interest to hatlers in coming years, but just at present we are more interested in the sitters face. It is a triumph of artistic reproduction, so good that it needed no side lights to set it forth. This, too, is a semblance whose interest will not perish with the generation that produced it. The North End of Worcester in its Salisbury Laboratory and Hall, Institute Park, Art Gallery and Antiquarian Society will ever respect the name.

We will leave the exhibition with the face of General Devens in mind. There is in this picture, nothing to draw the eye from the man unless it be the roll of paper that he has carelessly taken in his hand; so we may look constantly at this countenance so full of energy strength and goodness. It is the face that all of us have known for years, and Worcester is happy that a semblance of the distinguished soldier, statesman, and jurist, belongs in Worcester by right. Mr. Vinton the artist and Mr. Green the librarian are entitled to Worcester's gratitude for several weeks of genuine pleasure.

BAPTIST.

PLEASANT STREET BAPTIST.—This week has been a sort of a jubilee week with the members of this church. It was just fifty years ago, Monday, that the church was organized and it was this anniversary which has been so auspiciously celebrated this week. The observance began Sunday morning with an anniversary sermon by the pastor, Rev. H. J. White, in which he related the story of the church's struggles and triumphs. Briefly, he said: In 1841 a number withdrew from the First Baptist Church and, December 28, organized a new church with 89 members. The first pastor was Rev. John J. Jennings and he remained until 1849. During the seven years 139 were added to the church by baptism and 24 by letter. Rev. Charles K. Colver was the next pastor, serving until 1854. During his pastorate 23 were added by baptism and 60 by letter. From 1854 to 1860, Dr. D. W. Faunce was the pastor and under his lead the church made very marked progress. After him came John Judson Tucker who stayed two years and increased the church membership by 23 additions. Rev. David Weston successfully worked for the church for the next ten years ending in 1872. During the three years' pastorate of Rev. I. R. Wheelock, which followed, 52 members were added and during Rev. S. L. Holman's pastorate, which extended to 1882 there were added to the church rolls 88 by baptism and 44 by letter. In 1875, at the beginning of his pastorate the membership was 423, the highest point ever reached. After Mr. Holman came Rev. H. F. Lane, who, finding the church in a very poor condition, worked so faithfully that at his departure in 1888 it was again in good working order. There were 98 additions to the church during his pastorate. In conclusion he spoke of his own pastorate of three years.

Tuesday evening the anniversary exercises were held in the new church on Ashland Street at the corner of Pleasant. The grip and the storm kept many away but yet it was a very large company which sat down at 6.30 to a bountiful supper served in the vestry by the ladies of the church. At 7.45 the exercises began in the auditorium with an organ prelude, followed by congregational singing, led by Rev. Guy F. Wheeler of the Quinsigamond Mission; responsive reading; invocation in Swedish by Rev. J. W. Hjerstrom, pastor of the First Swedish Church; anthem by the chorus; reading of Scripture by Rev. Joseph Ellison, the pastor of the Greendale Mission; prayer by Rev. J. J. Miller of the Lincoln Square Church; response by the quartet; and words of welcome by the pastor. In closing the Rev. Mr. White introduced Rev. H. F. Lane of Millis, Mass., who spoke "fraternal words" on behalf of the former pastors. He told of his recollections of the beginning of the church, when he was a student at the Academy, of attending the first meetings held in the east hall of the town hall and of hearing

Rev. John Jennings preach his first sermon. Rev. Mr. White then read letters from C. K. Colver of Chicago, D. W. Faunce of West Newton and I. R. Wheelock of Albany. Dr. Faunce spoke of himself as responding for two pastorate as he has recently married the widow of Rev. J. J. Tucker. Rev. G. G. Craft of the First Baptist Church spoke for "Our Mother Church." Mr. Craft said he wished to congratulate the church more on its noble graces of spirit than on its gain in numbers and possessions. He also congratulated the church on its line of successful pastors. Speaking for "Our Sister Churches," for Rev. C. H. Pendleton of the Main Street Church, who was unable to be present, he advised that the churches "pray for each other and not prey upon each other." Then a hymn, read by Rev. Hiram Conway, of the John Street Church was sung by the congregation after which Rev. Dr. B. D. Marshall read a history of the Baptist denomination in Worcester. He said that in 1795 James Wilson, a Baptist, came to Worcester and began to draw about him people of like faith. In 1812 Elder Bentley's services were secured and May 21, of that year the first baptism took place at a pond near where Crompton's mill now stands. Dr. Austin of the Old South Church was a vigorous opponent of the new church. Elder Goring succeeded Elder Bentley. He was afterwards very prominent in Baptist circles and was the founder of the Baptist Missionary Society. After him came Jonathan Aldrich and Samuel D. Swan. In 1835 a lot of land on Elm Street was purchased from Levi Lincoln and a building was erected, but soon after it was destroyed by an incendiary fire. In 1841 there were 146 members of the Baptist Church. He then gave an account of the organizations of the other Baptist churches and concluded with the following facts: During the past ten years about $150,000 have been expended by the Baptists in this city in building churches; the total membership of the Baptist churches of the city is 2196; there have been employed by the Baptist churches during the past ten years 39 pastors and 7 missionaries; where there were, fifty years ago, two persons in Worcester, there are now seven—where there were, fifty years ago, two Baptists in Worcester, there are now twelve.

Rev. D. H. Stoddard of the Dewey Street Church spoke on "An Outlook and Prophecy;" Rev. E. B. Haskell of the South Baptist Church spoke on "Contemporaneous Denominational Progress at Home" and "Abroad" for Rev. D. W. Hoyt of the Adams Square Church, who was unable to be present; the congregation sang a hymn read in French by Rev. Gideon Aubin of the French Mission and the pastor pronounced the benediction.

JOHN STREET.—The people of this church are still at work raising money to clear off the debt on their new church. One of the members, William Brown, succeeded in raising recently, by personal solicitation, $50. The contributors were Stephen Salisbury, Hon. Edward L. Davis, W. E. Rice and J. Edwin Smith.

METHODIST.

GRACE.—No better music than that, given, last Sunday night, under the direction of leader Hanson, was ever heard in the church. "The Chimes of Judea" was the name of the compilation, which included selections from many of the masters. There was not a halt nor flow in the program which assumed the character of a Sunday School concert. There were responsive readings by the school and superintendent and individual songs and recitations by pupils. Where all did so well, it is hardly fair to mention names, yet it must be said that Miss Flora Miner and Mrs. L. W. Briggs sang their parts finely.

UNIVERSALIST.

FIRST UNIVERSALIST.—There is to be special New Year's services at the First Universalist Church next Sunday morning and evening. The choir will be aided by an orchestra and the addresses will be appropriate to the New Year. The regular communion service is to be deferred one week on this account. Dr. Gunnison's engagement list for January is becoming extended. It includes Installation services at Cambridge and Lowell, sermon at the dedication of a church in Gloucester, sermon at Lynn, and a Lyceum lecture at Spencer.

The annual meeting of the First Church will take place next Friday evening.

CONGREGATIONAL.

SALEM STREET.—At the annual meeting of the parish, held Tuesday evening, H. G. Otis was re-elected treasurer; Lewis C. Muzzy, auditor; Henry Brannon, A. F. Gates and R. H. Chamberlain, prudential committee; C. F. Rice, D. C. Turner and D. F. Smith, music committee. The reports for 1891 were read and accepted. Gen. R. H. Chamberlain was moderator and William H. Bartlett, clerk.

The New Year's receptions of Park, Pilgrim, Old South and Piedmont churches, which were to have been held last evening were postponed on account of the large number of cases of illness.

ARMENIAN.—Yesterday afternoon a council of Congregational churches was held in Plymouth vestry to consider the advisability of organizing and recognizing an Armenian Congregational church. It took place too late for LIGHT to publish the result this week.

Household.

Insects on Plants.

There are only three kinds of insects that are really very troublesome to plants in the house, viz, the aphid or green fly, the red spider and the mealy bug. The first can be very easily destroyed by the use of tobacco in any form, either as liquid or smoke. The most convenient way is to wet the plant, then sprinkle snuff or tobacco dust over it. To kill the red spider, wash the leaves, then use a syringe filled with tobacco water. The mealy bug is easily killed with strong tobacco water.

D.

The Invalid's Attire.

To the invalid who has long been confined to the bed it will be a pleasant change to substitute for the ordinary white night dress, during the Summer, neatly fitting Mother Hubbard robes of delicate colored cotton goods, which should have as dainty and dressy an appearance as possible, and will be found universally more becoming than white. For Winter, use the dainty pointed flannels or outing cloths, which are so pretty and inexpensive. If collar and cuffs of harmonizing or contrasting shade be used, they will be all the prettier. These delicately-tinted or figured robes will also take away that undressed feeling, which often causes a feeling of embarrassment, even to those who have been invalids for years. The practical member of the family will also find that they will save not a little in the amount of laundering required.

CLARA S. EVERTS.

All grained or varnished wood-work should be cleaned with tea, made of medium strength and strained, after which it should be rubbed over with a small flannel cloth dipped occasionally in boiled linseed oil, and wiped thoroughly with a dry flannel cloth. Nothing is more convenient than a wooden skewer for cleaning out crevices and corners.

A very good remedy for cold on the lungs is a syrup made of the juice of onions and sugar; simmer some onions in a very little water, strain and add the sugar, or the sugar may be added at first.

A cup of hot water in which a teaspoonful of salt has been dissolved will relieve constipation if drank before eating every morning.

To make an excellent cold cream take one half pound of sweet almonds, one ounce of white rose perfume, a half ounce of spermaceti and a half pint of rose water. Beat all to a paste, add more almonds if not thick enough.

When suffering from overstrained and tired eyes, bathe them in hot water several times a day.

Well-ventilated bedrooms will prevent morning headaches and lassitude.

Apply linseed oil and turpentine in equal parts with a soft cloth to the white spots on your furniture.

Wax drippings from the tapers now so fashionably used for lighting purposes can be removed from linen tablecloths with a hot iron and a piece of blotting paper, or by dipping the part in eau de cologne, which renders the wax brittle, so that it can easily be rubbed off with the finger.

Full Dress Costumes of course are special subjects of attention. Notwithstanding serious efforts to the contrary, skirts are almost always made close about the waist, clinging to the form and with great attention to foot trimmings, both because the feet look smaller by means of them and also, because much trimming elsewhere does not fall in with the spirit of the day. Frequently however, foot trimmings appear only in front and on the sides; the back being left plain because of the dust that would collect on garniture. For artificial flowers are much used as headings to ruffles or flowers or again they form pretty fringes by means of drooping stems and buds attached to successive medium sized or small blossoms. Basques are charmingly outlined in a similar way and in general, there is much partiality for flowers set in rows, although not to the exclusion of bouquets which afford a change and for the hair, are always preferred. The hair on full dress occasions is dressed high, but with special avoidance of stiffness and in view of this, soft waves appear on the sides and back, the hair being previously dampened and twisted on pins made expressly for the purpose. Puffs and very short curls are combined and a favorite style for the front is one short curl in the center, with yet shorter ones on either side. Large shell combs or pins that from their size are almost combs, give a handsome finish and very wealthy women wear elegant adornments in diamonds and pearls. Shell or jet bandeaux are fashionable or may be replaced by gold beads or strands of pearls, but with such finish, the hair is dressed somewhat lower. ROSALIND MAY.

Natural History.

Though not so near as when on Foster Street our young people should not forget the rooms on Harvard Street, corner of State, They are accessible and are filled with interesting objects.

An unusual large shooting star was seen in this vicinity Monday evening about 9.30. It seemed larger than either Venus or Jupiter, both of which were visible when it appeared. It came from the south, and its path was northwesterly, toward Jupiter. After losing its brilliancy, it could be seen as a pale red ball of fire, and its path could be traced for some distance.

Stop that cough! Else the bronchial tubes will be enlarged and the delicate tissues of the lungs exposed to injury. No other remedy is so promptly operative in throat and lung troubles as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. A few doses have been known to break up an obstinate and distressing cough. Sufferers from asthma, bronchitis, croup, consumption, sore throat, and whooping cough find a sure relief in the use of this preparation. It soothes the inflamed membrane, promotes expectoration, and induces repose. Don't be well out of the house. Sallie E. Stone, Hurr's store, Va., writes: "I have found, in my family, that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral was always a certain cure for colds and coughs."

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1892.

No. 19

We should get tired of the sunlight itself, beautiful as it is, if God did not send it away every night. We're not even fit to have the moonlight always.—Geo. McDonald.

It is probable that our favorite Scottish writer had no idea of writing a weather item, but his words apply very nicely to the present situation.

We really owe more to the weather as a theme of conversation than most of us are aware of than any of us would acknowledge. How many, during the past ten days have said, "I never saw anything like it?"

And yet we have seen very much the same repeatedly. Two years ago, Christmas day was mild, so much so, that bees swarmed in New Jersey and buttercups were picked in the open air in that same delectable locality. On the same day, '77, the writer walked from the railroad station in Sutton over to Purgatory, and farmers were plowing along the way.

Of course there are varying degrees of cold, from year to year; but we get a fair general average. Only a few years ago there was a scare as to ice and not till March did the plumbers' harvest come, but it came then with a vengeance and pipes were frozen solid. If a man keeps a weather record and speaks from that, some confidence can be placed in what he says, otherwise his words are simply the result of the last cold or warm streak.

Illustrating the absurdity of some of these statements an aged gentleman says, "I was passing up the street in company with a friend of about my own age. It was in the Spring and he said, 'Did you ever see so backward a season?' 'Oh yes,' I replied, 'many of them.' 'Well' he continued, 'I never did.' Just one week afterward we were walking along the same street, and the day was very warm, whereupon he remarks, 'Did you ever see so forward and warm a Spring?' I laughed outright and asked him if he recalled his words of only a week before." The most of our weather talk is just as inconsiderate.

From Medfield comes an invitation from the young and vigorous historical society of that interesting town to be present at the exercises commemorative of the birth of Dr. Lowell Mason. They took place yesterday, the 8th, and were quite in keeping with the character of the man whose long and valuable life they commemorated. These New England towns were little worlds by themselves and it is delightful that they thus keep in mind their precious history. Among those making up the committee of arrangements, LIGHT recognizes the names of Albert A. Lovell, formerly of this city.

Immediately after the death of John B. Gough, at a public meeting in the city of New York, a monument was projected in his memory and a fund was begun but since, nothing has been heard of it. Is it possible that Americans will allow such a personality as Gough's to pass into forgetfulness? The monument should not be in New York, but right here in Worcester. Our Common should have some commemorative figure. How can it be secured? Who will start the ball in motion. Should there be an association to push the matter?

During the nearly a year intervening since Bancroft's death, till recently, very little has been heard concerning the disposition of his books. By no means the largest private collection in the land, it is still one of the most valuable. As the visitor, curiously inclined, can see in the Harvard Library, the volumes whence Carlyle drew his material for "The French Revolution" and in the Boston Public Library, Ticknor's Sources of his History of Spanish Literature, so in some other library should be these books that the great historian used in his immortal compilation. Clark University aims to give higher advantages in Science than any other American institution. Why should not the library become a part of the new University?

Chicago University has just purchased an immense collection in Berlin. Syracuse University was made the possessor by gift, of the Von Ranke Library, that one whence was drawn the History of the Popes, and it will not be strange if some ambitious college in the West or Middle States snaps up this choice morsel. This placed in the keeping of Clark University would give to that institution a pre-eminence in Literature that it could hardly hope to reach in any other way for a score of years. Mr. Clark is away from home at present; but it would seem that with his zeal for his university that he would not overlook this opportunity.

Bancroftiana.

Abel Stevens in the National Magazine for January 1855, writes as follows concerning the Historian, in connection with the Semi-Centennial of the New York Historical Society, where Mr. Bancroft gave the chief address: "He begins to look odd; he is cadaverous; his cheeks are sunken, a defect which somewhat obtrusive whiskers try in vain to conceal. He looks pallid and lank, and severe-featured, as if sedentary and studious habits had dried up the sap of his substance, his clothes hang loosely upon him. * * * * His voice partakes of the general feebleness of his aspect; it sounds dyspeptical and tells the truth in this respect, we rather think."

When we reflect that he survived this dyspeptic look fully thirty-five years, it must be concluded that the ailment did not have a very severe hold upon him. In the same article Dr. Stevens says Mr. Bancroft is eloquent in spite of a rasping voice. His thoughts attracted and held.

In June, 1862, a writer thus mentions Mr. Bancroft's copies of documents.

"The whole collection of documents, thus obtained, is handsomely bound in about two hundred folios and quarto volumes which are justly regarded by him as the most valuable, as it is undoubtedly the most expensive portion of his collection."

In the Century for January, 1887, W. M. Sloane thus refers to a call upon the historian and a visit to the library.

"The second story barely holds the volumes of the great library that lines the walls, fills the entries and passageways, and overflows into the window seats and on to the floors."

The very last literary venture of Mr. Bancroft was to make copies of the Records of the Polk Administration, in which he was Secretary of the Navy, done by means of type writers at the home of the aged widow of President Polk, who had, during her long widowhood, retained these papers and all for the purpose of preparing a history of those four years. These papers constitute a part of his unequalled collection.

Mrs. Frederick Paine.

For several years, Mrs. Ann Cushing Paine, widow of Frederick, has been the oldest dweller in the vicinity of Lincoln Street. She was born in Boston, and her marriage, in 1822, was the first after Boston became a city. Her parents were the Hon. Russell and Elizabeth (Perkins) Sturges. The Paine homestead on Lincoln Street has long been in the family and is a noteworthy structure. She leaves two sons, the Rev. George S. and James P. and a daughter, Mrs. H. P. Sturges of Beverly. Her remains were buried from her late home, Thursday at 1 p.m.

Chamberlain District.

The Chamberlain District Farmer's Club will meet at "Maplewood Farm," the residence of H. J. Allen, Salisbury Street, Thursday, the 14th, inst., at 7.30 o'clock, p.m. Subject, "Free Delivery of Mails and Library Books in Country Districts." Essay by S. A. Burgess. Music and literary entertainment. All invited.

Chaplain Beaudry.

The announcement of the chaplain's death in Chicago, last Saturday, creates a sadness among those who knew him as a gallant soldier. He always was present, while in Worcester, whenever ex-prisoners of war gathered and he ever had a good word to say. His written accounts of Libby Life as published in various papers and in book form were thrilling. He had been chaplain of the New York Department of the G. A. R. During the war, he was chaplain of the 5th N. Y. Cavalry, a regiment that saw lots of service, and whose record, the chaplain himself put in book form in 1874. The book is now very scarce and valuable. The chaplain was taken prisoner at Gettysburg. Though a native of Canada, of French family, there was not the slightest indication of foreignism in his manner or speech.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, JAN. 9, 1892.

Amateur Gardening is the latest journalistic venture from that city of successful paper ventures, Springfield. At 50cts per year, this monthly should "live long and prosper." It certainly is a beauty.

Mrs. D. F. Estabrook very kindly furnishes LIGHT with a file of Colorado Springs papers, filled with data concerning that picturesque city at the base of Pike's Peak.

Mrs. Jennie E. T. Dowe, formerly of this city, has poems in the January Century entitled "Songs of Ireland."

Mr. Gilbert Davis has gotten out a very tasty Annual with the significant title "Its Inside." Along with excellent typography are shown some superb specimens of half tone work. No better ever seen in Worcester.

The Boston Engraving Company sends out New Year's Greeting to friends and patrons in a most exquisite engraving on satin. Nothing could be finer.

LIGHT is in receipt of the souvenir number of the Philadelphia Record for Jan. 1st. It has forty-eight pages and weighs one pound, all for one cent. Life is too short to have such papers very often, but it is a marvel of enterprise.

The cut of John B. Gough, on LIGHT's first page, is kindly loaned by O. B. Wood, who had it engraved for his Worcester, Its Past and Present.

Prize Declamation.

At Horticultural Hall, Jan. 21, under the direction of Messrs. R. R. Simmonds and Wm. E. Bowen will take place one of the most interesting contests ever had in Worcester. Eleven young people will declaim, as follows: Anna Carberry, Lulu Isaacs, Bessie Lawrence, Alla Johnson, Emma Hewitt, Mabel Jenkins, Amy Buck, Althea Bigelow, Harry J. Hosley, John J. Shea and John W. Heffren.

The prizes will be five in number and will consist of $25 in gold, divided as follows: First $10, second $5, third $5, fourth $2.50, fifth $2.50.

Music will be interspersed by Messrs. Gibbs, Adams and Marshall.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Jan. 9, 1892.

Henry W. King, Esq., of the firm of Rice, King & Rice is seriously ill at his home in North Brookfield.

A Good One.

I was browsing among the new books at the Athenæum the other day. A tall old gentleman dressed in the style of fifty years ago, who looked as though he had just stepped out of some old print stood by my side, peering at the books through his eyeglasses. It was Dr. Parsons, the poet. Next to him stood another octogenarian, evidently a friend of his. The old gentleman took up a book from one of the shelves by Maturin M. Ballou. "Ah" he exclaimed to the doctor, "a new book by Ballou! Is he a ripe scholar?" "He's been long Maturin," replied the doctor without a smile, busily peering at the titles before him.—Jacquot in Boston Times.

Most men mix a pound of ambition with a grain of energy and then wonder that the world refuses to admire the mixture.

Almost every one in the world is wicked enough to wish some one would die and leave him money.

THE BUD.

"A youthful maiden in her prime is worth a thousand coats of arms."

The fate of an American bud is a very fortunate one. She is not wrapped around with much paper unless it may come in the shape of invitations and love letters. She is allowed almost perfect freedom, and hates to be chaperoned. So writes Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood in a series of papers on social topics, the first of which appears in the January number of FASHIONS, published by Denholm & McKay Co. Free to purchasers at Boston Store.

Mrs. Sherwood's graceful social essays are well known to the cultivated world, and her verdict in all matters of taste, behavior, essential propriety, and the esthetic side of existence, was long ago accepted as final in the Court of Educated Opinion.

THE ORIGIN OF AN OLD SONG.

"The Old Oaken Bucket" Said to Have Been Composed in a Saloon.

"There have been several versions of the origin of 'The Old Oaken Bucket,'" says George M. Young in the January New England Magazine. The most widely circulated and popularly believed is as follows: When Woodworth was a journeyman printer in an office on the corner of Chatham and Chambers Streets in New York, near-by in Frankfort Street was a saloon kept by a man named Mallory, where Woodworth and several particular friends used to resort. One afternoon the liquor was unusually excellent, and Woodworth seemed inspired by it. After taking a draught, he set his glass on the table and smacking his lips, declared that Mallory's eau de vie was superior to anything he had ever tasted. 'No,' said Mallory, 'You are mistaken; there was one thing which in both our estimations surpassed this in the way of drinking.' 'What was that?' asked Woodworth dubiously. 'The draught of pure spring water that we used to drink from the old oaken bucket that hung in the well, after our return from the field on a hot day in Summer.' A teardrop-glued for a moment in Woodworth's eye. 'True, true!' he replied, and shortly after quitted the place. He immediately returned to the office, took a pen, and in half an hour 'The Old Oaken Bucket' was ready in manuscript to be embalmed in the memories of succeeding generations."

The English island of Jersey, where originated the Jersey breed of cattle, famous as butter-makers, if square would measure but six and three-quarter miles each way, yet it supports a population of sixty thousand, has over twelve thousand, five hundred head of cattle, and exports annually some two thousand and head. This is on an average one head of cattle to every two acres.

In Society.

The old Knickerbocker custom of New Year's calls by the gentlemen at the houses of their lady acquaintances was more generally observed in this city last week Friday evening than it has been for some time. Some of the ladies sent out cards, others received without sending any special invitations and those who did not care for any reason to receive placed baskets at their doors for the cards of the gentlemen who might call.

Among those who received were Mrs. Francis H. Dewey at 142 Main Street; Mrs. W. S. B. Hopkins at 12 Linden Street; Miss Frances M. Lincoln at 39 Cedar Street; Miss Helen Lincoln and Mrs. Charles D. Wheeler at 5 Oak Street; Mrs. Charles H. Flint at 58 Cedar Street; Mrs. George T. Rice at 61 Cedar Street; Mr. Frank P. Goulding, Mrs. John A. Thayer and Mrs. Morrison of Braintree at 44 Harvard Street; Mrs. Wm. H. Coe and Mrs. M. V. B. Jefferson at 62 Cedar Street; Mrs. Sarah Brigham at the corner of West and William Streets; Mrs. David Harrower at 56 Cedar Street; Mrs. Henry Eveleth Hill at 60 Cedar Street; Mrs. C. W. Smith at the corner of Elm and Chestnut Streets; Mrs. F. R. Macullar and Mrs. J. L. Burbank at 44 West Street; Mrs. Mary C. Crompton and the Misses Crompton at Mariemont; Mrs. Charles F. Washburn at 38 Elm Street; Mrs. Frank E. Heywood on William Street; Mrs. Albert A. Michelson, 96 Woodland Street.

Last Saturday evening in Colonial Hall, Miss Helen White, daughter of Major L. G. White, gave a german for the very youngest set. She was assisted in receiving by Miss Eleanor Clark of Boston, Miss Phosa Bates and Mrs. L. G. White. The ushers were Alexander Bullock, Merrick Lincoln, Earl Brown, Ned Brown, Alexander Doe, Harry Thayer, John Adams and Ralph Earle. The favors were distributed by Miss Mary Eaton, Miss Alice Baldwin, Miss Frances Pomeroy of Boston, Miss Julia Buffington, Miss Mabel Buffington and Miss Alice Peckham of Boston. The german was led by Miss Mary Adams. Over one hundred were present.

The second of the house cotillions was held Monday evening at the residence of Thomas B. Eaton, corner of Crown and Chatham Streets and was very enjoyable throughout. The house was elaborately decorated for the occasion with laurel, holly, palms, roses and mistletoe. Erastus Hopkins, with Miss Mary Eaton as his partner, led the german and seventeen couples followed. The favors given by the hostess were very handsome and included boutonnieres, nosegays, bonbon boxes, silver cravat fasteners, pencils and key rings. The music was provided by four musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by John J. Heron, pianist. Caterer Johnson of the Worcester Club furnished refreshments.

Mrs. Eaton was assisted in receiving by Miss Eaton, Miss Pomeroy of Boston and Miss Carrie Batchelder of West Upton. Besides those mentioned above there were present Miss Helen Lincoln, Miss Christine Rice, Miss Josie Smith, Miss Pope of New York, Miss Pomeroy of Boston, Miss Knowlton of Upton, Miss Batchelder, Miss Dickey, Miss Nelson, Miss Georgie Stone, Miss Addie Wyman, Miss Grace Whitman, Miss Elizabeth Hopkins, Miss Mabel Gage, Miss May Doe, Miss Clara Smith, George M. Stearns, Charles M. Thayer, Dr. George Moore, Charles Ranlet, William B. Scofield, John Nelson, Hale Holden of Kansas City, George T. Dewey, Frank L. Hale, Dr. George D. Kelley, Ernest L. Thayer, A. Bowman Wood, John D. Baldwin, Henry W. Doe, George S. Taft, Dr. Gage, Charles Goodwin of Philadelphia.

The last of the series will be given at Mariemont, by the Misses Crompton, some evening near the end of January.

The committee who arranged the game of living whist, which was so successfully played at Mechanics Hall December 30, desiring to testify of their appreciation of the good work done by the "cards," gave them a complimentary dance Thursday evening in Salisbury Hall, Society of Antiquity building. All the "cards" were not able to be present because some were ill, but when Mr. and Mrs. Bicknell's orchestra struck up for the first dance it was found that forty-four had responded to the invitations and were ready for the evening's pleasure. They were Mrs. John H. Jewett, Mrs. J. F. Darrah, Miss Lizzie Norcross, Miss L. E. Gray, Miss F. Buckingham, Miss E. Billings, Miss H. E. Fletcher, Miss Ellen S. Rheutan, Miss J. Robinson, Miss Mollie Taft, E. D. Stoddard, T. K. Corbiere, Fred Whittemore, H. A. Billings, Harry B. Fairbanks, A. A. Barker, F. J. Darrah, Wm. J. Waite, F. G. Chandler, John E. Kennedy, Wm. A. Gile, J. O. Norcross, Mrs. A. A. Barker, Mrs. W. W. Conkey, Miss Maud Knowlton, Miss J. V. Hammond, Miss Alice M. Rheutan, Miss Catharine Burton, Miss Theresa Gray, Miss Daisy Day, Miss F. R. Brauman, Miss Alice Day, John H. Jewett, W. W. Conkey, T. H. Blood, H. H. Ames, Jr., Edward M. Dodge, Morton Crane, George Eddy, F. A. Leiland, A. F. Hyde, Harvey Wheelock, C. F. Brown, Dr. A. F. Townsend.

There was no regular order of dances, the whims of the dancers being suited. At different times during the evening several of the fancy dances given at the "game" were repeated and were loudly applauded by the spectators. Those danced were the minuet movement by Miss Alice Rheutan, Miss L. E. Gray, George Eddy and Albert Hyde; the Aurora dance by Miss Day, Miss Longley, E. M. Dodge and Fred Whittemore; the Highland fling by Mrs. F. J. Darrah and Miss L. E. Gray and partners. At ten o'clock Rebboli served one of his best collations. Dancing was then continued until midnight. The affair was arranged by E. D. Stoddard and John H. Jewett and the chaperones were Mrs. John H. Jewett and Mrs. A. A. Barker.

The second of the series of socials of the Continentals was held in Continental Hall Thursday evening. Putnam and Babcock's orchestra furnished music for dancing and Zahonyi was the caterer. C. A. Waite was floor director and his aids were George M. Rice, 2d, J. W. Flagg and George H. Cutting. The last of the series will take place January 27.

The City Guards will hold the first of a series of three socials at the Armory January 22.

The social events of last evening were the Light Infantry's second social at the Armory and the first of a series of select dancing assemblies in Colonial Hall, both too late for LIGHT to publish an account in this paper.

A Great Country.

A Scotch lady, now residing in Roxbury, on her first arrival in this country, exhibited great curiosity on seeing some doughnuts brought to table.

"What are they?" she inquired.

"They are bread nuts," replied a wag who was present.

"Bread nuts! Do they grow?"

"Yes, they grow on the doughnut tree, and we call them doughnuts."

After eating one she exclaimed: "Well! well! this is a great country where the vera breed grows on the trees!"

An Unexpected Answer.

There is an old lady residing in Roxbury, a native of "The Land o' Cakes," amiable in character, a sincere Christian, but a little deaf, a circumstance which sometimes leads her to give queer answers to questions asked her. While visiting the house of a friend a few evenings ago it was decided to hold a prayer meeting. After the exercises, one of the company approached the old lady and asked:

"D'ye walk w' the Lord?"

"Oh, no," she replied, not distinctly hearing the question. "I jist come back and forrit to see Mrs. Geigie."

Veritas Caput.

These two words, abbreviated before and behind, furnished Henry Rowe Schoolcraft the name for the source of the Mississippi or "The True Head," but in the region thereabouts a war of words is raging as to whether it is the true source. Iowa and Minnesota papers are hard at it. When a decision is reached, we will put it down in our Geography.

Lessons are to be taken from the life of the late John Jacob Astor, one of the wealthiest men in the world. He abhorred ostentation. He would only participate in important public affairs on condition that his name should not be made prominent. Walking was preferred by him to either carriage or horse car. The methodical life led by this man was not unduly secluded, and was the means of adding to the Astor fortunes largely. It was only of late years that he permitted any elaborate decoration of his house. His funeral was conducted with the utmost simplicity.

Whenever I see those swinging doors labeled "Push" on one side and "Pull" on the other, which are used so much in offices and places of business, I am reminded that the words are really the motto of all wide-awake professional and business men. To get ahead nowadays one must push and pull from morning until night. The trouble is that we do it selfishly. If we would only push one another forward instead of aside, and pull each other along to success instead of backward, then this push and pull of competition would be altogether a good thing.—Diogenes.

Idle, lazy folks have most labor.

John B. Gough.

We are nearing the anniversary of the death of this most famous man. It was February 15, 1886 in that city that he loved, Philadelphia, that he was stricken with his illness that proved to be fatal two days later. Nearly five years have passed since he has been seen in our streets and what a bundle of nerves he was! What a breezy sight to see him walk through the great hallway at the Union Station? What a hearty handshake he had for all acquaintances and what greetings he gave those who called upon him at his Hillside home. From the humble birth at Sandgate, England, August 22d, 1817, to his death with those glorious words upon his lips what a panorama his life presented? The poor immigrant, the ingenious but unsteady mechanic, the careless son and husband, the roistering accompaniment of a show, the bar room loafer dropped all his former besetments and became as truly the Apostle of Temperance, of Total Abstinence as was Paul the preacher of the religion of Christ. Conversions are instantaneous and that magic touch of Joel Stratton did much for the friendless young Englishman. There are many people in Worcester who have pleasant recollections of the man whose tongue had woven a magic spell over more people than any other man of his times had addressed. They have met him in church; they have heard him speak in Mechanics Hall; they have met him in our streets; have called on him at his home and have had the pleasure of seeing him display his treasures of Cruikshank illustrations.

Then there are some favored ones who remember his visits to the High School. The school, itself, pretty nearly filled the hall but the pupils sat near each other and all the ninth grade pupils were invited in. What fun! The great orator never was funnier nor more active and he never had a more inspiring audience unless it was when he came to the same school again. He said himself that the school was an inspiration and he regarded it as a favor rather than a task to talk to such bright young people.

To keep the event in memory, a large album was procured and all those members of the school who had heard him talk wrote their names in it. The principal of the school carried it out to Hillside one bright, crisp autumn afternoon. Mr. Gough received the little testimonial most heartily. He said, "I have thousands of names presented in a similar spirit, by foreign friends, but with all my goings up and down in America, this is the only instance of the sort from a home source, and I esteem it all the more. I shall put this volume with all of these others and this will be prized most of all for it is from my friends and neighbors." His parting remark was, "Whenever you want me to talk to the young folks in the school just let me know." But ere the date came around when it would seem proper to ask the school's kind friend to address it again, the orator and philanthropist was dead with those stirring words upon his lips, "Young man, make your record clear." It was in the Philadelphia that he loved that he closed his eyes for his final sleep, but his body was brought back to Hillside for funeral exercises; but not in Boylston only was the sound of wailing heard, for everywhere, where man feels for man, were there laments over his untimely death.

His body was laid at rest in our Hope Cemetery, away back in the newer part, upon a slightly knoll and in the lot was placed the monument shown below. The inscription is upon the upper right face, followed by the words from Revelations, 3d chapter, 5th verse, "He that overcometh, etc.," and the sentiment that he had emphasized in his last address, "I can desire nothing better for this great country than that a barrier, high as heaven, be raised between the unpolluted lips of the children and the intoxicating cup, that everywhere men and women should raise strong and determined hands against whatever will defile the body, pollute the mind, or harden the heart against God and His truth."

The wife, who had wedded him when everybody, her own father included, said "no" and who had so faithfully followed him in his journeyings and who had been the manager at Hillside, passed away during the summer of 1891 and was laid by his side in this peaceful abode in the cemetery. "Hope" it is beautifully named and they who sleep in it are in repose with a hope of a blissful resurrection. No grave in Worcester is so frequently visited as this whose monument tells the story of lives, spent for others.

Personal Recollections.

Mr. Horace Kendall, the well known auctioneer of the Mechanics Hall Block was, in Mr. Gough's earlier career, his business manager. A recent call on Mr. Kendall, in his Pleasant Street home, and it is pleasant in fact as well as name, called forth a train of recollection. It is just as well to allow Mr. K. to tell his own story, for every body knows that an auctioneer is a good talker.

"I first met Mr. Gough in 1851. Some time before, in paying his respects to the Boylston school teacher, Miss Whitcomb, who subsequently became his wife and who was an intimate friend of my sister, he had been at our house a great deal. After they were married and had begun running the Hillside Farm, he would not take 'No' for an answer; but I had to go and look out for that place, which by the way consumed, first and last, more than $200,000 of Mr. Gough's money, an outlay that availed little when it was sold after his death. Here I supervised things in the Summer and, in the Winter, I went with him as business manager on his lecture tours, for that was before the days of Lecture Bureaus. I must have gone out with him as early as 1851 and I was with him twelve years. During that time, he averaged $30,000 a year receipts for his platform work and, if he had been a good financier, he might have died with more than half a million; but he was the victim of all sorts of beggars, individual and corporate. Why I remember an Englishman, coming way out to Harrisburg, from Providence, and in spite of all I could do, he got a check for $3,000, and Mr. Gough never saw a cent of it afterwards. At Hillside, each pleasant day would bring a relay of parties in search of help, sometimes a committee of several members to impress him the more, and this doesn't include the applications by post.

"My duties, in going about with Mr. Gough, were to sell tickets, look out for advertising and give him such personal aid as he needed. He was the most careful of men as to his apparel. We had to carry six or seven trunks all the time, for following each address, there must be a change throughout. In fact this was necessary, so hard did he work when speaking. It was seldom that he had a dry thread in his undergarments, when his lecture was over.

"He was the most impressive of men. A word from pen or tongue would disconcert him. He went to Richmond only once, for as he entered the hall there, some evilly disposed persons, knowing his anti-slavery principles, hissed as he went in. The earnest, enthusiastic applause of the respectable part of the large gathering could not restore his equanimity. He was not himself during the whole evening. Once in New York city, just before going out to speak in the Y. M. C. A. course, he picked up a copy of the N. Y. Herald and in it he found a scurrilous attack on himself. It completely used him up. He said to me, 'I shan't go to the hall tonight, Horace. There is no use. There will be no one there. No one believes in me.' 'Oh, phaw!' I said, 'Yes you will go. If you don't I shall go on and speak in your place.' It required a deal of persuasion to get him started that night, but he did go, finally. When we neared the hall, one of the first things seen was the announcement 'Standing Room Only.' 'How does that look,' said I, 'for no audience?' Before he began, there wasn't a chance for a man to even crowd in. He was all right after he began.

"I never knew him to have a poor audience. Even down in Maine, the people crowded to hear him, but his most successful places were in the Middle States, particularly in Philadelphia. The attendance there was phenomenal. He had a benefit one night there after which I turned over to him $4,000 of clear profits. Folks were generous, seats one dollar each. There must have been something more than 3,000 people there, but they wouldn't wait for change. They were willing to let Mr. Gough have the money.

I used to have queer times with some of the money in circulation. You see it was in the days of wild cat banks and I had to look pretty sharp. One night in New York and at the old Broadway Tabernacle, I heard a knock at the door when I was selling tickets as rapidly as they ever went at a circus. Of course, it was contrary to my rules to let any body in; but I found out that it was Mr. "Sam" Halstead, a New York millionaire and particular friend of Mr. Gough who had come to help me out as he said, if they tried to shove any bad bills on me. So he sat down by my side and was referee whenever need arose.

Mr. Gough was disheartened very easily, but notwithstanding his very sensitive nature, I never knew him to return an attack. A Quaker could not have been more non-combative.

Philadelphia was his favorite city, though the country was full of the warmest kind of friends. In Albany, he was the means of reforming Delavan, the distinguished hotel man and in every great center there were reformed men who looked upon him as their savior. It was in Philadelphia, that he gave me a great setting out. We had along with us 470 copies of his Autobiography, a little book, once very common. It cost 17½ cents per copy. My salary was small, so one day he said I might have the profits on the whole lot. We sold at 37½ cents each. Accordingly that night, while I was sitting on the platform, he proceeded to endow me with qualities that I never dreamed of possessing and then capped the climax by saying I was to have all I got above cost for the books. Well, didn't I have a bonanza that night? No sooner was the meeting over than the folks surged up to the platform. No ceased coming till I had sold the last book. Old Dr. Albert Barnes, the famous commentator, seeing how busy I was, came up and helped to sell. Many people wouldn't take any change so it was better for me than the profits only.

Mr. Gough was terribly in earnest in war times and his voice was worth a hundred men anywhere. He gave up his time to war meetings with all the ardor that he had displayed in the temperance cause. No one man in the state did more than he to prompt men to enlist.

When the season of lecturing was over, he used to come back to his home completely unnerved. Then it was that home care was essential to restore him to his normal self, but it was a big mistake, his making his home at Hillside. He should have been nearer the great arteries of travel. It was a great waste of energy, the driving to and from this boyston home, for every thing was in, from or by Worcester."

Mr. Gough and Mr. Kendall retained their friendship for each other as long as the former lived and when he passed away, it was Mr. Kendall who served as one of the appraisers of his estate.

Among other relics of their travels over the country, Mr. Kendall preserves a dress coat, presented to him by the lecturer, one of those famous garments whose tails were said to talk. Putting it on, the observer can see that Messrs. Gough and Kendall were of quite the same figure, but in his later years, the lecturer grew stouter and it is doubtful whether he could have donned in 1885 this coat worn thirty years before. Were Mr. Kendall disposed, he could fill a large book with memories of his old friend and employer.

How Mr. Gough Came to Worcester.

Major F. G. Stiles has a memory full of facts pertaining to Worcester for the last fifty years. It is worth while to go down to his Foster Street paint shop and to get him to tell of men and events during this period for his recollection is unerring. "Do you remember, Major, when Mr. Gough came to this city?" "Of course I do, perfectly well. It was in 1841, in the Fall, at Brinley Hall, now G. A. R. Hall. There was a panorama, representing The Burning of Moscow, The Fight between the Constitution and the Guerriere and Washington crossing the Delaware. Mr. Gough's part was to have general charge and to sing songs, adapted to the scenes, for instance in the sea fight, he sang a naval song and in the Delaware incident he was melodiously patriotic. It was not so much his voice, nor what he sang, as the way he sang that made him popular. He was always received with applause. He left the show, here, and went to work at his trade of book binding, working for Messrs. Hutchinson and Crosby.

"It was here that his first wife died, and the house in which she died is still standing on Belmont Street, a small wooden one back of the big tavern. In those days "Nat" Stearns kept the place and it was there that Gough could usually be found. I remember seeing him there once with pants tucked into his boots, having on a red flannel shirt and an old battered hat and whistling and singing for the drinks. There was a McFarland who was a chum of his and they used to go on great sprees. He finally got so low that even the tavern wouldn't have him around and he was fired out. Then he contemplated suicide, and, probably, would have taken his own life, if Joel Stratton had not laid his hand upon his shoulder and led him to the Temperance meeting in the old Town Hall. I was there and saw him reel in and up to the platform. There was a general titter over the audience but he turned upon the people saying, 'You may laugh, but I will yet be a man and I'll wear a better coat than you ever owned.' In his best days, he never excelled the thrilling effect of that speech. Though he fell once or twice afterwards, he was a new man from that date, and the reputation that he made became one of the proudest pages in Worcester's history."

A gentleman, not a resident of Worcester came here to listen to Mr. Gough's last address, in December, 1885. Many years before, he had heard him talk in a school house in the town of Franklin. The room was full and the speaker was earnest. Soon the heat induced him to lay aside his coat and in his shirt sleeves the young orator exhorted men to abstain. The visitor said he readily recalled points of similarity in the cultured language of the speaker who had had forty years of experience from that school house talk, but he also said, "There is no more fire and force now than there was when he spoke in his shirt sleeves, perhaps not quite so much." Culture could not add to the energy and strength that nature gave him. She only rounded off the corners.

After a Decade.

Somebody must have kept a close run of the years for surely the most of their friends would not have suspected that Charles A. Richardson and wife had been ten years married, for it seems only a short time since they were in school. But the almanac says it is ten years since the Rev. Garrett Beekman united these young people, then as now, attendant at the Laurel Street Church.

Monday evening, friends, to the number of about one hundred, assembled at 8 Woodland Street completely surprising the chiefly interested parties. The day was also the birthday of Mrs. Richardson who is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Horace W. Wilson who with Mr. and Mrs. C. O. Richardson, Mr. R.'s parents were present. Their former pastor, Mr. Beekman and Rev. Alonzo Sanderson, the present minister at Laurel Street, were present and joined in congratulations. Numerous and valuable presents were received from Montacute, Masonic Lodge and from the Knights of Pythias and their friends. It was not until late hour that the party, after a very enjoyable evening, dispersed. Among those who were present may be named Rev. Alonzo Sanderson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Enoch Earle, Mr. and Mrs. George R. Kennedy, Henry C. Willson, Mr. and Mrs. E. P. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. R. W. Clifford, Mr. and Mrs. F. A. Whitman, Mr. and Mrs. F. A. McClure, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Kenerson, F. D. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Ellinwood, H. H. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Kelley, Mr. and Mrs. S. A. Walker, Mrs. E. H. Moulton, Mrs. John Legg, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Donaldson, Mrs. Eliza Tolin, Mrs. Mary Locke, Mrs. E. M. Howes, Mrs. Mary Williams, Miss Mabel Richardson, Miss Flora Winchester, Miss Annie Rawson, Miss Mary Williams, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Heath, Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Whiting, Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Crosby, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Buck, E. H. Moulton, E. M. Hawes, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Squires, Morton Richardson, Mrs. E. M. White, Mrs. G. M. Smiley, Mr. George H. Eben F. Draper made Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee.

High School.

With the present additional heating pipes, certain rooms, which were very uncomfortable on a cold day, are now as warm and pleasant as could be desired. The "freezing days" are now a thing of the past.

The Assembly Alumni Association voted to offer three prizes annually to the best debaters of the Assembly Debating Society, the members to vote upon the best debater each meeting. The one receiving the most votes will be entitled to first prize.

Prof. Bolton of Clark University is giving memory tests in the schools.

Mrs. C. W. Bowker received word last Saturday that her only sister, Miss Myra J. Upham, was dangerously ill in Fitchburg. She left for that place at once but reached there too late to see her sister before she died. The funeral was held in Fitchburg and was conducted by Miss Upham's pastor, Rev. Mr. Rice of Royalston. The cause of her death was pneumonia, which followed the grip. It was only last March that Mrs. Bowker's mother died.

Mrs. Heywood's Gift.

This is a generous age. Not only do wills and testaments reveal liberal giving, but many people choose to give while living and thus obviate the contests that too often follow the deaths of philanthropists. One of the most notable of recent instances is the endowment at Meadville, Pa., of a department of instruction in the Unitarian Theological School of that place by Mrs. Abbie Ballou Heywood, wife of the Rev. W. S. Heywood of Sterling. She is a daughter of the late Rev. Adin Ballou of Hopedale and she donates $16,000 for this most excellent purpose, in memory of her father. From the proceeds of the endowment, lecture courses will be given setting forth the social features of the religion of Christ. Among the subjects to be treated will be "Temperance," "War and Peace," "The Relations of the Sexes, including marriage and divorce," and "The Enfranchisement of Women."

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Lothrop's Opera House.

Three stars, a strong supporting company, special scenery and an exciting play are the order of things at Lothrop's this week. The three stars are Miss Kate Glassford, J. Francis Kirke and J. Gordon Edwards. The play is the well-known drama "Under the Gaslight." The special scenery includes a pier and railroad scene. Everybody familiar with the play knows that there is intense excitement from beginning to end. The company is giving it a splendid presentation. Miss Grace Hamilton, the Worcester actress, is one of the members of the supporting company.

Next week Miss Ethel Tucker, supported by Lothrop's Stock Company, will play the five act American melodrama, "Nobody's Claim." Preceding it there will be the usual laughter-provoking farce.

The date for the presentation of the comedy drama "Nevada" by the XIV Club of the First Universalist Church is January 8. The proceeds will be given to the Sunday School. The full cast was published in LIGHT several weeks ago.

The cast for "The Spy of Gettysburg," which is to be produced by Gen. A. A. Goodell Camp 2, Sons of Veterans has been selected as follows: Gen. Meade, commanding the Army of the Potomac, George H. Hill; Harry Lenox, the Spy of Gettysburg, Frank Bemis; Uncle Moses Mulvey, relic of the Mexican War, J. B. Leprie; Cyril Blackburn, the black sheep of a noble Virginia family, W. H. Plummer; Solomon, an independent "coon," Robert R. Simmonds; Capt. Warren, a federal staff officer, John J. Torkey; Jenison, a willing tool of Blackburn's, John L. Sullivan; Mabel Meredith, a true-hearted girl, Miss Minnie Smith; Lottie Evans, her cousin, full of mischief, Miss Lulu Isaacs; Mrs. Moses Mulvey with a mind of her own, Mrs. Ellen M. Walker. The play will be elaborately presented, and special tableaux will be given.

Mr. Ebenezer Pray.

At No. 26 Grove Street, Tuesday, this very estimable gentleman passed away at the advanced age of 87 years, 8 months and 18 days. On his mother's side, he was related to the Phillips family, one of the pioneer settlers of the towns of Oxford and Auburn. He leaves a daughter, Mrs. M. A. Kilburn. His funeral was held Friday 11 a. m. at his late home.

Don't give children much, and remember that plain, sweet chocolate is about the best you can give them.

The Synthetic Philosophy of Expression.

The Delsarte system,—what does it imply? What does it teach? The inadequate answer "To study how to gesticulate," would be given by even the generally well-informed, if they were not conversant with the use of the Delsarte system. The student of literature may derive enjoyment and profit by a perusal of Prof. Moses True Brown's book on "The Philosophy of Expression." Mme. Giraldy Delsarte the eldest daughter and pupil of François Delsarte, has arrived in New York. Current news promises a treat, as through her presentation of the truth in support of this much abused system of expression, existing false ideas will be thrown down. Upon the principles of this grand science, Prof. Moses True Brown of the Boston School of Oratory recently addressed a highly intelligent and representative audience at the Home School. Every one was happy to take the elementary step to the Delsarte movement, and as the Professor cast aside assumption and the reserve of a lecturer, he as gallantly, as logically conducted his hearers a long step forward through the graceful curves of "Hogarth's line of beauty," on fluent tongue.

"So felt he who first told how Psyche went,
On the smooth road into realms of wonderment."

The speaker interused apt and frequent illustrations, often humorous and quite diverting, quickly supplying a note of beauty to restore the harmonic chord. In his loftier flight descriptive of varying shades of emotion, the poet's touches were adroitly managed. Concerning the false ideas, and misrepresented subject of art, Prof. Brown emphasized his regret that so large a class of liberal people entertained narrow estimates. He commented on the inclination of the superficial to depreciate the movement; cited editors squibs, innuendoes of critics, the beguilement by "Puck," for the collusion of minds unclassical. The speaker also expressed his belief in the awakened thought on this subject of physical and voice culture; and, "agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom." To the frequent question, "Wherein do the Delsarte gymnastics differ from other systems of physical exercise?" we find an answer in the following: "They consist in gymnastics which free every muscle and articulation of the body, to obtain expression, develop habitual grace; bad physical habits are broken up while natural ones are established."

"The Delsarte laws of expression underlie all art," the work "develops self possession and overcomes self-consciousness." By Delsarte, we are taught vital economy.

Professor Brown says: "To the researchers of the two great philosophic minds, Darwin and Mantegazza, we owe the substance of the body of truth which forms the present Philosophy of human expression, and with equal confidence we may assert that to François Delsarte we owe the practical application of philosophic methods to speech arts,—reading, oratory and dramatic expression."

In his next step he endeavored to justify the appearance of Synthetic Philosophy of Expression. Neither Mantegazza or Darwin attempted to apply their philosophy, they did not claim to be teachers, nor to suggest how the principles should be taught. Prof. Brown has thrown "an hypothesis into the mass of accumulated facts lying in disorder." He logically defines the first principles,—the three conditions of being,—the three special agents of expression,—the three modes of motion.

"The Philosophy of Expression, then, is the Philosophy of Manifestation." By permission I employ the succinct explanation published in the "Portland Press" by Sarah E. Laughton, then teacher of elocution in the State Normal School. Miss Laughton is now permanently connected with the Home School in our city. The definition may help others to attain to a correct use of the Delsarte system.

1.—It is mind, or soul, which is interior, and it is this essence which seeks to express or dramatize itself.

2.—It is organized matter, or body, which is exterior; and it is this material element through which expression or dramatization is made; and this whole of being, Delsarte calls the organism. So we may state, a new definition of expression.

Expression is the exterior in motion, moved from the interior, or oratory, in that language of the whole organism by which man instructs, moves, and persuades his fellow-men. If it be the exterior in motion that we recognize as expression, then all expression is gesture. And so, Delsarte gives us three modes of motion to express three states of the soul, and through three special instruments. This outcome of gestures of the exterior moved by the interior, we all recognized as: 1st, the voice; 2d, the play of face, hand and torso; 3d, articulation.

Let us examine briefly these modes of expression: 1, Voice is the gesture of the larynx; crude and physical in animals next below men, growing into inflected and musical tones in the man as he emerges from the savage to civilized conditions.

2.—The body in motion, especially in the play of the hand, face and torso, is a wonderful means by which the human soul manifests its threefold nature.

3.—Articulation is the gesture of tongue and lips. Primitive man used a crude animal voice, with frightfully significant gestures; expressions of animal appetites and gross passions. Odi with a growth of brain-substance came a growth of thinking power, a use of hands to fashion rude forms of art, and finally articulation.

We may state the Delsarte philosophy, then 1.—An attempt to discover and formulate the general laws governing expressions of voice, gesture, and articulate speech.

2.—An attempt to apply these general laws to special classes.

3.—To perseveringly practice modes of expression thus found, remembering, there can be no adequate expression with inadequate technique."

In whatever form the lines expressive of grace appear, to the true beauty lover, he requires no knowledge "unborrowed from the eye," to catch the natural grace in the poise of a little, unrestrained child at play; or to follow the artistic-natural lines of a Greek statue.

The artistic naturalness in the actor, or the fascinating danseur is the result of skilled discipline like the tempering process of a "Damascus blade."

Sarah Bernhardt, an adequate exponent, acquired from Delsarte, her "swaying grace," the tigress-like springs; only as fruition of years of study and perseverance. Who could remain insensate.

"Mild husband cool-rooted flowers fragrant-eyed," Seeing no beauty in the curving line traced by the swift bird

"Sheres the liquid sky"

Is there a Titium stoic among us who would refuse to vitalize with modern fire, or an educated eye that could fail to recognize the beauty of poise and graceful posturing of finished artists upon the modern stage? I look upon it as somewhat a waste of effort to anaesthetize. On the other hand it would be much better to direct effort to the solution of the subject. If our physically uneducated accept the principles, the work has begun. "Delsartism helps to better living; for it gives to the human being power of complete expression. It sets the body to match the soul." When bad physical habits are broken up by good laws of health-culture, a better generation of men will grow up.

Grace of motion is a superior charm of woman. Awkwardness and ugliness will become extinct when women employ their leisure for self-culture, self-improvement. When they become: fully aroused the average mental and physical condition will be elevated.

Edward Bellamy's maidens in "Looking Backward," possess magnificent health.

Whenever lovers of harmony discover beauty, artistic grace, strength, power, he beholdeth with glowing soul, and an "appetite in the eye" the subtle philosophy

"Unwitting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony."

Delsarte.

Mme. Marie Giraldy Delsarte, the elder of Delsarte's two surviving daughters and his favorite pupil when he was alive, has arrived in New York from Paris. She comes to this country to expound the system of her father, says the N. Y. Sun. She and her brother Gustave Delsarte, who died some few years ago, have been since the death of their father in 1871 the leading teachers and exponents of the Delsarte system. Nearly all the teachers using the name of Delsarte in this country who lay claim to any eminence, have received their instruction from one or the other of these two. Since Gustave's death Marie has generally been regarded as the one person preeminently competent to illustrate and exemplify his methods.

Those who are interested in foreign missions will find a very pertinent letter in the New York Sun written by a Chinaman of that city. He had the audacity to suggest that the board appropriate China's share to certain specified districts of that city equal in area to a whole county of China where for five hundred years not a drunkard or a murderer was known. He wonders why the board is so anxious to populate heaven with Chinamen when they are not fit men to live in America, the home of the board. The old heathen seems to have a disgraceable habit of independent thinking.

Books and Bookmen

Old wood to burn! Old wine to drink!
Old friends to trust! Old books to read!

—Alonzo of Arragon.

The National Library in Paris has about 2,250,000 printed volumes and 100,000 MSS. Its annual expenditures amount to 788,000 francs.

Rev. Wm. Brunton is of the opinion that with the multiplicity of books it becomes quite a serious question with parents what the boys should read. "Better read anything than not to read anything," said a wise and witty divine. I am of that opinion; but the best way is to read the best; and that we may determine which is the best, we must consider the age of the reader and purpose he has in view. Boys from ten to fifteen years of age, will look for recreation; their purpose will be interest and amusement. Naturally, they love adventure, daring deeds, the wild and romantic side of life. They can enjoy this, as they have not the experience to show the power of routine and the commonplace. They live in the fairy world, and believe in the heroic and romantic as naturally as birds sense their power of flight.—Spectator.

Of Tennyson's beautiful poem "Crossing the Bar," the English periodical "The Bookman" says: "The poem was composed during an illness. Being upbraided by his nurse because he had never written any hymns, Lord Tennyson composed 'Crossing the Bar' the same night, and recited it to her the next morning. Our authority for this is a lady friend of Lord Tennyson, who received the information from the lips of the poet during a visit. It is quite possible that this account may be reconciled with that of Dr. Ainger, who asserts that it was written by Lord Tennyson on a day when he journeyed across the Solent from Aldworth to Farringdon. There is nothing to prevent the poem having been composed before and written out afterward in its complete and perfect form." Another interesting note from "The Bookman" is this: "There is in the possession of an intimate friend of Lord Tennyson a letter, the contents of which should prove useful to any future biographers. It is an account of the manner in which he first essayed to make poetry. One day, at about the age of sixteen, he was too ill to go to church. His brother suggested that he should employ his spare time in trying to write a poem. The boy did so, and discovered for the first time his capacity for poetical expression."

Woodward; Deposed, Florence E. Pratt; George William Carter, John W. Chadwick; The Beaconsfield Terraces, John Waterman; The Pines, Zitella Cocke; The Gray Dawn, S. Q. Lapius; A Salem Witch, Edith Mary Norris; The Yellow Wall Paper, Charlotte Perkins Stetson; The Old Oaken Bucket, Samuel Woodworth; The Author of The Old Oaken Bucket, Geo. M. Young; Christmas Eve, Agnes Maule Machar; Stories of Salem Witchcraft, Winfield S. Nevins; This Better to Have Loved and Lost, Philip Bourke Marston; Abraham Lincoln, Phillips Brooks.

This favorite illustrated magazine comes out in its regular garb for January. The refugence in December was only a Christmas luxury, but it will be strange if LIGHT is the only reader that prefers the accustomed uniform. The chief article in this number, the one that will be read the most thoroughly, concerns Phillips Brooks, that large hearted Divine whose fame has gone out through all the world. To be sure, the City of St. Louis, and the Stories of Salem Witchcraft are intensely interesting, particularly the latter, yet there is extra interest in all that is said or written about our new Massachusetts bishop. It is exceedingly fitting to discuss Salem Witchcraft in 1892 for we are just two hundred years away from the days that, more than any other in New England History, disgrace us. The illustrations in this magazine are all of a high order.

The story, "Saddle and Sentiment" by Wenona Gilman, now running as a serial in Outing, is deservedly attracting much attention. It is said that the publishers have been obliged to print a second edition of several of the issues on account of the demand for this story.

Anthony Burns.

"MADISON, WIS., Dec. 11, 1891.

Mr. A. S. Roe:

DEAR SIR, Please accept thanks from a western reader of LIGHT for what you say on page 318 Dec. 5 about the Burns rescue in 1854.

In regard to what you say on page 316 about the beginning of the Free Church I wish to inquire what has been said or written of Adin Thayer's doings in connection with the Burns Rescue. My thought is that we have never given him sufficient credit for stopping at the right time the rescuing party from Worcester. I think Samuel Porter gives Judge Thayer the credit of stopping Col. Higginson at the door of the court room by saying, "No more now, Massachusetts must have the credit of being lawabiding." But I have not seen what Citizen Stevens has written. I will thank you to inform me about it and also other writings about the local affairs of Worcester as it was 30 to 50 years ago, especially as to the writings of my old schoolmates Caleb and Sarah Wall who, I understand have been very active and useful in such matters. Respectfully yours,

E. C. TAINTER.

LIGHT regrets that a copy of Charles E. Stevens' History of Burns Rescue is not obtainable save as it is picked up in odd lots. It has long been out of print. At the onset there were printed 1,500 copies which Burns himself sold. Had it been possible to print in the heat of the excitement, incident to the Rescue, the demand would have been vastly greater. As it is, however, the book has long been rated as "out of print." Mr. Stevens was an eye witness to the affair and, at home, lived a near neighbor to Col. Higginson. No one had better qualifications for the writing, and it is little wonder that his book is now sought after by collectors. Mr. Stevens was, for a long time, Register of Probate and Insolvency for Worces or County. He is a graduate of Dartmouth College and, at present does a Probate business in the Walker Building. Mr. Wall will be pleased at the expressions of regard for him, and his work that the letter contains.

Reading and Speaking, Familiar Talks to Young Men who should speak well in public, designed as a Text Book for Colleges and High Schools, and also for general use by Brainard Gardner Smith, A. M., associate professor of Elocution and Oratory in Cornell University. Boston, D. C. Heath & Co. 65 cents.

This is not a reader's book of selections by any means. It is a book containing more valuable suggestions on the subject of reading naturally than were ever crowded inside of covers before. In the first place, the writer is a teacher and it seems probable that this book is simply his class lectures. Be this as it may, it is an invaluable book for any one who wishes to excel in the art of speaking and reading naturally. He discourses on the control of the breath, how to cure faults, consonant sounds, articulation, inflection, applications. As this is the latest book on the subject, so it is the best. It is a treatise that no student can afford to overlook. While scarcely more than a primer in size, it contains all the essentials. Since the publication of Monroec's Vocal Gymnastics, there has been nothing so good as this book, on the subject.

In every home which seeks brightness and attraction there is a place for that most excellent magazine, Good Housekeeping. It is not alone that it is of interest to the housewife, for even pater familias, and most certainly all the younger members of the household, will find in its pages an abundance to interest and instruct. The January number begins a new volume, and one which from the promise of the initial issue will be exceptionally attractive. It is printed from new type, which adds to the beauty of its appearance. It is a sound, sensible journal, which deals with the every-day facts of life in a way to make the problems of the hour more easy of solution; to increase the happiness and diminish the discomforts of life. Published by Clark W. Bryan & Co., Springfield, Mass.

The January number of Lippincott's Magazine is marked by several new features: the first of sundry stories and sketches illustrating journalistic life and labors; the first of a series of articles on athletic subjects; an editorial department headed "As it Seems," containing brief essays and comments on various topics of the times, literary and other; and notices of several recent books, given in the form of dialogue.

This is the season for calendars, and Mr. Chas. E. Grant, Insurance Agent at No. 352 Main Street, is improving it by sending out some specimens, that are particularly beautiful. He has taken four noteworthy military situations and makes these the background for his calendar. The series include Grant at Missionary Ridge, Sherman at Atlanta, Logan at Kenesaw Mountain and Sheridan's Ride. All are exceedingly spirited well executed colored pictures, not only useful today, but they are admirable reminders of stirring Rebellion days.

President Harrison's daughter, Mrs. McKee, has written her first article. It treats of "The Training of Children," and will be printed in the February issue of 'The Ladies' Home Journal.

A Whittier Quotation Calendar has been printed by C. W. Burbank & Co. It is one of the finest instances of literary taste and artistic printing that Worcester has ever gotten out. There is a picture of Whittier and the quotations are all selected for this special purpose. The first one is from "To My Old Schoolmaster" and naturally enough one of the early copies finds its way into LIGHT's office for in the not very remote days the younger Burbank was a pupil of the writer. The scheme of the calendar was suggested by a visit during the year to the home of the aged poet. Tied with crimson ribbon, the calendar is worthy a place in every home where Whittier is revered.

Mr. Howells' New Work.

The announcement that Mr. Howells will leave Harper's Magazine, to take editorial charge of the Cosmopolitan, on March 1st, calls attention to the process of building up the staff of a great magazine. Probably in no month has the evolution been so distinctly under the eyes of the public as in the case of the Cosmopolitan. The first step after editorial control was assumed by Mr. John Brisson Walker, was to add to it Edward Everett Hale, who took charge of a department called "Social Problems," subjects concerning which the greatest number of people are thinking today. Mr. Hale, who is a student, a fair minded man, a thorough American and a man of broad sympathies, has filled this position in a way to attract the attention not only of this country, but of leading European journals. Some months later, a department was established called "The Review of Current Events." To take charge of this, a man was needed who should be familiar not only with the great events of the past thirty years, but who knew personally the leading men of both the United States and Europe who could interpret motives and policies. Murat Halstead accepted this position with the distinct understanding that his monthly review should be philosophical and never partisan. The next step in the history of the Cosmopolitan, was the placing of the review of the intellectual movement of the month in the hands of Mr. Brander Matthews, who for some time has been recognized as one of the two or three ablest critics in the United States.

Finally came the acceptance of the editorship conjointly with Mr. Walker, by Mr. Wm. Dean Howells. Mr. Howells, who is recognized universally as the foremost American of letters, upon the expiration of his contract with Harper Brothers, on the first of March will take in hand the destinies of a magazine which promises to exercise a share of influence with the reading classes of the United States. His entire services will be given to the Cosmopolitan, and everything he writes will appear in that magazine during the continuance of his editorship.

The Century for January. Contents

Portrait of Charles François Gounod, Frontispiece; The Jews in New York, Richard Wheatley, pictures by Irving R. Wildes, Otto H.bacher, C. A. Needham; Milan Cathedral, Douglas Sladen; The Nauviah, a story of West and East, III, Rudyard Kipling, Wolcott Balestier; Andrea Del Sarto, (Italian Old Masters) W. J. Stillman, engravings and note by Timothy Cole; Custer's Last Battle, by one of his troop commanders, Capt. E. S. Godfrey, comments by Gen. James B. Fry, pictures by Frederic Remington, and after photographs; Gounod in Italy and Germany, Charles François Gounod; The Jewish Question, Josephus; The Cloud Maiden, William Wilfred Campbell; The Alligator Hunters of Louisiana, Andrews Wilkinson, pictures by Marie Guise, George H. Clement, and J. C. Beard; Witchcraft, J. M. Buckley, head-piece by Theodore Bauer; A Parting Guest, Meredith Nicholson; Characteristics, III, S. Weir Mitchell, M. D.; Dolce Fra Niente, from a painting by W. H. Low, (See Open Letters); A Garland, Frank Dempster Sherman; New Year's Eve, Alice Williams Brotherton, picture and decorations by George Wharton Edwards; Bentley's System, Viola Roseboro' pictures by C. D. Gibson; The Discontent of the Farmer, J. R. Dodge; A Battle in Crackerdom, Harry Stillwell Edwards, pictures by E. W. Kemble; Sonnet on the Sonnet, Inigo Deane; Interludes, Fireflies—A Parable—Art—Transformation—Death Defied, Thomas Bailey Aldrich. Topics of the Time: The Progressive Discovery of America, Alabama's Thousand-Dollar-a-Day Blunder, Mississippi's Crop-Moving Currency, Attacks Upon Public Parks, "Progress of Ballot Reform," Colorado, Open Letters: M. Gounod and his Ideals, H. E. Krehbiel; The Camp Norton Controversy, W. R. Holloway, John A. Wyeth; Will H. Low, W. Lewis Fraser; Notes on "General Miles's Indian Campaigns," George L. Spiving, G. W. Baird. In Lighter Vein: Songs of Ireland, Jennie E. T. Dowe; An Old Belle, L. W. Reese; The Silent Partner, Edith M. Thomas; Reflections, J. A. Macon; A Lover's Plaint, Mary Ainge De Vere; The Last Song, George Horton; Only a Hint, George Mooré.

Everything in The Century merits reading, but this is a busy age, so each one will pick out the parts of the magazine that most please his fancy. Of course he will linger over Gounod's portrait and, if musical, will read the sketch. The Jews in New York is a mine not much worked. The Kipling story will have its readers, if for no other reason than that the writer is one of the latest fads. Custer's Last Battle will please every one who has learned of the gallant trooper, dead in our centennial year. Is J. M. Buckley's article on Witchcraft inspired by the fact that 1892 is the bi-centennial of the Salem horrors? The Discontent of the Farmer is one of the most timely of all the contents of the number. The Topics of the Times are, as ever, pertinent to the day and age. How they will sound to the antiquary one hundred years hence. A Battle in Crackerdom is one of those delightful Southern sketches that the times, since the war, have developed. Dialect always has a charm.

Ballou's Monthly Magazine, Boston, G. W. Studley, for January has its accustomed entertaining contents. It is the solace of many an hour, when diverting reading is sought. Fact and fiction are judiciously blended. Every body who has read Robinson Crusoe, and who has not, will enjoy an interesting account of a visit to the island of Juan Fernan dez.

Mr. John F. Crowell, Insurance, 344 Main Street, has the Pilgrim exiles as the figures overlooking Plymouth harbour and the days of the year. The effect is fine.

This is the month for Calendar distribution. The ubiquitous small boy is on hand "Got any calendars?" is heard a dozen times a day and if he goes to the right place, he doubtless gets what he goes for.

F. S. Blanchard & Co. advertise their extensive printing business by a very plain yet clear calendar.

Blair, the photographer, lets a superlatively beautiful maiden serve as the carrier for the year 1892.

Pinkham & Willis have impressed the same delightful feminine service as their messenger. The scene is like one from Snow Bound.

Leach, Shewell and Sanborn, Boston Publishers, send out their compliments along with a convenient glass paper weight, with the calendar arranged to show through. Very handy and sure to keep the donor's name in mind.

Scientific American.

If you are interested in Natural History, you will find much on that subject in Scientific American for December. The ostriches of the Central Park Menagerie, New York, are described, as is also the chacma, or South African Baboon. The tortois s of Galapagos Islands are edible, and furnish much food to vessels that stop there. Oregon boasts of a horse with mane and tail so long as to trail on the ground; the article is accompanied with an illustration.

Scientific American, weekly, $3 a year. Munn & Co. N. Y.

The Chautauquan.

The January number contains no less than thirty two illustrations, including, as in a former number, a page of faces of contributors and of noted women. The article on Richter by Maurice Thompson is accompanied with several pictures of his famous paintings. There is much to interest the reader whether he be a "Chautauquan" or not. Two dollars is a small price for such a magazine, but that is all that is asked for it. Meadville, Pa.

The Author of the "Old Oaken Bucket."

"Who is there that has not sung or read or heard 'The Old Oaken Bucket'?" says George M. Young in the January New England Magazine. "Many musical compositions have been set to its lines, and it has been translated into many languages; it has gone the rounds of the civilized world for more than two generations. And how many know the name of the author? He was Samuel Woodworth and was born in Scituate, Plymouth County, Massachusetts, January 13, 1685. He came to Boston and chose the profession of a printer, binding himself to Benjamin Russell, then editor of the Columbian Sentinel, with whom he remained until 1806 and while serving his apprenticeship he contributed poetry to the different periodicals then published in Boston under the signature of "Selina." The only poem of his which has survived is the "Old Oaken Bucket," which he wrote while editing the Mirror in New York with George P. Morris.

"Waiting."

BERTHA BRIDGMAN DAVIS.

The sleepy little village of True reposes by the side of the great and fearful ocean. The few farm houses scattered here and there, nestle under some of the numerous hills, or stand erect on a summit defying the fierce winds and mighty breaths of the sea: when in times of madness they grapple with the waves and fling them upon the shore.

The stranger on entering the town would almost suppose the inhabitants were tiptoeing on errands for the departed, and the distant sound of the woodman's adze might be the dull thud of the hammer, as the lid is made fast against any eruptive power beneath, and the clouds fall upon the gloomy roof.

Not far back from the beautiful beach stands the little white church with its directing finger ever pointing upward, while beneath in the churchyard, the white slabs, like sentinels, keep guard over the empty graves and bear the record, however false, of those that are gone.

Neighbor to the church, is Squire Smith's home, where Aunt Hannah moves, priest like, within its precincts, before the sills and window frames of immaculate whiteness that rise before the vision of Mabel, the Squire's only child, like tablets within a shrine; whereon is written her aunt's creed—pure, stately and cold.

There on the cliff, overlooking the sea, is Aunt Polly's place. The house stands braced against the sea breezes, in pomp and power, for here the summer boarders come, and all the gossip of the town is centered.

We enter through the gate, constructed in the old turnstile fashion. The whitewashed fence is lined with newly polished milk cans and bright pans of all sizes. The sense that seems most affected is touched by the faint aroma that issues from the barnyard; but the eye quickly catches the variegated flower garden, over which are flying like ensigns from the whitewashed pickets a few cloth strainers, several pairs of home made socks and a pair of trousers keeping guard near the gate. And as one really takes in the hospitable aspect of the back yard, he intuitively glances at the back porch and sees a couple of dish towels waving a welcome in the door-way, and with one sweep of the eye takes in the good old style New England farm house, painted white with green blinds, and the front door in the rear, where the morning glories climb peeping in at the windows. It was the eventful time of the year.

Housecleaning and spring work in general had come and the advent of summer boarders, which not only caused Aunt Polly's west rooms to be thrown open and the feather beds to be seen dangling from the windows, but awoke the town from its reverie, while the maidens stood on tiptoe in expectancy, forsooth that some city swain desiring the pleasures of the shore, might be reminded of his fondness for some country cousin and come to spend his holidays.

But this time, the light of that day appeared overcast, in the going out to sea of so many of their number. Uncle Joe remarked as he pulled off his cowhide boots for the more agreeable condition of stocking feet: "Wall Polly, wall, 'spose them 'ere boys agoin' to take to the sea; what in kingsake they want to turn to haulin' in fish fur, when they might stay at home and be comfortable." But all Uncle Joe's soliloquies and Aunt Polly's admonitions failed to turn the minds of their boys. At the party next night it was remarked that Ben seemed in a more contemplative mood than usual. If he had a girl to leave behind him no wonder, but Ben, Aunt Polly's boy, was everybody's sweetheart and nobody's beau.

'Twas a jolly set of boys and girls that met to bid farewell to the sailors. Ben foremost in fun and the leader in the orchestra, was, however, unusually sober, or at least appeared so, as he sat perched on the top of the long kitchen bench, with fiddle in position and bow suspended, ready for tuning up.

Across the room, J. Henry Warden, Aunt Polly's brother, was paring an apple and told Mabel Smith her fate would be decided that night, and as a comforting thought to the expectant declared the letter J was the most general one made by apple paring and feeling quite confident of his case, drew the knife around and around the fruit, making a good long paring. Fearing lest some unconscious stroke might have ruined his hopes he partly held up the wavering chain and found on investigation that the shepherd's crook was fast growing into a link and still one half the apple lay in its rosy shell; however, the fated knife must continue its cutting purpose till one heart is severed and two hearts made one and owing to some of Dame Nature's bad work, the link was cemented by a notch half way down the pretty J and then with cle r sailing another link was made. Mabel looked first at the letter, then across to Ben. There was a mutual understanding in that quick intelligible dialect, which eyes alone can speak and all three saw a perfect B. Ben's fiddle did his feelings justice after that and he played as he never played before.

The orchestra was called for and began tuning up. The fiddle yielded forth its unutterable sounds as when all amateurs are "getting ready." The girl behind the comb, which was done up in thin paper, began her screeching and the cheap horn was blown by the cheeky boy, whose efforts seem to be mainly to hide his cheap feelings by the gurgling sounds which issued from his windpipe by the aid of his unmusical trumpet.

To a student of classical music, the delicate membrane of the ear would no doubt have received a fearful shock, for as the time neared the wee small hours the young people became intoxicated with mirth. The "Virginia reel" continued into an "Irish fling" and when the serenade to the jolly tars was at its height Aunt Polly declared "Them boys ad girls will raise the roof or maybe get through to the cellar." But a gentle remonstrance brought them once more to their equilibrium, and to Ben the realities of life seemed as near as the frivolities of the evening just gone.

The goodbyes, the farewells were said. We follow our three boys to their cottage. J. Henry Warden and Alfred, Ben's youngest brother, occupied the big bed in the west chamber, and Ben had a cot by himself under the shelter of the eaves, in company with corn cobs, herbs and rats that infested that corner of the attic; but the sight of that beautiful expanse of water that met his gaze from out of the window, more than compensated for any misery of sleepless nights that the rats or other inhabitants ever had brought to his healthy frame.

The boys in the generous bed influenced by the excess of night's balmy draught were well along in dreamland, but the occupant above forgot to look out of his window at his cherished picture where in happy moods and dull he had feasted his appetite for art. A break in the general routine of his life had come.

To hear the wind getting up at sea; to hear the waves comely slyly kissing the sandy beach and then as if sure of their prey rush with fury upon the broad stretch which lay pale and still in the moonlight—this had no terror for him. The would-be sailor had already learned to knuckle down to sterner feelings, when in time of peril only the brave heart and steady hand is master at the helm.

Was he remembering the last storm when the vessel was pitched and rolled by the sea's mad endeavor, while all on board were calm excepting our sailor lad, whose hidden, untutored feelings corresponded with the wind and the waves?

Was his mood one of misgiving at the last moment? Oh, no! His memory would recall the beautiful dawning of a morn when the sun is seen in all his glory, no chimney near to send forth a dye that would smirch the colors.

Ah! Was it vain anticipations of glorious triumph over a watery grave, or an expected cargo exchanged for gold at some great port? No! 'Twas no mighty worldly gain, or a little fame that had caused this reflective mood.

The boy had become a man.

He had learned heart's lesson and told the "Old, old story," and was pondering on what the sequel might be. 'Twas no faltering to end in retreat tomorrow; no fear of a tossing vessel when Heaven's artillery is booming and Nature is in her wildest mood.

'Twas only a little hand, a very little hand for a country maiden to own, that was shyly placed in the outstretched palm of her fisher lover.

The apple paring had a mission. 'Twas long ago the cords of love first vibrated, but not till last night at the parting did they realize they were in such harmony, and with a lover's boldness Ben told the "Old old story" but in his own way. "Will you wait for me, Mabel?" Silence is golden sometimes, for a beautiful light came into the sunburnt face as nearer he bent and felt the throbbing of her heart, and she, gently pressing his hand, answered—but in her own way.

CHAPTER II.

During the next four years nothing occurred to disturb the monotony in the quiet secluded village of True.

To be sure, each Summer the west blinds were thrown open at the cottage and the feather beds were hung basking in the sun. But this time Ben's cot in the attic was dressed in its usual night vestments, for Ben, Aunt Polly's boy, and the pride of the village, was coming home. And Henry Warden was expected from the city. Not since the jolly party met to bid farewell to the sailors, had he been to his favorite resort, and his advent was looked forward to with as much excitement as the expected arrival of a city school-marm to teach in the district school.

Mabel put on a blue ribbon that evening because the pretty girl in the glass told her it was very becoming.

Oh! The wiles of a maiden's heart. Is it always true to itself?

But the town was deaf to the journeying of the lumbering, jostling, rattling coach, for at a late hour it ground its tedious way through the hot sand; the lash of the long whip was heard only by the hills and its answering echo died on the night air. Soon Henry Warden was feeling the magic influence of Aunt Polly's feather bed. A week had passed. And like a vixen natural man, Henry Warden had fallen in love, and unfortunately coveted forbidden fruit. Four years before he left the object of his love as one of the country girls.

She had, as one of the old salts had remarked, "Such gentle ways and purty blue eyes," and slight and willowy form. Now, while riding up and down on the gentle waves the same girlish type appeared before his vision but so developed into womanly loveliness that she was indeed a maiden fair to see.

Her chestnut curls lay clustered upon her brow, and fell like a drapery around her lovely throat and shoulders; the beauty of her countenance was only enhanced by two beautiful eyes of blue, her chief attraction, combined with winning ways, not easily resisted. He felt his weakness, and leaning on his oars, gazed out upon the ocean's vast expanse and saw in reflection a ship, whereon was a gay sailor, homeward bound.

He drew his gaze from that picture and tried to look far out into the broad future, but beyond a glimpse into that unknown period all was a blank. No mother; no home; and to the one he loved he dared not speak his heart, for he thought—yes, she loved me, but not as she loved Ben. Ah! He reflected on the wonderful fact that everything has a present, past and future. One can no more turn the leaves in this book of life and read that which is not yet than he can look back upon its pages and blot out that which has been. 'Tis as impossible to comprehend the fullness of the present as to mark out the future and realize one's heart's desires.

Thus he communed with himself as the gray shadows of evening were falling around him. Mabel too was thinking, thinking just the way fond girls will do.

She strolled down the garden path and after reaching the shore, walked up and down the beach watching the waves that were bearing her dearest hopes toward home. Never did the sun go down with brighter glory unless on that memorable eve four years before. Never did the moon rise with wilder radiance over the quiet village, unless 'twas when the man in the moon, with gouty cheek, looked down and blinked at the house once white, whose clap-boards time and Nature's tears had tinted; seemingly unconscious of the whisperings of a youthful pair, as the young man in sailor's garb whispered, "Will you wait for me, Mabel?"

Tomorrow he was coming (as sure as sailors can be) and at the same gate with the same moon looking down, Mabel, in her great happiness bade her companion good night with an unconscious fervor that started the warm current from somewhere, which diffused itself through his frame.

That night in his dreams, raising his head from the pillow, he saw a fair maiden about to enter through the window. She had the same sweet countenance of her who had bidden him "Good night!" so tenderly, although it was older and true love had left its indelible marks on the face. As she loitered upon the sill to arrange her garment, which fell in perfect grace down to her feet, she disclosed a pair of wings; then gliding swiftly to his bedside, the Angel recalled to him delightful pictures. Life seemed so beautiful as she said with angelic sweetness "Don't you remember, Oh! Don't you remember long ago? Have you forgotten when we picked the bright berries down in the marshes, and the lovely white roses on the hillside? How we gathered shells on the beach and kicked and splashed as the ocean's waves kissed bare feet? Have you forgotten your little companion? She is an Angel now and has come to leave a charge with you. It is 'Forget me not.'"

Raising himself a little more, for just a closer look, the gray dawn stole upon his eyelids and his lovely vision was gone. Awaking but still with that picture so plainly visible, he strained his sight to see if some foot print might yet be warm on the sill, but his gaze became fixed on the misty heaviness of the aspect. The wind was already rising and was high all day.

Diamonds.

Our boy, recently, took a little tour of observation along Main Street. At the dinner table, after said trip, he says, "What is there about diamonds to make them cost so much? Where do they come from?" A parental voice replies, "South Africa and Brazil. Why do you ask?" "Oh, I looked into a store window and I saw a plain brass ring with a diamond in marked $20.6. I couldn't see what there was so very nice about it either and I can't see what that hundred dollars was for. Twenty-six cents is more than I pay for rings." This story teaches that appreciation of the beautiful is a matter of culture and education.

Rev. J. O. Knowles, D. D. took part in the Quarter Centennial exercises at Grace M. E. Church, Springfield, last Sunday.

Among those who now know all about La Grippe, may be mentioned J. Stewart Brown, treasurer of the Five Cents Savings Bank and James H. Churchill, Senior Vice Commander of the state department G. A. R.

The Sun—in 1816.

Haijze's, a Dutch poet, seems in the following lines to have enumerated all the attributes of the God of day. This translation is from the Batavian Anthology

But by thee I'll not be driven Fiercely shining lamp on high—
Measurer of our days from Heaven—
Year disposer—glorious eve!
Mist absorber—Spring retainer—
Day prologuer—Summer's mate;
Beast annoyer—visage burner—
Fair-one's spoiler—maiden's hate—
Cloud disperser—darkness breaker—
Moon surpriser—azimuth thief,
Torch conductor—shadow maker—
Rogue discoverer—eye's relief,
Linen bleacher—noiseless stroller,
All-observer—gliding ail—
Dust disturber—planet roller—
Traveler's friend and day-break's call—

Awfully Expensive.

"Lord Lytton, although he died as British ambassador at Paris, an office which carries with it a salary of about sixty thousand dollars a year, besides allowances, and had been Viceroy of India, has left his wife and children poor."

These foreigners are great fellows to spend money. The above salary is ten thousand a year more than our President gets. Lord Dufferin has always had a big salary when in place, but when out, he and his wife live in cheap quarters in Paris under the name of Temple. They should save against a rainy day.

Booming Soap.

London journals assert that a check for ten thousand pounds sterling, recently received by the treasurer of the Gladstone Liberals from a local soap firm, was paid for a few words from the "Grand Old Man" indorsing the firm's soap for advertising purposes.

General Booth's daughter, "La Marechale," who is in command of the Salvation Army in France and Switzerland, and is now proselyting in this country, is a tall, slender, and very graceful girl, with a fresh English face, to which the blue bonnet of her order lends an additional attractiveness. She possesses an indomitable spirit, as was shown by the influence she exerted over the rough canaille of Paris, who attended her meetings. Altogether she is a most picturesque character for the nineteenth century—a Joan of Arc in time of peace.

A celebrated German physician was once called upon to treat an aristocratic lady, the sole cause of whose complaint was high living and lack of exercise. But it would never do to tell her so, so his medical advice ran thus: "Arise at five o'clock, take a walk in the park for one hour, and take a cup of chocolate. Take breakfast at eight." Her condition improved visibly, until one fine morning the carriage of the baroness was seen to approach the physician's residence at lightning speed. The patient dashed up to the doctor's office, and on his appearing on the scene she gasped out: "Oh, doctor, I took the chocolate first." "Then drive home as fast as you can," ejaculated the astute disciple of Esculap, rapidly writing a prescription, "and take this emetic. The tea must be underneath." The grateful patient complied. She is still improving.—Argonaut.

After Christmas.

A little incident connected with buying Christmas presents happened in a St. Louis store that made quite a romance. The store was packed with people hunting for Christmas gifts. Two little girls, the eldest barely nine, standing outside, were noticed by a lady who left her carriage to enter the store. The little girls were poorly dressed. The little ones wanted to go in the store, but seemed afraid to enter. A rush came and they were caught in the crowd and whirled into the store. There they appeared enraptured with the beautiful things they saw. The lady had entirely forgotten her own errand and kept near the little girls. Finally they began a whispered conversation and kept pointing to an article on a counter; then the oldest reached the counter and timidly asked the saleswoman the price of a red worsted hood. The answer was, "Two dollars and twenty-five cents." The little girl's countenance fell, and opening her hand she began to count some pennies she held. The open hand showed the lady just nine cents. The little one joined her sister. She was disappointed, and the two girls counted their money over and over, then took another look at the hood and walked away. The lady made her way to the counter, and, making a confidant of the saleswoman, told her she wanted the little ones to have the hood, for which she would pay herself, but did not intend that the girls should know that it was not their own money that bought the hood. The saleswoman became interested at once, and leaning forward she beckoned to the girls and said, "How much money can you pay for this beautiful red hood?" The eyes of both brightened, and without answering the child put forward all she had in the world—her nine pennies. "What are you going to do with this hood?" the saleswoman asked. "Give it to mamma for her Christmas," exclaimed both at once. The lady turned away and placed her handkerchief to her face to hide the tears that filled her eyes. Another question made her turn toward the children again. "Did you save all this money for Christmas?" "Yes," answered both. "How long have you been saving this money?" This answer was a long time coming and finally the oldest one replied that she did not know, but part was Bessie's and part her own. "Well," said the saleswoman, who received a knowing nod from the lady, "since you have been saving so long I'll let you have this hood for the nine cents." The money was handed over, the package done up, and the little ones went away happy, both wanting to carry the precious bundle, and both laughing and crying with delight about the present for mamma. The following morning just as the store was opened a poor woman entered with a small bundle and two little girls. After looking around the older girl pointed to the hood counter and was at once recognized by the friendly saleswoman. The party walked toward the counter and the older girl, pointing to the saleswoman, said, "That's her." The little ones were trembling; the mother looked anxious, and could hardly ask, "Did this hood come from here, miss?" The saleswoman noticed the bundle, and answered, "Yes." "Well," said the mother, "that hood is marked $2.25, and my little girls tell me they bought it for nine cents. I have never known them to lie to me, but I am sorry to say I could not believe them this time. I was so afraid to come into the store and ask, but I must know the truth; please tell me about it, for I haven't slept a wink all night, though the little girls said it was a Christmas present, and I was afraid—I was afraid"—the tears now stopped the mother's words. The saleswoman could stand it no longer and leaning over the counter she whispered the whole story to the mother. The oldest girl could not understand why her mother took her in her arms and kissed her. Then all three went home.—St. Louis Spectator.

An Invention.

Somebody has said that a colored man never had invented any thing. That must have been a long time ago, for things are different now. It is not such a long time since James D. Smith was a boy in the Dix Street school. On leaving the school, he was a coachman for a while, then he became a cook at the Worcester Club on Elm Street. Now he is at the Colonnade on Front Street. This is only prefatory to the fact that he has letters patent on a machine for grinding up bread, a very useful appliance, where bread puddings are made in quantity and where stale bread accumulates. Already, the indications are that he has an exceedingly valuable property in his invention. His friends wish him success.

Willard Cummings.

He was an aged man. Had he lived till next May his age would have been eighty-nine years. He was a native of Stamford, Conn., and came from that place to Brookfield, Mass., working there in the foundry of Wm. A. Wheeler and when the latter moved to Worcester, Mr. Cummings moved, also, and continued in Wm. Wheeler's employ ten years or till he sold out. Then he worked for Ruggles, Nourse & Mason fifteen years. Since then he has had no regular employment, doing odd jobs as he could find them.

Twenty-three years since or when Grace Church worshiped in Washburn Hall, he joined and has been a member ever since and no one was more faithful in the observance of his Christian duties. Among the people of Grace Church, he was long known as "Father" Cummings, always an object of love and respect. Christmas morning he fell and received a serious injury on account of which he was removed to the City Hospital, where he died Friday, the 1st, inst. His funeral was held Sunday afternoon in Grace Church, the Rev. J. D. Pickles of Trinity officiating. The burial was at Hope Cemetery. His wife died many years ago. He leaves a daughter and a son, the latter a physician in New Haven. It is probable that, had he lived, he would soon have been admitted to the Old Men's Home, as measures were being taken to that end. Among those who contributed to his comfort in his last days mention should be made of Mrs. Dr. Tracy who was a friend indeed.

Miss Flora E. Simmons from Vassar, Miss Iva Smith from Smith College and Miss Winnie Hill from Wellesley made LIGHT a call during their vacation.

Body and Soul.

BY MARY WOODWARD WEATHERSEE.

Two comrades they, the body and the soul,
Tethered awhile, upon life's sunny knoll,
Following in turn, on each day led;
Began to wonder at their state and sigh,
That one should live to see the other die,
Nor even of its love have need.
"Albeit I must leave you," said the soul,
"I go, thine angel, to the heavenly goal;
A surer spirit for thy grace;
Who marks the sparrow's fall, shall guard thy dust;
Gather its perfume, for another trust,
And give it love's best place."
Worcester, Nov. 1891.

Prof. W. P. Brooks of Amherst will address the Society January 15th on the fruits and flowers of Japan.

Mayflowers.

Mr. Charles H. Carpenter has received from friends in Cottage City a box of Arbutus picked there New Years Day. It is evident that our seasons are going fast. Boys will be snow balling next July to pay for this.

W. C. T. U.

This energetic body has elected officers for the ensuing year. They are as follows:

President Mrs. M. M. Townsend, re-elected; 1st vice-president, Mrs. W. E. Cole; 2d vice-president, Mrs. S. Angie Wheeler; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. D. Knight; recording secretary, Mrs. Emma Ware; treasurer, Mrs. Belle Howe.

Miss Elizabeth S. Tobey, President of the State W. C. T. U. having been secured to give Bible readings beginning Jan. 15, Mrs. J. V. Simmons was appointed to secure Plymouth Vestry if possible. Her appearance here should be warmly greeted.

Tatnuck Farmers.

Those happy citizens began the new year with an all day's meeting in the very useful hall of that locality. President Kinney presided and practical questions were discussed by Messrs. Chas. T. Foster of Holden, E. F., Chamberlain, Chas. Greenwood, Elliott Moore L. J. Kendall, M. H. Sears, W. C. Jewett, B. J. Snow, Geo. H. Rich, and others. Dinner was served by Mrs. W. W. Clapp and Misses, Emma T. and Sarah C. Kinney. There will be no abandoned farms in Tatnuck. January 15th, Jos. S. Perry will give his reminiscences of foreign travel.

Is It True.

Chauncey Depew said, in the course of his address to the Fellowship Club, in Chicago, that after a man has passed forty years of age he makes no new friends.

Is he Crazy.

"An extraordinary rumor is current in Europe to the effect that Emporor William is on the eve of submitting himself to a medical examination of an international character, in order to offer a conclusive refutation to the assertions in the English, the French, and the American press that he is more or less insane." Is there a physician in Germany who dares rule his empuror of unsound mind? Le Sage's story of the nephew and his uncle, the bishop, applies here.

The Oratorio Festival.

The second concert of Mr. E. N. Anderson's oratorio festival began last week Friday afternoon, with an orchestral number, Raff's Festival March, a new composition to Worcester audiences. It was given an excellent rendering by the orchestra and in view of the fact that they had rehearsed it but once, the performance was the more remarkable. And right here it may be said that Mr. Anderson expresses himself as very well pleased with the work of the orchestra during the whole of the festival.

The second number was a soprano solo, Lachner's "Be Thou with me" (new), by Mrs. J. W. Mitchell, followed by Smart's 23d Psalm for ladies' chorus with orchestral accompaniment by Mr. Anderson. Both were well done. The fourth number was one of the best of the afternoon. It was a new composition of Guilmant, a fantasia on two church tunes for orchestra, organ and two harps. This work, also, was given with almost no rehearsing and, even if no allowance was made for that fact, very creditable to all the performers. The harp parts were played on two pianos by Miss Mary Tucker and Mr. Arthur Bassett and their imitation of the harp was so perfect that, had the pianos been out of sight, it would have been difficult to have believed that the music did not come from harps.

In the next number, two selections from Mr. Anderson's new cantata "The Christ Child" were given. This is the first composition of length which Mr. Anderson has attempted and consequently much interest centered about its first performance. The verdict after the performance of these two selections and the one in the evening was one of universal satisfaction and praise. The selections given in the afternoon were a ladies' chorus without accompaniment, "He shall give His angels" and an intermezzo for orchestra, "The Holy Night." The sixth number was the contralto solo, "Love not the world" from Sullivan's Prodigal Son, sung in her usual good voice by Miss Nellie Broadbent. The concert concluded with Mackenzie's "Benedictus" (new) for the orchestra, a very fitting conclusion for so excellent a concert.

In the evening the program included the oriental scene from "The Christ Child," all that was ever finished of Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Christus" and selections from Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The oriental scene, more than the selections from the same cantata given in the afternoon, proves Mr. Anderson's ability as an orchestral composer. In this as in all other places the orchestra rose fully equal to the occasion, even the composer himself being very much pleased with its comprehension of his work. The public awaits with great eagerness for a time when the whole cantata may be heard.

The soloists for the "Christus" and "Elijah" were Mrs. Henry F. Harris, soprano; Mrs. J. W. Mitchell, soprano; Mrs. F. W. Ruggles, contralto; Mr. Frank H. Mason, tenor; Mr. Thomas Hamilton, tenor; Mr. John H. Howell, bass; Mr. W. A. Anderson, bass. Where all did so wonderfully well it would be an injustice to praise any single one.

At many more pretentious undertakings the solo work does not equal that of Friday night. The chorus work also was magnificent. Indeed that adjective is the word which sums up in itself a description of the whole festival.

Much has been said on the question whether Worcester is a musical city or not but when she can carry out, without any outside aid, save that of an orchestra, such a festival as this, it cannot be said that she is wholly devoid of musical taste and talent.

About Folks.

Miss Cora A. Durgin returned to Mt. Holyoke College Tuesday.

Mr. Lewis T. Reed, Amherst, '93, returned to college Tuesday.

Miss Ida E. Metcalf of Ashland has been visiting at 5 Dix Street.

Mr. George Holmes, our old time Worcester friend, now in Springfield has had a severe attack of the grip.

Mr. Frank J. Metcalf of LIGHT, has had the prevailing complaint, necessitating a cessation from work for a while.

Messrs. George E. and Herbert F. Burrage and their sister, Miss Gertrude A. have returned to Cornell University after the Holiday vacation.

Librarian S. S. Green is a good man to have in the congregation for when the Rev. Mr. Garver found himself unable to continue his morning service, last Sunday at the 1st Unitarian, Mr. Green completed it and in the evening took the pastor's place.

The next meeting of the Worcester Art Society will be held in Colonial Hall, 321 Front Street, Tuesday evening, January 12th, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Ernest Francisco Penolosa, the distinguished authority in Japanese Art, will give a lecture, to be illustrated by lantern slides, on "Epochs in Japanese Art."

All the way from Los Angeles, California, comes a New Year's card, bearing congratulations from W. A. Vandercook and his two boys, Arthur and Roscoe. As their other names are Blaine and Conking respectively, it wouldn't be strange if at some time they fell out. The card itself is quite Californian, having pictures of the lads individually and also in a goat drawn wagon. A Winter Scene in Los Angeles is the title of the letter. LIGHT returns many congratulations to the happy surroundings of Southern California.

Mrs. Battelle of number three Dix Street evidently understands the fun children have dressing up in their elders' clothes, and New Year's night she prepared a little tableau party and, gathering all the children in the neighborhood, allowed them to dress for the different pictures. They enjoyed it hugely. The audience was not large consisting only of the family and such of the children as were not in the scene presented. This practice of dressing up for fun may be witnessed almost any time on our street. Little boys in very long trousers and tall hats, big coats and immense shoes, little girls with peculiar bonnets and carrying a long expanse of train in the way of a sheet plainly seen to be fit only for the ragman. They scurry about and peep out to wait for the passing man or woman eager to be seen and yet a little bashful.

Survivors.

In 1854, June 14, when the famous Merrifield fire took place, 61 individuals and firms were burned out that day, the larger part being tenants of Mr. Merrifield. With the exception of two or three he has outlived them all. The only ones whom LIGHT can name are Alonzo Whitcomb and James H. Bancroft. Two days after the fire he invited all his tenants together at his home. He said, "I am sorry for the occasion that prompts me to call you here, but I am glad to see you. What I want to know now is, how many of you will want room and power and how much, for I propose to rebuild at once, and I shall build to fit, much if you need it, and if not, only what I need myself." He also said, "Gentlemen, I don't own a building in the world. All I owned was lost in the fire." He was then living in what is now the Waldo House on Waldo Street.

During the fire, beginning just after noon and lasting till nearly 5 o'clock, Mr. Merrifield handed his pocket book to Col. Isaac Davis saying "Mr. Davis I wish you would take this wallet containing $3,000, go to the Mechanic's Bank and pay a note due to-day. I am busy and can't go." Mr. Davis took the book and did the errand as requested. Mr. Merrifield, full of years, and venerable, is still a man of business in our midst. He is a "Grand old man," England has not the only one.

Addison A. Hunt.

The death of this old school teacher at his home in Barre will arouse recollections in many a Worcester resident's mind. From 1855 to 1873, with a year's interval, he was a Grammar School principal here, holding such positions at Sycamore, Woodland and Dix Streets. The days of his stay were not altogether untroubled, but he succeeded in imparting a deal of information. He died the last of the year and was buried the first day of 1892.

C. Y. W. S.

The Catholic Young Women's Society of the Sacred Heart Church gave a New Year's party at their rooms on Sheridan Street. The evening was pleasantly passed with music and games. Great merriment was caused by the suggestive articles given from the Christmas tree. Reboiled served refreshments.

General Devers.

Thursday was the anniversary of the death of Worcester's distinguished citizen. During the year, we have heard much of his shining qualities, his speeches have been printed and two monuments are in contemplation, one in Boston, the other here. His fame is secure.

A Correction.

Mr. Samuel Davis was selectman in 1846, so Mr. Albert Curtis is not the sole survivor. His home is at 58 Kendall Street. He was once in business with Nourse, Mason & Co.

Curious Corner.

A Classical Gambler.

There died in Boston the other day a tramp printer named Gerard, who was an accomplished classical scholar. He was perpetually begging in printing offices. Once he had twenty-five cents, and begged a printer named Jones to give him a nickle to make up thirty. "Well," said Jones, "I've got no nickle, but here's a quarter. Put yours against it and we'll toss to see who has them both."

Gerard hesitated, but the chance of making at one stroke a half-dollar dazzled him. "I'll have to go you," he said.

They threw; Gerard lost, and Jones pocketed the two quarters. Gerard stood a moment motionless, prostrated by despair. Then he broke forth into a classical apostrophe that for pure grief would have left Niobe nowhere. He quoted the "Auri sacra fames" of Virgil, and ran the whole gamut of the gods from Pallas Athene to Atropos, Clotho, and Lachesis. Jones was apalled. Drawing forth the two coins he thrust them into Gerard's hand, saying—

"Never mind, old fellow, let me lend you these. But don't get drunk."

Gerard was completely overcome. He grasped his fellow-printer's hand. "Jones," said he, "hear me. I solemnly swear that never again so long as I live will I indulge in the foolish, the pernicious, the depraved, the soul-destroying habit—of gambling."

A Question.

Does any one know when, where and by whom Worcester was called "The Horse-shoe city."

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

At a concert given by Paderewski—he of the Circassian beauty hair—last week somebody sat next to a smartly gotten up girl who seemed absorbed in the music—too wrapped up in it to pay a particle of attention to the remarks of her escort. With her hands clasped tightly, she leaned forward and never stirred till the last note had died away. Then she turned to the man at her side, and somebody listened for the appreciative comment that must follow. This is what she heard: "What do you suppose he does with his hair when he puts his hat on?"—N. Y. Press.

Anton Rubinstein, the Russian pianist, has accepted an offer of £25,000 for a series of fifty concerts to be given in the United States in 1893.

A Lawyer's Fee.

"What's your fee for collecting this?"
He inquired, with a nervous thrill;
And the lawyer calmly made reply:
"The whole amount of the bill."

"Knowledge is noble in proportion as it is prolific—in proportion as it quickens the mind to the acquisition of higher truth."—W. E. Channing.

By the will of Miss Catherine Garcelon of Oakland, California, Bowdoin College falls heir to $400,000. This admits of glorious things for the Alma Mater of Longfellow and Hawthorne.

Mrs. Jennie I. Ware, formerly a teacher in the High School, now in the Roxbury High School, was in the city last week.

"My college is the best."

That is what every one of these girls said who recently met at the High School, Miss Simmons from Vassar, Miss Pettit from Boston University, Misses Syvret and Clark from Mt. Holyoke, Miss Iva Smith from Smith and Miss Hill from Wellesley. There is nothing like loyalty to one's chosen home. It makes living much happier.

A Bright Girl.

A pupil at a large boarding school, very skillful with her needle, and as obliging as skillful, found her time was taken up in sewing on buttons, mending gloves and rents, etc. A fair was to be given for an object in which she was deeply interested. She had no money to give, and was so liberal in giving time to her friends that she had no time to use for the fair. Her school mates were surprised one day to find on her door a card bearing this legend:

Mending Gloves, 5 cents.

Putting on Shoe Buttons, 1 cent each.

Dressing the Hair, 10 cents.

Every minute spent in sewing or working for her mates meant so much money to be devoted to the object for which the fair was held. Charging for her services seemed to increase the demand, and the young girl found that business and school work could not be carried on without conflicting. So this legend appeared on the door of her room:

After December twentieth my services cannot be bought for love or money.

There must be sound judgment in the character that learns to administer time for the best good of the particular period through which it is passing.—Christian Union.

"Who misses or who wins the prize;

Go, lose or conquer as you can;

But if you fail, or if you rise,

Be each, pray God, a gentleman."

—Epilogue to Dr. Birch and his pupils.

"The advanced work done in our colleges by women is not one of the least hopeful signs of our times; on the other hand, it is most gratifying. Still the colleges for women are not in many respects equal to those for men, and future effort must be directed to overcoming this inequality, until the highest educational advantages shall be enjoyed by each. Our system of public schools deserves and should have the support of all the people. The attempt to establish parochial schools or private schools by wealthy citizens as class or caste schools I have no sympathy with; I regard it as un-American, and little less than disloyal. To have loyal and good citizens we must train the boys and girls in our public schools.—Dr. Bush in the Boston Budget.

The nomination of R. H. Mooney, Principal of the Quinsigamond School for the Common Council, at the recent city election, was a decided innovation in politics, but why should teachers and preachers be excluded from participation in such matters? Is it custom or some deep seated principle that prevents?

Wesleyan.

A few weeks ago it seemed necessary to correct a statement which appeared in many of the daily papers in regard to the government of the University. There has recently appeared another report which has been so widespread that it does not need to be called to mind but which must be contradicted. In the midst of all this newspaper exaggeration it is pleasing to know that there is one paper which has regard for the truth and will not publish a false report of a sensational nature simply for the sake of filling up the paper.

Although there has been some feeling among the members of the two lower classes over the formation of a new freshman society, there has been no trouble such as reported, and it would be difficult to find a college in which the students are more in sympathy with the faculty in the management than at Wesleyan.

Middletown people will have a rare treat upon Jan. 25th when Sir Edwin Arnold lectures in the Alpha Delta Phi course. The lecture will be given in the North Congregational Church, after which the lecturer will be given a reception at the Chapter House.

Before the close of the last term, Professor Winchester delivered a lecture before the students of Wells College, Aurora, N. Y.

Prof. Woodrow Wilson, of Princeton College, formerly of Wesleyan, delivered a lecture on "Democracy" in Russell Library Hall on Dec. 10.

During the Winter the students will have the pleasure of listening to a series of lectures by Prof. Daniels, upon "Civil government."

Prof. Stephenson will give a series of lectures before the Y. M. C. A. of the city during the Winter term, upon "American History."

Pres. Raymond is soon to have an article in the Zion's Herald entitled, "The study of the English Bible as a classic in college." In the Gilbert Haven issue of the paper, in January, Prof. Prentice will have an article on "The latest estimate of man."

On Friday, Nov. 6, 1891, the freshman organized a new society, Pi Kappa Tau, with twelve charter members. At a later meeting twelve others were initiated with appropriate ceremonies among whom was E. T. Coffin of this city. The society is at present prospering finely and promises to be a valuable addition to class societies.

Mr. Charles W. Delano of this city, of the class of '94, gave readings during the last term at Arnold Station and Saddle Hill.

Holmes to Whittier.

John G. Whittier was eighty-four years old on Dec. 17. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes has passed the eighty-first anniversary of his birth. The following gem from the pen of Dr. Holmes was addressed to Mr. Whittier, congratulating him on the occasion of his birthday:

MY DEAR WHITTIER. I congratulate you on having climbed another glacier and crossed another crevasse in your ascent of the white summit which already begins to see the morning twilight of the coming century. A life so well filled as yours has been cannot be too long for your fellow men and women. In their afflictions you are secure, whether you are with them here or near them in some higher life than theirs. I hope your years have not become a burden, so that you are tired of living. At our age we must live chiefly in the past. Happy is he who has a past like yours to look back upon! It is one of the felicitous incidents—I will not say accidents—of my life that the lapse of time has brought us very near together, so that I frequently find myself honored by seeing my name mentioned in near connection with you now. We are lonely, very lonely, in these last years. The image which I have used before this in writing to you recurs once more to my thoughts.

We were on deck together as we began the voyage of life two generations ago. The life of a whole generation passed and found us in the cabin with a goodly company of coevals. Then the craft which held us began going to pieces, until a few of us were left on the raft pieced together of its fragments. And now the raft has at last parted, and you and I are left clinging to the solitary spar, which is all that still remains afloat of the sunken vessel.

I have just been looking over the headstones in Mr. Griswold's cemetery entitled The Poets and Poetry of America. In that venerable receptacle just completing its half-century of existence, for the date of the edition before me is 1842, I find the name of John Greenleaf Whittier and Oliver Wendell Holmes next each other, in their due order, as they should be. All around are the names of the dead,—too often of forgotten dead. Three names I see there are still among those of the living. Mr. John Osborn Sargent, who makes Horace his own by faithful study and ours by scholarly translation; Isaac M'Lellan, who was writing in 1830, and whose last work is dated 1886; and Christopher P. Cranch, whose poetical gift has too rarely found expression. Of these many dead you are the most venerated, revered, and beloved survivor; of these few living, the most honored representative. Long may it be before you leave a world where your influence has been so beneficent, where your example has been such inspiration, where you are so truly loved, and where your presence is a perpetual benefaction! Always affectionately yours,
 OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

When Dr. Wyland was president of Brown University, a student of philosophy once said to him: "Doctor, I don't believe I have any soul." "Possibly not, possibly not, young man," said the doctor. "You ought to know. I know I have. Good day sir."

Procure half a pound of almonds, two ounces of bitter almonds, and a half pound of sugar. Blanch the almonds and pound them in a mortar; clarify and cook the sugar slightly, then remove it from the fire and stir into it the almonds. Warm all together, stirring well, and taking the greatest care that it doesn't burn. When it is cooked enough (that is, when it won't adhere to the fingers), pour it out on a board sprinkled with sugar. As soon as it is cool cut it into tiny fancy shapes, stars, rings and fingers. This can be decorated with preserved cherries or other fruits if desired. Scalded Coblins.

Take six apples; pare, but do not core them, and allow the stems to remain on the apples; wrap each in a cabbage leaf; the leaves should be scalded first to make them pliable. Pack them closely in a stew-pan; add sufficient water to half cover, and let them simmer gently until about half done. Remove the leaves, dust the apples thickly with sugar, and serve with cream.

Apple Puffs.

Pare and core very small tart apples; put one pound of flour into a bowl; add to it a half teaspoonful of salt, a teaspoonful of baking powder, and then rub in two ounces of butter. Stand this in a cold place until thoroughly chilled. Beat two eggs until very light; add to them about a gill of milk; stir this into the flour, turn it out on a board, knead lightly, roll into a thin sheet, and with a large round cutter cut into biscuits; in the centre of each piece stand an apple. Fill the space from which the core was taken with sugar; fold the dough lightly over the top of the apple; place them in a baking dish cover and bake in a quick oven for thirty minutes; do not entirely cover the apples as you would in an apple dumpling, but allow the apple, while cooking, to sort of ooze out of the dough. Serve hot with hard sauce.

Creamed Oysters.

One pint of milk; when boiling, add two tablespoonfuls of corn starch, salt and pepper, and one tablespoonful of butter. Take fine powdered crumbs, and scatter over the bottom of a well-buttered dish. Put a layer of oysters, then of cream, next crumbs, then oysters, cream, and so on, having crumbs on top. Brown, or rather cook as for escalloped oysters. It is a change from the latter dish.

Baked Omelet.

One cupful of boiling milk; beat the yolks of four eggs, and add hot milk and a tablespoonful of melted butter; wet three teaspoonfuls of flour in a little cold milk, add the beaten whites, and beat all; salt and pepper well; bake twenty minutes. It is very appetizing.

Fig Pudding.

One pint flour, one-third pint of molasses, one-third pint hot water, one-third pint melted butter, one-half teaspoon soda, (small half), one pint figs chopped and floured, steam two and one-half hours. Sauce, whipped cream, sweetened.

Brown.

The Lyman gymnasium is now open in reality and hard work has begun in earnest. Four hours weekly are required from each student.

The gym. is patronized by almost all the men outside of regular required hours and it is to be sincerely hoped that with what material now exists an athletic team, much more creditable to Brown than former teams, may be put in the field in the Spring.

Next Monday evening is to be reserved as "College night" in the series of Promenade concerts given in Music Hall and special seats will be reserved for the students. The college will attend in a body escorted by Reeves American Band.

There is much talk about the renewal of the old time inter-scholastic debates. As yet the talk has not taken on a tangible form but it is hoped that Brown may not be slow in following the example of Harvard and Yale and that she may have as exciting public debates as in years gone by.

The Worcester Academy club is thriving and prospering in a decidedly encouraging way, despite the fact that she is as yet young and the pioneer prep-school club in college.

The Brown Daily Herald commented on in these columns some time ago still lives and is thriving. She has appeared in much neater dress and is slowly but surely gaining a firm foothold.

Monday evening Prof. Sears delivered a very interesting and enjoyable lecture in Manning Hall on "The Oratory of the Greek Fathers." This is but one of the many interesting lectures to be given by the Brown Lecture Association.

The engagement is announced of Mr. Harry B. Needham and Miss Edith Greene. Mr. Needham is a member of '63 and resides in Washington. Miss Greene is a resident of Providence.

Mr. Howard E. Sumner, '94, of Worcester has been compelled to leave college for a few days on account of ill health.

Prof. A. Harkness gave an informal reception to the classical students in Sayles Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The occasion was the opening of the Classical Seminary.

Julia Ward Howe.

The announcement that this distinguished lady will appear twice in this city, next week, will please many people. Wednesday she addresses the Woman's Club, but the evening of the next day, she will talk before the Woman's Suffrage League. The latter body held a preliminary meeting last Thursday afternoon with Mrs. Mary C. Harris at No. 2 Charlotte Street.

Mr. Wm. W. Macomber, late assistant Clerk at the Central District Court succeeds Mr. Elliott H. Peabody as Second Assistant Clerk of Courts.

The best anodyne and expectorant for the cure of colds and coughs and all throat, lung, and bronchial troubles, is, undoubtedly, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Ask your druggist for it, and at the same time, for Almanac, which is free to all.

With his thumb, a boy is said to have saved the Netherlands from inundation. Many people have been saved from the invasion of disease by a bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine imparts tone to the system and strengthens every organ fibre of the body.

METHODIST.

At Grace Church last Sunday four were admitted to membership by letter and two on profession of faith; at Trinity, there were five admissions by letter and one on probation.

CONGREGATIONAL.

ARMENIAN.—The council of Congregational Churches to decide whether or not an Armenian Church of that faith should be organized, met in Plymouth Church véstry Friday afternoon and organized with Rev. Dr. D. O. Mears, moderator and Rev. E. W. Phillips, scribe. The council decided to grant the request of the Armenians for a church and the exercises connected with the organization were carried out in the evening, the program being as follows: Reading of the minutes of the council by the scribe; singing; invocation by pastor of the new church, Rev. H. A. Antranassian; Scripture reading by Rev. Rufus M. Taft; recognition address by Rev. M. H. Hitchcock, eight being admitted by letter and ten on confession; prayer of recognition and consecration, Rev. Dr. A. E. P. Perkes; right hand of fellowship, Rev. I. J. Lansing; address in Armenian by Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D. D., of Lexington, who organized the first church in Armenia in 1846; singing; addresses by Philip W. Moen, Rev. Dr. Archibald McCullagh, Rev. Dr. D. O. Mears, Dr. Geo. H. Gould and Rev. C. M. Southgate; prayer, Dr. McCullagh; doxology in Armenian; benediction by Rev. Dr. Cyrus Hamlin.

PLYMOUTH.—The annual parish meeting was held Tuesday evening. George H. Mellen was elected moderator; W. H. Crosby, clerk; Willis E. Sibley, treasurer and collector; H. W. Eddy, P. G. Kent and H. P. Duncan assessors; Wm. Maynard, Everett J. Bardwell and George A. Smith, singing committee. The treasurer, clerk, assessors and singing committee presented their reports, and they with the addition of the following were appointed a committee on appropriations, viz., F. H. Bancroft, G. Henry Whitcomb, C. H. Stearns, Lucius P. Goddard and Wm. H. Sawyer. The financial standing as presented by the treasurer is as follows: Balance on hand, Jan. 1, 1891, $441.17; collections for the year, $10,255.79; total, $10,696.93; expended for salaries and current expenses, $10,245.22; leaving balance in the treasury $450.71. The rentals of the pews have increased about $1,250 during the past fifteen months. Ten new members of the parish were elected.

The fourth meeting of the Worcester County Congregational Sunday School Superintendents' Union will be held in the Young Men's Christian Association lecture room next Monday evening. A collation will be served at seven o'clock, after which the topic for discussion will be "The superintendent and his work," divided into "Objects," opened by Geo. R. Bliss; "Methods," opened by Edward Whitney; "Difficulties," opened by L. P. Goddard. After each division there will be an open discussion. Several amendments to the constitutions will be acted upon.

The record of church admissions in Congregational churches last Sunday was as follows: Old South, forty-seven by letter, eleven on confession; Plymouth, four by letter, two on confession; Bethany, three by letter, six on confession; Swedish, one by letter, three on confession; Salem Street, two by letter, nine on confession; Piedmont, two by letter, one on confession; Hope, three by letter, five on confession; Central, two by letter; Pilgrim, nine by letter, three on confession. There were to have been eight admissions at Union Church, but because of the absence of the pastor, Dr. W. V. W. Davis, on account of illness, the ceremony was postponed.

BAPTIST.

At the First Baptist Church last Sunday three persons were admitted to church membership by letter and twenty-four by profession; at the Main Street Baptist, two were admitted by letter and seven by baptism; at the Dewey Street Church one was admitted by letter and at the Pleasant Street Baptist, the pastor Rev. H. J. White gave the right hand of fellowship to fifteen new members.

The New Year's reception given by the Association last week was the most enjoyable and most largely attended of any it has ever given. This is the first time that the Association has had the assistance of the Women's Auxiliary and the ladies rendered very valuable aid. The guests were entertained with refreshments, gymnasium exhibitions and orchestral and vocal music. Many congratulations are being bestowed on President Rugg, Secretary Gale and all others concerned in the arrangements.

He Knew How.

Mrs. H— is a young married lady, and an Episcopalian (says the Philadelphia Record). Her husband is not a member of any church; but, as all good husbands should, he frequently attends church with his wife. His first attempt, however, to conform to the Episcopal form of service was so mortifying that he was almost tempted to forswear church-going altogether. It was on Easter Sunday, and his wife had tried to coach him properly beforehand, naturally wishing him to take part with her in the service. "Remember now, my dear," she said; "that the rector will come forward and say 'The Lord is risen,' and you will respond with, 'He is risen, indeed'—you will remember that, won't you?" "Well, I guess I can remember four words," replied Mr. H—, a little testily. An hour later they were at the church. The rector came forward at the proper time, in the beginning of the service, and said, solemnly: "The Lord is risen." Promptly and distinctly came the response of Mr. H—: "Is He, indeed?"

The American Cathedral.

The amended plans for the proposed Cathedral of St. John the Divine, drawn by the architects Heins & Lafarge, have been accepted by the trustees. The plans will be placed on view in their present shape at the coming exhibition of the Architectural League. The ground plan of the future cathedral is in the form of a cross, its arms forming nave, chancel, and transepts, and containing each a central aisle and two side aisles. The exterior resembles in general a large central lantern or tower, against whose four sides come the four arms of the cross. In the four angles of the four arms are four towers, with separate entrances. Two large towers also rise at the west front. The central tower is crowned by a spire dominating all the other towers. The whole external length of the cathedral when finished will be 520 feet. The width across the front will be 190 feet; the width across the transepts, 290 feet; the height of the central spire will be 425 feet from the floor of the cathedral. As the ground of the cathedral is high, the central spire will be in reality 525 feet above the level of the city. The width of the front towers will be 57 feet, while their height will be 240 feet.—Christian Union.

The Thirteen Superstition.

In Belford's Magazine is an account of the supposed origin of this wide spread superstition. An idea of its prevalence among all nations may be obtained from the fact that the Turks have almost expunged the number thirteen from the vocabulary. The Italians never use it in making up the numbers for their lotteries and the thirteenth card in one of their games bears the figure of death. No house in Paris bears the No. 13 and in that city the Quatorzièmes are recognized persons in society who hold themselves in readiness to be invited to any dinner which would otherwise have the fatal number at the festal board. The superstition briefly stated is that if thirteen persons either by accident or design dine together at the same table, one will die during the year.

Its origin has been traced back to the old Norse mythology, in which occurs the story of the gods sitting down to a feast with Loki in the Valhalla. Baldur was the thirteenth and he had to die. It is hardly likely though, that this is the true origin, as it is only an obscure tradition connected with an ancient faith so that the popularly accepted tradition is doubtless the correct one. The Last Supper, which so immediately preceded the crucifixion of the Saviour, must always excite a feeling of awe in the breasts of the faithful, which in an unenlightened age easily degenerated into a feeling of superstitious terror.

Leonardo da Vinci, in his famous painting in the Dominican convent in Milan, unwittingly perhaps, gave the first impulse to the superstition in the minds of the ignorant masses who beheld the twelve apostles and the Master at the table.

To see before their eyes the fatal feast itself must have affected them far more profoundly than could the most eloquent sermon on the subject. In this picture, too, we see Judas in the act of spilling the salt, so it is fair to presume that both superstitions have the same origin.

In a hotel not one hundred miles from the top of the Rigi the following announcement gives satisfaction: "Mistress and venerable voyagers are advertised that when the sun him rise a horn will be blown." That announcement sufficiently prepares the visitor for the following entry in the wine list, "In this hotel the wines leave the traveller nothing to hope for."—Notes and Queries.

Breakfast Should be the Heartiest Meal.

Rev. Mark Trafton who is considerably more than 80 years old, has been a member of Congress, and is the senior member of the New England Conference, M. E. Church, talks as follows concerning food and longevity in the N. Y. Christian Advocate.

"Our food is taken at the wrong time, and too hastily. The morning is the time for our principal meal not the evening. Some years ago, during the sessions of our annual conference, I was the guest of a physician. He one day remarked to me: 'You will live to be 100 years old if no accident befalls you.' Why do you think so?' I asked. 'Because I notice that your principal meal is your breakfast.' This is true. I rise from night's repose hungry, and it is the only time in the day when I have that sensation. But, the reader will say I have no appetite in the morning. I will tell you why. You rise in the morning, quickly dress yourself, drop down at the table, swallow in haste a cup of coffee, hurriedly eat a hot roll, seize your hat, and rush to the cars or your place of business, drive through your morning work, run into a restaurant, swallow something that an alligator would find it difficult to digest, go back to your study, counting room, or mart of trade, where you are driven by the press and perplexities of business or study until 5 o'clock, when you hasten home faint and exhausted, and sit down to your 6 o'clock dinner. The same habit of hurry clings to you at this meal, and you bolt a mass of hot meats and the usual et ceteras, and go to bed to toss and turn and wrestle with horrid shapes. Your digestive organs are in no condition to receive that mass of matter. The business, the planning, the brain-work of the day, have driven the blood to the brain and lungs, thus checking the flow of the gastric dissolvents; and now all night, instead of the quiet rest, nature has been at work to remove that half-digested mass of material from the stomach. Do you wonder that you have no appetite in the morning. Now the stomach, as well as other organs, calls for seasons of rest and recuperation or it will fail in its functional duties. Would you have length of days? Change all this."

Raw beefsteak applied will remove the discoloration of a bruise.

A little powdered borax thrown into the bath makes the water very soft, and greatly invigorates and resists the bather. This is particularly beneficial to those who are troubled with nervousness or sleeplessness.

One use for oyster-shells is to clean the fire-brick of the stove. Lay a number of them on top of the hot coals, and when the fire burns down it will be found that all the clinkers have scaled off the bricks.

To temper earthenware which is to be used for baking, put the dishes in cold water over the fire and bring it gradually to the boiling point. When the water boils around them, remove them from the fire, and let them remain in the water till it becomes cold.

George Bancroft's Library.

The private library of the late George Bancroft, historian of the United States, is a large and valuable collection.

About thirty years ago, at the time when Mr. Bancroft lived in New York City, it was stated by a gentleman who probably knew that it contained 12,000 to 15,000 volumes.

At that time there were said to be in the library about 200 folio and quarto volumes of manuscripts. Those manuscripts had most of them been collected by Mr. Bancroft while he was in England, serving the United States as minister to the Court of St. James.

At that time he was offered every facility for examining and making copies from the authors of Great Britain and France. He was also welcome in large private libraries abroad and allowed to copy documents contained in them. The opportunities offered him he availed himself of fully. When described in 1862 the library was growing rapidly. At the time of Mr. Bancroft's death it must have been very large. Recently it has been kept in his late residence in Washington.

Hon. Charles T. Tuckerman visited the historian in October, 1839. Having been admitted to Mr. Bancroft's house he followed his man upstairs to the library. "As we proceeded," he writes, "the inner life of the occupant of the house was apparent at every step. Books lined the walls, and a second room filled with shelves loaded with bound volumes caught my eye, adjacent to the library proper in which the historian passed the greater part of his time."

It was Mr. Bancroft's wish that his library should be kept together and that the United States government should buy it for the nation and place it in the Congressional library. It has been understood that, by a provision of his will, the government had the refusal of the library for a specified time. It would seem from statements recently made that the library is not likely to become the property of the United States, but is now offered for sale as a whole to individuals and institutions.

There was once a hope in the minds of some of the members of the American Antiquarian Society that Mr. Bancroft would leave his library to that organization. That society has its headquarters in Worcester, his birthplace; his father was one of its founders; he himself and Hon. Robert C. Winthrop were its oldest members at the time of his death; and Mr. Bancroft had been a vice-president of the society for several years previous to his death. That disposition of the library was never made however.

It is very desirable that Mr. Bancroft's library should be kept together and be accessible to students of American history. His books and manuscripts were very largely the sources from which he drew the materials used in writing his history. They should be accessible to other students of the history of our country both because they are valuable on account of the information which they contain and because they are needed for the verification of Mr. Bancroft's statements in his history and in furnishing the exact words and enabling scholars to mark the connection of quotations made by him.

It is particularly important that the collection of manuscripts should be in a place where they can be readily consulted, for Mr. Bancroft made a very free use of those manuscripts in preparing his great work. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the whole library will be bought by one of the large public libraries of the country.

It is too much to hope, I fear, that money can be raised to secure it for the library of the American Antiquarian Society or for the Public Library in this city. Were it here it would undoubtedly attract to Worcester many students of the history of our country.

Society of Antiquity.

This organization, now domiciled in its new North End quarters, held its 238th meeting, Tuesday night. President E. B. Crane gave his annual address, taking as his theme the story of the local Tories who in Revolutionary days suffered more or less from their devotion to the crown. As with everything that he writes the essay was interesting and thorough. Rev. John Gregson of Wilkinsonsville spoke on the same subject. Accessions to the library show 343 volumes, 132 pamphlets, 235 papers besides other articles.

The following gentlemen were admitted to membership: U. Waldo Cutler, George W. Coombs, E. D. Buffington, Thomas A. Clarke, E. A. Grosvenor, Gustavus E. Wetherbee, Frank L. Chamberlin, J. Norcross, Benjamin Brierly.

Among other gifts, received, was a water proof rush coat made in Japan, and given by Mr. Samuel H. Putnam.

Boston University.

The Index of Boston University for 1891-92 has just been compiled and published by Will S. Spencer, '93. It is a university directory, containing complete lists of the professors, students, their home and city addresses, associations, societies, etc., in all the departments of the university, also the alumni of the College of Liberal Arts, and the School of Law, with their addresses and occupations. The pamphlet contains 83 pages, and one copy is given by the publisher to each student in the university. The Index shows that there are 103 professors instructors, librarians, etc., in the university. The following is a summary of the students in the different departments, showing the increase of students during the last year:

	1890.	1891.
College of Liberal Arts	284	287
College of Agriculture	150	159
School of Law	177	199
School of Medicine	92	232
School of Theology	140	143
School of all Sciences	96	112
College of Music	9

The faculty of the College of Liberal Arts have appointed the commencement speakers for next June. They are Charles B. Tewksbury of Westboro, and Miss Nettie A. McKinson of Cambridge. The alternates are Oscar Storer of Morrill, Me., and Miss Eva M. Gowing of Wakefield.

The Christmas vacation is over, The Medical and Theological schools opened Monday. The college opened Tuesday and the Law school opened Thursday.

Mr. O. H. Weston has been confined to his home for some days, suffering from pneumonia.

Intense Cold.

By the subjection of common air to a pressure of 1,125 pounds to the square inch, or 75 atmospheres, with a condenser kept at —133° c., the air is reduced to liquid form; and the liquid, when allowed to evaporate produces a temperature of —200° c. This is within 73° of absolute zero, which is —273° c.—Scientific American.

In Jewelry

the bow-knot is quite a rage and by means of enameling, simulations of tiny ribbons are almost without number, very small diamonds or pearls being set in rows upon the ribbon-like surface or a single larger jewel may shine in the center. A new style bracelet shows a delicate gold cord that passes through a loop with pendant jewels at the end; bracelets in delicate rims with jewelled centers and also links are still worn however while the bangle family is large and popular. Necklaces are very fashionable, the leading styles being one or more rows of gold beads or pearls and pendants are so much worn that brooches—among which fleurs de lis, suns or crescents lead are so made as to become pendants upon occasion.

Fans

are of the ostrich feathers or pinked gauze and later introductions are of chiffon in ruffles that extend along the sticks. But these last are not likely to be popular, because not at all pretty. Gloves for evening are of undressed kid in white, pale, yellow, blue, pink, gray or tan; and in lengths to suit sleeves. Colored slippers match costumes and are of undressed kid, satin or made to order from the dress material, but gray, tan or bronze are worn and suit any dress, with gloves to correspond. Toes are still very sharp pointed and heels high and set far forward. Hosiery matches the slipper.

SOUTH END NEWS.

Among the newcomers to the South End may be mentioned Superintendent of Schools A. P. Marble and family, who will occupy a suite of rooms in the Brightside.

The chorus connected with Piedmont Church met last Monday evening under the direction of Mr. Seth Richards and began the study of the oratorio of "St. Paul."

Rev. Mr. Conrad is once more among his flock and last Sunday assisted in receiving fifty-eight into the church.

Mr. Chas. C. Brown, late of the firm of Joslyn & Brown, has been in Florence, Mass., the past week on business.

Mrs. F. B. Knowles, who with her family has lately returned from Europe, is refurbishing her home in a most artistic manner to conform with ideas gained abroad.

Miss Evangeline Houghton, who for the past nine months has been the leading soprano soloist in the Piedmont choir, leaves next week for Germany, where she will pursue a course of study. No one to fill her place will be hired for the remainder of the year.

The Cavendish Whist Club will hold its next meeting with Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Stevens, 666 Main Street, next Tuesday evening.

The members of the Worcester County Philatelic Association will hold their bi-monthly meeting next Monday evening.

Mr. F. M. Harris has been in Boston the past few days for the purpose, it is said, of establishing a branch store in that city. He has greatly outgrown his present quarters and is looking for a larger field.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1892.

No. 20

Under the sparkling snowdrift,
Screened from the light of day,
Merrily sings the brooklet
Its flowery springtime lay.
Flowing in ice-bound darkness,
His murmurous spirit knows
A subtle sense of the trembling
Reflection of Spring's wild rose.

With January, begin the sessions of the Great and General Court.

Since 1780, under the constitution, legislators have assembled in Boston and for the most of that time under the Gilded Dome.

Laws have been made and unmade and thus the record will doubtless continue for years to come. "We are governed too much" was a wise saying of some one.

The Legislature that convened, Wednesday, the sixth, inst., lost little time in electing to the speakership, for the fourth consecutive time, Mr. Wm. E. Barrett of Melrose. There was no opposition. All united on him.

This was very pleasant to Mr. Barrett and those voting seemed satisfied with their choice. Ex-Speaker Noyes held the place five terms but there was an interval of four years between his third and fourth terms. Several other speakers in recent years have held the office as long, as John E. Sanford of Taunton, Harvey Jewell of Boston and Alexander H. Bullock of Worcester who, by the way, was the last Worcester representative to gain the speaker's chair.

Other men have held the chair longer, as Wm. B. Calhoun, seven consecutive times, Timothy Bigelow, eight, and Edward H. Robbins, nine; but Mr. Bigelow was in at other times enough to make a total of eleven terms thus giving him a longer aggregate than any other speaker. Important as all these men were, in their day, there are many of them whom the world of 1892 knows little of. In the gathering that assembled Thursday to witness the inauguration of the Governor, the most noteworthy figure was that of General N. P. Banks. Still erect as in days of old, he could recall when he, too, took the oaths of office in that very place and when, a few years before in 1851 and 2 he was the Speaker. A large share of those gathered around him were born after those dates.

General Banks, in many ways, has long been a picturesque figure in Massachusetts politics. "From Bobbin Boy to Governor" tells the story of a life as strange as fiction. What ups and downs! Member of the Legislature, Speaker, Speaker of the U. S. House of Representatives, Governor of Massachusetts, a General in the Civil War, again in Congress, once more in the Legislature of his native state, returned to Congress again, U. S. Marshal for the state, he has a history that would fill many volumes were he to tell all he knows about politics. His white hair and dignified bearing grace well all public occasions.

Worcester was particularly interested in the joint convention of the Senate and House of Representative in that the President of the former body is a Worcester Senator, Alfred S. Pinkerton, the first one to attain this honor in so long a time that no one remembers when, not in a generation at least. Before the election, the Spy had an item to the effect that if Senator John R. Thayer were elected and the Senate were Democratic he would, doubtless, be the President thereof. There were too many ifs, but a Worcester man has the office just the same, and he performed his part in the inauguration in a dignified and impressive manner.

From the recent meeting of school-men in Boston, it would appear that the showing of this state in the Columbian Fair will be properly looked after. The fact that T. M. Hallist of Springfield, S. T. Dutton of Brookline, Supt. E. P. Seaver of Boston, W. A. Mowry of Salem and State Secretary J. W. Dickinson are in charge of the matter will insure the utmost care as to detail and management. Better selections could not be made. It is hoped and expected that the Old Bay State will appear near the head, though the West has made great strides in the last few years.

Just at present, in certain parts of the city, mothers are hugging their darlings more closely on account of the prevalence of diphtheria and scarlet fever, but more particularly the former, and thus it will be, at intervals, till all our people learn to place a higher value on care and preventives. Small pox long since ceased to be epidemic, on account of the precautions taken against it. Who would think of attending a funeral where small pox was the fatal illness; yet how many crowd into close rooms to pay final respect when the cause of death is quite as much to be dreaded? Boards of Health must learn to deal with these two scourges as evils scarcely second to their more feared but no more deadly rival, small pox. For the sick, there should be complete isolation and for those of the family a quarantine rigidly enforced.

"An interesting experiment is now on trial in Ithaca, N. Y. The charter of the city of Ithaca was passed in 1838, and received the sanction of Gov. Hill, and is now in force. By that charter, all taxes above a certain small sum must be passed upon by the tax-payers themselves, and by them alone. Those who pay the money are permitted to say how it shall be spent. Hence, in that city, the women tax-payers vote."

Why is not this a righteous enactment? Suppose it were in force in Worcester? Isn't it reasonable to suppose that the city would wait some time before voting vast sums of money to a City Hall and, for that matter, for many other alleged improvements? As things stand, today, money is voted away freely by men who would have nothing to lose were the city to be looted.

A very good argument for temperance was furnished recently in one of the bathing establishments of this city, where a young man of excellent name, but, at the time, said to be under the influence of liquor, played a stream of scalding water on the unprotected leg of an employee, nearly paralyzing the member. The poor man was laid up for weeks, but not a word of sympathy nor a cent of cost came from the man whose horse play produced this lamentable condition. Had he been in his right mind he would not have done the deed, and had he not had his nature whiskey hardened, his heart would have softened towards the victim of his cruelty.

The executors of Mr. Bancroft's library have decided to offer it in one lot. The collection is a very large one, the manuscripts are numerous and valuable, and many of the books are enriched by the addition of Mr. Bancroft's own marginal comments. A special study of its extent and character has been made by Mr. John F. Sabin, who estimates it to be twice as large as that of the late S. L. M. Barlow, and three times as large as the Menzies collection. All book lovers hope that the executors may be successful in their attempt to prevent its being scattered.—Public Opinion.

There are many people still sanguine enough to believe that this library may come this way.

What is Prison Reform.

Prison reform does not set aside the justice of God, nor seek to paralyze the arm of the earthly ruler, the minister of God, when he declares and enforces the penalty of transgression. It seeks rather to sustain him. It believes in law, upholds the law, and finds the justification of legal punishments not in the sentiment of vengeance, but in the protection of society. The advocates of the indeterminate sentence go so far as to declare that the man whose criminal propensities and habits are a menace to public security should be confined for life if he persists in their indulgence.—Rev. F. H. Wines.

Maine man (finishing a story)—Yes, sir, I killed that bear with nothin' but this little jackknife. Guess you never had a tussle with a bear, did ye?

New York Liar—Oh yes. I was out fishing one day on Staten Island when a big bear made a rush for me and knocked the pole out of my hand, leaving me without that means of defence. Well, sir I grabbed that bear, threw him down, and held him down until he froze to death.

Maine Man (gasping)—I might 'a done that many a time myself, but the weather up our way don't change so quick as it does here.—New York Weekly.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, JAN. 16, 1922.

All arrangements are made for a very enjoyable evening of Declamation in Horticultural Hall, Thursday, the 21st next, under the direction of Messrs. Simmonds and Bowen. The entries insure good speaking. Messrs. Alfred S. Roe, Eben F. Thompson and Frank P. McKeon will act as judges.

In the record of the week, for Jan. 9, the business reverses ascribed to A. L. Burbank should be read A. F. Burbank. The former gentleman retired from the jewelry business a year and a half ago.

The Gardner Journal has the sympathy of all Massachusetts Newspaperdom over the recent loss by fire of nearly everything that constituted its outfit. New appliances will be secured at once.

Diphtheria.

John H. Jackson, son of Henry B. and Laura Jackson of No. 8 Goulding Street died Wednesday. He is an other victim of the terrible disease so fatal to childhood. He was a pupil in one of the lower grades of the Dix Street School.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe ought to feel highly flattered at the impression made on the reporter of one of the morning papers, in her Colonial Hall address. To him she looked to be between 50 and 60 years old. As she was born in 1819, he must have inferred her age from the vigor of her remarks.

Dr. Souther.

Surgeon Wm. T. Souther is giving a series of Emergency Lectures before the companies that rendezvous at the Armory. Tuesday night, his talk was on "Hemorrhages." These lectures are very generally attended and cannot help being of great value to the soldiers.

Rugg—Burnham.

Mr. Archibald B. Rugg was married Tuesday, in Westminster to Miss Martha B. Burnham that of that town. In this city they will reside at Hotel Pleasant.

A Remarkable Case.

Mr. Walter Wheeler, of the Washington Mills, Lawrence Mass., for two years afflicted with varicose veins, accompanied by a troublesome eruption, was completely cured after taking eight bottles of Ayer's Sarsaparilla.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT'S discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Jan. 16, 1922.

The pupils of Miss Stella M. Haynes gave a very pleasing entertainment Thursday evening in Horticultural Hall, to a small audience. Beside readings by Miss Elsie MacCallum, Miss Emma Hewitt, Miss Edith M. Gould, Miss Nellie Hatch, Miss Gertrude Tuller and Mr. Joseph Rondeau, the program included music by the Elberon Orchestra and Mrs. E. H. Plaisted, Japanese fantasies and marches, tableaux and pantomime by twelve pupils, and Jean Ingelow's "Songs of Seven" in which the parts were taken as follows: Childhood, Miss Olive Hewitt; romance, Miss Nellie Hatch; love, Miss Emma Hewitt; maternity, Miss Effie C. Walsh; widowhood, Mrs. Lottie Hastings; giving in marriage, Miss Mary C. Howard; longing for home, Miss Edith M. Gould. The Japanese fantasies, marches and tableaux were the finest that have been given in this city. Of the readings the best were Miss Emma Hewitt's "Genera", Miss Tuller's "Young America's War Cry" and Miss Gould's "The Pilot's Story." The others were good with the exception of Mr. Rondeau's, which possessed no merit whatever and had not a single redeeming feature.

"The Other Boot."

Mr. B——t of the "House" was indignant over his committee appointment. He was mad clear through. He had been mad for twenty hours. His cigar was tilted up at an angle of more than forty-five degrees. He took a seat in the boot black's chair and after one foot was polished, started up to leave. "Hold on boss, let's black the other boot." Mr B——t looked black enough as he sat down to have the job finished, but several onlookers thought there would have been more fun if he had gone in one sided.

Holy Cross.

The mid-year work has commenced in earnest. The semi-annual written examinations have taken place and the ovials will commence the 22nd. The College Dramatic Club will present "The Celebrated Case" in the theater on Shrove Tuesday night, March 1st. This is the night before Lent.

In the death of Rev. Fr. Blenkinson, pastor of S. S. Peter and Paul's in South Boston, the college has lost a dear friend. He was the donor of a medal and also the brother of the Georgetown College.

Rev. W. J. Dower, a former High School and Holy Cross boy, has been assigned as pastor of the Catholic church at Lenox, Mass.

The annual reunion of the Sons and Daughters of Vermont will be held next Tuesday evening in Horticultural Hall. There will be a reception from six to seven and at seven a turkey supper will be served, after which there will be addresses by several Vermonters, among them being Col. Albert Clark of Boston. There will also be a literary and musical program, including readings, vocal and piano solos and orchestral music.

Bay State division, Uniform rank, Knights of Pythias, has arranged for series of four socials to be held January 18, February 8, and 22, and March 7, at Continental Hall. Stiles' orchestra has been engaged. The division will celebrate its anniversary as usual, by a ball on Fast night.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe.

The members of the Woman's Suffrage League who enabled Worcester people to see and hear the writer of the Battle Hymn of the Republic at Unity Church last Thursday night are entitled to the gratitude of all listeners. Mrs. Howe very much resembles the pictures we have seen of the Queen of England and as she expressed her sympathy for that beloved lady in the death of her grandson, it seemed as though she were naming a personal loss. She has a wonderfully clear and effective elocution and her thoughts are admirable. How could any one listen and not believe?

Mechanics Course.

The last entertainment in Course A was given Monday night by the Boston Beacon Orchestral Club, which consist of twenty-two ladies. They were assisted by Mrs. Bessie H. Pierce, soprano, and a very pleasing program was given. Next Monday night the Schubert Quartet will give the last entertainment in Course B.

England Mourns.

The death of the oldest son of the Prince of Wales and of Cardinal Manning on the same day, the 14th, has caused a wide spread expression of grief throughout the kingdom. A Prince of the Royal Family and a Prince of the Church, both dead at the same time. All classes and conditions mourn.

Y. M. C. A.

At the men's meeting at four o'clock tomorrow Rev. Mr. Woodbury will speak on "What your business?" Mr. Cotton, the new assistant secretary, will talk to the boys at three o'clock on "Traps and trappers" and he will also lead the morning prayer meeting at 9:15.

Next week Thursday the second series of the course of entertainments will begin with a concert by the Temple Quartet of Boston, assisted by Profr. Tripp, reciter and humorist. It was originally announced that the Fadette Ladies' Orchestra would furnish the entertainment but as it was not considered a sufficiently strong attraction, the above change was made. This makes every one in this series a first class entertainment. Jan. 28, Eli Perkins, the famous humorist lecturer will speak on "Wit, Humor, Pathos, Ridicule and Satire"; Feb. 11, The Tufts College Glee and Banjo Clubs, considered the finest in the country, will give a concert; Feb. 25, Mr. Leland T. Powers, the well known impersonator, will give his latest production, "The Shaugraun"; March 3, the Vitale Concert Company and D. W. Robertson, the musical artist and tumbler-organ soloist, will give a concert; March 10, Prof. H. L. Southwick and Mrs. Jessie Eldridge Southwick will give an evening of readings and will close as fine a course of entertainments as has been given in Worcester for some time.

Last evening a reception was given to the junior department. Beginning at seven o'clock there was a reception in the parlors, then the athletic contest in the gymnasium was witnessed, then there was an entertainment in Association Hall which included readings and songs by Mr. Crierie and readings by Mrs. Bowen and finally the boys were feasted on cake and ice cream.

The class in electricity will begin next Friday evening with a membership of fifty-two. The attendance at all of the classes has kept up better this year than ever before.

Mr. Eugene Kemp of this city began work this week as second assistant secretary, working principally on membership matters.

The second of the gymnasium contests was held last evening.

Next Tuesday evening the members of the Y. M. C. A. bicycle club will, with their lady friends, hold a social in the Association building.

Arrangements are being made for a course of six entertainments for the junior department. There will be an illustrated lecture on the Civil War, concerts, readings, etc. Among those who will appear will be George Pettin-gill, the boy soloist.

Sometime during February a reception will be given to the young peoples' societies connected with the various churches in the city.

Special efforts are being made just now to increase the membership. The renewals and additions were the largest during December and January that they have been during the same months, with the exception of the first year.

Y. P. S. C. E.

The regular monthly meeting of the executive committee of the Local Union will be held next Monday evening in the Young Men's Christian Association building.

The next meeting of the Local Union will be held next Tuesday evening at Pilgrim Church. There will be reports from the recent state conventions by Arthur E. Gray and other delegates, a paper will be read on Junior Endeavor and a consecration meeting will be held. There will be the usual contest for the Union's banner.

UNIVERSALIST.

FIRST UNIVERSALIST.—The officers of the Sunday School for this year are as follows: Superintendent, Dr. E. D. Fitch; assistants, Charles Davis, Miss Kate E. Parker; secretary, H. C. Robinson; assistant, J. H. Adams; treasurer, Linus Sibley; librarian, E. C. Fuller; assistants, George Bridges, W. H. Towne, Foster Goodwin; superintendent primary department, Mrs. Emily Ward; assistants, Mrs. J. F. Bicknell, Miss Grace Crawford; superintendent of infant department, Miss Grace Geer; assistant, Miss Alice E. Green.

At the annual parish meeting, held Monday evening, E. I. Comins was elected a trustee for two years to fill the unexpired term of the late H. B. Wellington; A. M. Parker and Charles L. Gates were chosen trustees for three years; A. E. Newton was re-elected treasurer and collector. The annual reports showed that the church was in a very prosperous condition, financially. Announcement was made that the church was to be the trustee of a fund of $1,000, given by Mrs. Mary M. Bancroft of Athol, formerly a member of the church, the interest from which is to be used to purchase fuel for the poor.

CONGREGATIONAL.

PLYMOUTH—The adjourned annual meeting of Plymouth parish was held Tuesday evening, in the church vestry, James H. Bancroft presiding.

The action whereby the parish voted to petition the legislature for a change in the laws governing the election of officers, was rescinded. The appropriations for the year were fixed as follows:—Pastor $6000; contingent fund, $400; coal, oil and gas, $450; ringing chimes $100; pulpit supply, 450; music, $2700; treasurer and collectors' salary, $150; janitor, $650; total appropriations, $10,900. The total appropriation exceeds that of last year, $100. The appropriation for music is raised $200.

At an adjourned meeting of the Church Wednesday evening, Henry F. Leland was elected Deacon for three years to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Deacon Jehiel Todd.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

Rev. Fr. Adrian of Leicester lately ordained at Montreal has been assigned as curate at St. John's Church this city, to take the place of Fr. McDonald who has temporary charge of Rev. John J. McCoy's parish at Westboro.

St. Anne's Church will hold a coffee party in the basement of the church during the week of Washington's birthday.

On next Wednesday evening the Sacred Heart Lyceum will hold its annual banquet. This one promises to eclipse all others in point of success.

BAPTIST.

MAIN STREET BAPTIST.—The Main Street Baptist Church held its annual business meeting last week Friday evening and elected the following officers: B. E. Guy, deacon for four years; E. M. Overholser, treasurer; clerk, E. V. Dexter; George W. Horton, auditor; George A. Thayer, superintendent of Sunday School; assistant, Walter J. Peacock; chairman of committees—Standing, F. L. Durkee; finance, W. H. Dexter; pew, W. B. Gage; music, Ellbridge G. Guy. Deacon F. L. Durkee was moderator and E. V. Dexter, clerk. The membership of the church numbers at present 299.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

Smith.

Though the college began a week ago, many of the girls are not yet back, and others who have come are not able to be out, because of the grip.

The gymnasium teacher, Miss Watson, is not able to come back this term and her place is taken by Miss Barrington. The new apparatus is all in now, and Miss Lawrence of Boston, the donor, is here for a few days to start the girls in its use.

In the Junior Whately class, regular parliamentary debates are going on, in which the students are very much interested.

Polytechnic.

At a meeting of '92, held Wednesday afternoon, Messrs. Lyden, A. H. Smith, Collier and Bracken were appointed to nominate committees of arrangements and class day officers for graduation. The class has voted not to publish a class-book but will issue a souvenir similar to ninety's.

Committees are busily engaged making final preparations for '93's half-year supper which occurs next week. These committees were appointed nearly two months ago and every effort is being made to have this supper surpass all previous ones in the history of the Institute.

The present half year closes next Wednesday and the second half begins on Friday noon. There will be no session of the Institute Thursday and Friday morning. Entrance examinations for the apprentice class begin Wednesday morning at eight o'clock and continue for two days. Arrangements are being made for a class of about seventy. Last year the class numbered fifty-four.

The project of an Institute hat is still up for discussion. Tuesday noon a meeting of the joint committee from '93 and '94 organized with Harris, '94, chairman and Paull, '93, secretary. A "mortar-board" was passed around for inspection. The '95 men were of the opinion that their class could not be persuaded to adopt it, and that some other style of headgear must be chosen if the Middlers were to co-operate. Accordingly a sub-committee consisting of the chairmen, secretary and Cobb, '94, was appointed to procure other samples.

Pi Iota has hired and furnished a room in Knowles building for society purposes.

Herbert L. Gale.

Though the bearer of this breezy name is comparatively new to Worcester, the name itself has been long and favorably known in our midst, the late Geo. W. Gale, so long and so favorably recognized as clerk of the Board of Overseers of the Poor, having given to the word a reputation that any one might envy; but if there be any relationship between the families it is so remote that only a genealogical history could trace it.

The present general secretary of Worcester's Young Men's Christian Association is a native of Haverhill, Mass., born under the shadow of Hannah Dustin's monument, and as she was fearless against temporal foes, so our secretary knows no hesitation in his warfare against that which would harm the spiritual man.

He is yet a young man, for it was in 1859, that he made his advent into that bustling city by the Merrimack, a member of a family long established there and long recognized as one of sterling business enterprise. His father was engaged, for thirty years, in the shoe trade and to this vocation his son was reared. He had the advantages of the public schools of his native city, including the High and later he went to New York city to continue the same line of business as that in which his father was engaged.

In time, he became a commercial traveller in his line, and in this capacity, covered the territory from Buffalo to Portland. This occupation gave him a very extensive personal acquaintance, an excellent knowledge of this part of our country and, what is of equal or, possibly, greater importance, an insight into human nature that is in constant use in his secretaryship.

His home, while a resident of the Empire State, was in Brooklyn and there he was a member of Dr. Talmage's famous Tabernacle. His conversion was an exceedingly bright one and, for a time, it seemed probable that he would enter the ministry, but a compromise was made and he went into the Association work. The change was a sudden one, for he performed office work, till noon of the day, on whose afternoon, at three o'clock, he took his satchel and started for his new field.

It was in Middletown, Conn., that he made his essay in his present kind of labor. The Association, there, had been established a long time, but it had suffered vicissitudes innumerable, but Mr. Gale's energetic methods speedily injected new life into it and it very soon reached a pitch of popularity never before attained. This was only about two years ago. He, at once, set about endeavoring to raise money for a building and when the call from Worcester came, he had succeeded in securing subscriptions above $20,000, nearly half the amount needed and a large sum considering the size of the city.

Worcester's invitation was one that he could hardly decline and, accordingly, in December, 1890, about the middle of the month, he came to this city and assumed the management.

His force and energy are as evident and conspicuous here as they were in his late position. Early and late, he is at his post and his labors are legion. To take in hand and to direct the many lines of work in an Association as large as that of Worcester requires tact, talent and executive ability of the highest order. All of these characteristics Mr. Gale possesses in a high degree. A study of his face indicates decision and alertness. He has bodily health and vigor to carry out his plans and purposes. He is an active poeticality gan his work in this capacity October 1st, 1892 and continued, therein, till May 1, 1896. His name, just now, is quite conspicuous in Y. M. C. A. circles on account of his recent return to former associations.

There was, next, an interregnum till March 1st, 1899, when M. B. Van Vranken, a gentleman from New York, became general secretary. But poor health prevented his retaining throughout the Y. M. C. A. building, and a force, vigilant for good, throughout the city. He is unmarried, and thus is able to give all the more time and attention to the duties of his office.

Former General Secretaries.

The line of these officers in the Worcester Association is not a very long one. The first general secretary, though he was then called superintendent, was Joshua Freeman, who beit long and accordingly, he resigned Dec. 2, 1880. Mr. Van V. is well remembered by many Worcester people as a young man of most excellent spirit and all will be pleased to know that he has again entered Association work, laboring now in the South.

Then came the brief acting secretaryship of W. E. Colby, lasting from July 1st, '80, to Oct. 15th, of the same year.

Mr. Richard H. Shelton became the general secretary, April 15, 1881 and, under his management, the elegant hall of the Association was constructed. He was a bundle of nerves and if his health became impaired through his excessive labors it was only the legitimate result of incessant application. After the edifice was finished and occupied, Mr. Shelton resigned and, for a while, sought much needed rest in New Hampshire. Now he is the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. for the state of Maine, and, no doubt, is putting in there the same "best licks" that made him so successful here.

He was succeeded by Samuel G. McConaughy, the youngest general secretary ever in the position in this city. He came from Pennsylvania and very soon made himself an exceedingly popular officer with the members of the Association. But he did not find the East entirely to his liking and so accepted a similar place in Duluth, Minnesota, after about two years of service. He is now in Duluth and very enthusiastic over all that pertains to that lively Western city. This brings us to the present secretary whose portrait adorns our first page.

Worcester Y. M. C. A.

Everybody in this city knows who the building of the Association looks, but there are readers of LIGHT who have not seen, this one of the finest structures in Worcester. Many patrons of the paper left the city years ago, and know us now only as they get such pictures as LIGHT and other similar means aford. It is for such readers that the familiar engraving is reproduced here. Standing on land, reaching from Elm to Pearl Street, it has an exceptionally favorable location, being only a few steps from Main Street and can be entered from both streets. It was opened for use in 1887, the corner stone having been laid August 27, 1886, with appropriate ceremonies. The principal address was made by Mr. Dwight L. Moody, the famous Evangelist. Albert Curtis, who was the largest donator to the building fund, laid the corner stone with a gold plated silver trowel, that day presented to him. The total cost of the structure was above $150,000 and of this sum Mr. Curtis contributed one sixth. By general consent it is one of the largest and best equipped Association Halls in the country. Its gymnasium far excels any other in Worcester and is a source of no little pride to the patronizing young America.

It is claimed by those who know, that the seeds of the Association were sown as far back as 1852 when, in the vestry of the Old South Church, an organization was effected of which Thomas Tucker, proprietor of the American House was made president and Nelson Wheeler, principal of the High School, Philip L. Moen and Sabin A. Daniels, vice-presidents. New to Worcester, this was one of the earliest ventures of the kind in the country.

While this did not live a great while, it is interesting as a forerunner of the permanent organization that came into being June 14, 1864. The first meeting was in Lincoln Hall, now a part of the Lincoln House, and successive meetings were held, the 21st and 28th of June, July 12 and 18th and a permanent organization was effected which has continued to the present time.

The 6th of September, following, the Association took rooms on the second floor of Mechanics Hall and continued to hold the same for five years. At the first meeting Deacon Ichabod Washburn, through the Rev. W. R. Huntington, presented to the newly formed organization a Bible that continues in use even to this day.

The first remove was to Harrington Block, corner of Main and Front Streets, in June, 1869, but the stay, here, was brief, for in the Fall of 1870 quarters were leased for ten years in the Chapin Block, on Pearl Street, long known as the Post Office Block. Before the expiration of the lease, possibly two years, it was voted to remove to Main Street and accordingly the second floor of the Richmond Block, No. 411, was rented and fitted up. Most excellent work was done in these rooms, circumscribed as they were, compared with the elaborate appointments, at present, enjoyed. The next and final remove was to the present well known edifice.

During these twenty-seven years, seventeen different men have held the office of president, the most of them for a single year; one, Mr. George C. Whitney, having the position one year each for two terms. For many years, the term extended from one June to the next and the presidents with their years have been as follows: Frederick A. Clapp, 1864; Charles Ballard, '65; Asa L. Burbank, '66; Henry M. Wheeler, '67 and '68; Lucius J. Goddard, '69; Henry H. Merriam, '70; Charles B. Knight, '71; George C. Whitney, '72 and '84; Charles D. Tucker, '73; Edward Whitney, '74 and '75; Samuel W. Cooke, '76 and '77; J. Orlando Bemis, '78, '79 and '80; William Woodward, '81 and '82; James Logan, '83. In 1885, J. O. Bemis was made president again and he continued to 1889 when he was succeeded by the late W. A. Denholm who resigned in April, 1889. Charles F. Rugg was next elected and he continues in office to date, a president who enjoys the thorough confidence of every one connected with the Association.

A careful reading of this list of presidents will give a very good idea of the spirit that pervades the Association. They have not been selected on account of denomination nor wealth, but through the superior fitness that they have shown for the position. No small part of the Association's success is owing to the wisdom and skill of the men who have piloted the body during these years.

Today, the Y. M. C. A. of Worcester stands as the most powerful single agency for good in the city. It is made up of representatives of all denominations who meet on the common ground of devotion to the Christian religion, irrespective of creed. With the classes that are maintained there, with the meetings that are daily held and with the gymnasium in full operation, it will be seen that mind, heart and body are all provided for. Under discreet management the building may be a choice boon to the young men of Worcester. In fine it occupies just that relation today. The letters, Y. M. C. A., are talismanic for good.

Sheridan's Ride.

The intelligent reader must blush with shame to read of a young elocutionist who is much advertised because of her success in England, who decided to give "Sheridan's Ride" before an English audience. The gentleman who was to introduce her asked her: "Where did Sheridan ride to?" The young person did not know, so replied: "To Bunker Hill." The gentleman stepped before the curtain and announced: "Miss— will recite Sheridan's Ride to the Battle of Bunker Hill." This was too much for some Americans in the audience, and the mistake was corrected. It is no wonder that elocution as a form of public entertainment has fallen off if this represents the intellectual ability of its exponents. How could any one recite intelligently a poem depicting a dramatic incident who did not know the history and environment of the incident? Without this knowledge the reciting becomes the effort of a parrot with a trained voice. — Christian Union.

Mrs. H. Adelaide Matthews.

Mrs. Harriet Adelaide (Greene) Matthews, who died Friday January 8, in this city was the daughter of the late Smith Greene, who was born in Smithfield, R. I. in 1805, and Mary Taylor Clark, who was born in Northampton Mass., in 1808.

Mrs. Matthews was born in the village of Kittville, in Grafton, Mass., August 12, 1836. Her father was at that time in company with the late Dr. Levi Rawson of Farnumville in the manufacture of shoe-kits. The financial distress which followed especially in New England, President Andrew Jackson's abolition of the United States Bank caused the downfall of the firm of Rawson & Greene. Smith Greene moved to Elizabeth Port, N. J. in 1841; thence to Providence R. I. in 1846; thence to Kittville again in 1850; thence to Worcester in 1852, where he died in 1856. During all this time, Adelaide, as she was called by her father's expressed wishes, was the help and comfort of her mother. She showed from early childhood the well balanced judgment and kind affection that characterized her throughout life.

Wishing to obtain an education beyond what her father's means would allow, in 1852 she went to work for the late Jonathan Groot of Worcester, making porte-monies, which people now past their youth can remember were once fashionable. By this means she earned enough to pay her way through a course at the Oread Institute, then in its palmy days and which was under the personal direction of the Hon. Eli Thayer who started the institution. Mrs. Matthews has said in late years, that the Institute after Mr. Thayer entered politics, never attained its former glory and prestige.

She was married to Mr. William J. Matthews Christmas, 1856, by the Rev. Daniel W. Faunce, then pastor of the Pleasant Street Baptist Church. She leaves beside her husband, one daughter Lillian, and one son, William John, Jr. She also leaves four brothers, Levi R. Greene of Boston, John W. Greene of Worcester, Aaron F. Greene of Upton and James H. E. Greene of Worcester. Her father, Smith Greene, was grand-nephew to General Nathaniel Greene of Revolutionary fame.

Mrs. Matthews once spent six months in London, England, her husband's home, before her first child Lillian, was born. Early in June, 1885, the family removed to London which has since been their home. In 1887, Mrs. Matthews came here to visit her mother, who afterwards died in December of that year; again she came in 1889 on a two months' visit and came again last year to die amid the scenes of her much loved Worcester. She used to say that, though she had seen much of the world, there was no scenery so beautiful, nor any streets so charming as those of Worcester.

She was a well informed woman on the affairs of both her native country and those of Europe, which added greatly to her abilities as conversationalist, in which art she excelled. Her powers of description were exceptionally fine, both in conversation and correspondence. Her letters to her few confidential friends were charming epistles. Her description of the last days of the Emperor Frederick and how Sir Morrel Makenzie kept him alive thereby making Queen Victoria's oldest daughter the empress dowager of Germany was a treat to any one who loves romance.

Mrs. Matthews was long identified with the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in Worcester, though in a quiet way.

The tears of gratitude and blessings of those to whom she showed loving-kindness are her best epitaph. She was a devout Christian and of great spirituality.

Her remains are buried in Hope Cemetery beside those of an infant daughter.

Rail Road Manners.

Such manners are not confined to the Boston & Albany by any means, but as in this section, that road is most travelled it affords the most numerous examples of the selfishness said to be innate in all men. A few mornings since an elderly lady (?) with a very heavy seal-skin sack, at any rate it was presumably of that character, seated herself in a car and at once threw open the window, thus rendering the car, in her vicinity, uncomfortable for everybody but herself. Rain beat in, men changed their seats, small boys blinked out the cinders but still that woman kept the window open. What cared she? She was happy. She took Horace's motto in full, "Every man for himself and Scabier take the hindmost."

Concerning the Good Teacher.

"He studieth his scholar's natures as carefully as they their books.—Thomas Fuller.

Industrial Training.

The old apprentice system is dead and buried, and cannot be revived. Trades Unions and other labor organizations object to having a sufficient number of youth taught skilled labor lest it should compete with their own. If a boy continues through the entire grammar school course, unless he is a bright scholar he is rather old to learn a trade which requires skill, and he has his head filled in addition to the knowledge which will be of use to him, with a good deal of stuff that is of no use unless he is going to the high school and thence to the college or scientific schools. Our system of education is based on the notion that education consists in learning what is contained in books, instead of the training which fits youth for the active duties of life. The result is that boys leave school all along through the course from the second year of the grammar school up, until it comes to graduating at the high school, when there are two or three times as many girls as boys, and neither sex is trained to the work which awaits them in life. When industrial training is proposed the objection is made that we already undertake too much, that there are now too many studies in the public schools, and since this is true, objection is effective, and yet it is more important to a boy to know how to use tools than it is to know the rules of grammar, which never enable any human being to use the English language correctly and forcibly. A rich man has used his wealth for the benefit of the city of Cambridge, in the gift of the public library, and of the Rindge school, named for the donor, in which the boys of the high school and other boys qualified to learn, are taught to work in wood and iron, and no expense is spared in the building, the appliances, or the teachers, as Mr. Rindge does not expect that cities and towns will establish schools so expensive as this, but offers a model of what can be done in this direction. In Germany the plan is carried still further, and the boys are taught trades in trade schools and are turned out finished workmen. In this way Germany furnishes the United States with skilled labor which might be trained here from the American stock which is more ingenious, and of more natural capacity for mechanical excellence than any people in the world. The Boston Commercial Bulletin says that the Boot and Shoe Club has appointed a committee to consider the establishment of a trade school for the Boot and Shoe industry, and this fact shows that there is a want in this industry; and what is true here is also true of others. There is no need of adding to the number of studies which any particular pupil shall pursue, but the boys should be taught according to their capacity, and the business which they will probably follow when they leave school. Under the present system the course of study is a Procrustean bed in which the short are stretched out to fill it, and the tall have their heads cut off so that they shall not reach beyond it. Industrial training is of more importance than a large part of what boys learn at school for the average boy. It would fit him more thoroughly for the active duties of life, and be of more advantage to the pupil in an educational point of view, and public in training of good and useful citizens. It is a subject which is stirring the public mind, and which deserves careful and a thorough consideration.—Windham County Transcript.

Cornell.

This institution is to lose two valuable members of the faculty in the resignations of Professors Hale and Laughton to accept $7,000 chairs in the new Chicago University. Prof. Hale is at the head of the Latin Department and has held this position since 1880. Prof. Laughton is in charge of the Department of Economics. Chicago is searching for the best.

The New York Sun figures out that the students in Cornell are more religiously inclined than in any other college. If so, it is an item for the university to be happy over.

Dr. Frank Angell of Cornell was recently married to Miss Louise, daughter of the Hon. Thos. F. Bayard, formerly Secretary of State.

Shorthand in Our Colleges.

Although the profession of stenographic reporting has been accurately traced back to the days of Julius Cæsar and Cicero, yet it cannot be said to have attained any great degree of perfection until about the middle of the last century.

In its early days stenography was merely an abbreviated form employed by private individuals for insuring secrecy in recording memoranda. Today it is a nicely adjusted art, established upon scientific principles, and forming a most potent element in the social, political, commercial and judiciary world.

Notwithstanding the fact that this subject has been so exhaustively treated, and has reached a practical excellence heretofore unknown, it is somewhat surprising, with its wonderful adaptability to every-day use, that it is not more universally employed in jotting down private notes.

In our colleges where students are more or less required to note down the lectures of their professors for future reference and study, it is almost an enigma how this can be accomplished with any degree of accuracy under the present conditions.

Stenography should be included in the curriculum of every college, even if in a very abridged form.

For instance if the student had learned a few of the "special forms" and "word signs" occurring frequently in ordinary conversation, of what inestimable value they would prove in trying to follow a speaker. Instead of spending the time to write out "the," "a" and "an," a dot of the pencil will suffice; instead of "is," "his," "as," "has" a tiny circle—each, of course, in its relative position to the line.

A list of about fifty of these ordinary words could be prepared and memorized with but little application, a knowledge of which would most assuredly prove serviceable.

EMILY SUPPLE.

How Brooks Captured Boston.

"When Harvard celebrated the end of the war" says Julius H. Ward, in the January New England Magazine, "Phillips Brooks was asked to make the prayer on this occasion. The man whose heart and imagination had been fired to the utmost in the heat of the contest could not even pray on such an occasion without breaking forth into words that rose to the greatness of the event; and Colonel Henry Lee, the Harvard marshal for that day, once said to me: 'The services on that occasion were not equal to what men felt. Everything fell short and words seemed to be too weak. Phillips Brooks' prayer was an exception. That was a free speaking to God, and it was the only utterance of that day which filled out its meaning to the full extent. Lowell's Commemoration Ode was great, and so was General Devens' speech, but Brooks surpassed them both. The eager inquiry of that day after that prayer was, 'Who is Phillips Brooks?' It was the first time that he had appeared before the most distinguished audience that could be collected in New England; and from that moment the growing thought at Trinity Church was to induce Bishop Eastburn to resign, and to call Phillips Brooks to the rectorship of Trinity Church.'"

Just What She Wanted.

Young lady (at bird store)—Has this parrot any accomplishments?

Proprietor—He can speak a little, but he is too old to learn anything new.

Young lady (hesitatingly)—Would he imitate any sounds he might hear, such as a sneeze, or a cough, or anything of that kind?

Proprietor—No. The girls were trying the other day to teach him to imitate the sound of a kiss, but he wouldn't do it.

Young lady—I'll take him.—Chicago Tribune.

Not a Kicker.

"How's business today?" asked a passer-by of a poor fellow who had lost both legs—either at Gettysburg or in a saw mill—and was being trundled along the street by a companion, together with a dyspeptic monkey and an asthmatic organette.

"Well," said the legless musician, as he panted in the middle of a popular melody, "I can't kick."

Solons and Papers.

In the usual order of events, at the opening of the Legislature an order was made directing the securing of two copies each of Boston, Worcester and Springfield dailies and of one each of all other Massachusetts dailies for the reading room, but several members understood the order to apply to each one, and they were in high dudgeon over what they considered the unwarrantable extravagance of the body, moreover they wondered where they were going to store their many papers. They were almost vexed when they found that they were off and that they would have to go to the reading room for a sight at the literature. "It beats all how much some people have to learn."

Books and Bookmen

Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider.— Bacon, Essay on Studies.

Dibdin and others have written of book madness, but if ever there was a moment when Americans were in danger of going beside themselves on the subject of books, it is today. The Encyclopaedia Britannica is the book over which they are going daft. It is published for all sorts of prices, but when the purchaser buys it, the chances are that he has a book that reads away over his head. For the general public there is not a Cyclopaedia less adapted to the needs of the average American than this. The International Peoples', Johnston's, Appleton's or Chambers' are all better calculated to answer his questions. What does he care for long treatises on abstract topics. He wants a question answered in the very shortest way possible; but this big book gives him enough to make even Domine Sampson cry out "Prodigious." The old junk dealer will yet be selling Cyclopaedias for two cents a pound.

Messrs. D. C. Heath & Company have just issued a fourth edition of Prof. Hiram Corson's admirable Introduction to the Study of Robert Browning's Poetry, revised and enlarged. The new matter consists of a half-tone reproduction of an autograph photograph of the poet, taken not long before his death, a fac-simile of a most interesting personal letter to the author, and A Death in the Desert with its argument. The volume contains in all five scholarly essays on Browning's poetry, and thirty-four of his most characteristic poems with necessary notes and introductions; also a list of criticisms on Browning. This volume has received the warmest commendations of the poet and stands at the head of the list of critical works. This new edition is furnished at the same price as the old, $1.50.

A unique experiment will be tried in the February issue of The Ladies' Home Journal. The entire number has been contributed in prose, fiction and verse by the daughters of famous parentage, as a proof that genius is often hereditary. The work of thirty of these "daughters" will be represented. These will comprise the daughters of Thackeray, Hawthorne, Dickens, James Fenimore Cooper, Horace Greeley, Mr. Gladstone, President Harrison, William Dean Howells, Senator Ingalls, Dean Bradley of Westminster, Julia Ward Howe, General Sherman, Jefferson Davis and nearly a score of others. Each article, poem or story printed in this number has been especially written for it, and the whole promises to be a successful result of an idea never before attempted in a magazine.

The Mentor, published by the Alumni of the Perkins Institution for the Blind in Boston has entered upon its second volume. The January number has as frontispiece a beautiful engraving of the little deaf and blind girl, Helen A. Keller, who has excited as much interest possibly as did Laura Bridgeman, after Charles Dickens' famous description. Also there is an essay by this eleven years old child on "The Frost King." It would be considered an excellent effort from any pupil, but when we reflect that she has had only five years of instruction, the result is remarkable. The Mentor costs one dollar a year and may be had by addressing J. W. Smith, No. 37 Avon Street, Boston, Mass.

Among the periodicals that come to the desk of LIGHT, the Magazine of New England History holds a high position. Its contents are varied and to the antiquarian exceedingly interesting. In the January Magazine, which is No. 1 for Vol. 2, the first article is a valuable discussion of the relative ages of Southold and Southampton, Long Island. It seems quite allowable to include this section in New England for Librarian Hannahs of the Long Island Historical Society has said that nothing could be more thoroughly New Englandish, than the eastern end of the Island, not even Cape Cod. Genealogy is treated in "The Descendants of John Holmes, of Jefferson, N. H." Dr. John Green of Boston contributes a prelude to the Revolutionary pamphlet which was of absorbing interest in those early and trying days. Principal Huling of New Bedford continues his extracts from the Letter Book of Samuel Hubbard. Notes, Queries, Editorial Notes, and Book Notes are, all of interest and value to him who would with the past hold communion and, from the ancient records, draw facts for later use and diversion. The Quarterly is published by R. H. Tilley in Newport, R. I., at $2 per annum.

The January Education, under the able direction of Frank H. Kasson is one of the best numbers yet issued. President Charles F. Thwing of the Adelbert University discusses "The Higher Education and Christianity." Rev. A. D. Mayo's "The support of the Secondary and Higher Education by the State." is part I of a subject that long experience has enabled him to treat most intelligently "Real and sham observation by Children" by Henry L. Clapp and "Claims, for English as a Study," by True W. White are practical articles for teachers. Prof. Richardson's "Inspiring Pupils to Honorable Actions" is one of the best contributions to the number, for what is teaching worth if he does not prompt to noble doing. Prof. Scarborough's dissertation on one of Grote's Interpretations is a very clear and scholarly treatment of that Historian's rendering of a certain word to Thucydides, while President W. M. Beardshear discusses "State Education, Its purposes and Needs." Editorial matter and correspondence and Foreign Notes are very full. The Bibliography of Current Periodical Literature upon Education is one of the complete compilations furnished by any publication. Education is published at 50 Bromfield Street, Boston, 3.00 a year.

No name in the agricultural world ever had a wider reputation than that of Orange Judd and now the American Agriculturalist which he once conducted so successfully is about to celebrate its semi-centennial. Fifty years old, 108 broad pages, 143 original engravings, articles by 88 authorities in every branch of agriculture and domestic affairs, and a wonderfully compact array of statistics, showing why the future for farmers is brilliant with hope—these are a few of the characteristics of that sterling magazine for January, the American Agriculturalist, 52 and 54 Lafayette place, New York. The unique celebration of its entrance upon its second half century is a marked event in the agricultural world.

The family features are rich in reminiscences, Clarissa Potter describing the good old times in New England, Jessie Benton Fremont giving an historical episode of the Far West, Frank G. G. Carpenter describing the washerwomen of the world, and Katherine Lee relates the women's colleges of the country. The boys and girls are well remembered, not the least interesting thing for them being a novel puzzle contest with $175 in prizes. The Orange Judd Co., publishers, 52 and 54 Lafayette Place New York; price 15c per copy $1.50 per year.

Boston Public Library.

"It is surprising to see the number of ill-clad men who surfeit the entire day for months in this room, reading one book after another. How they live is one of those things no fellow can tell. But they are there. Almost every nationality is represented in this mass of readers; even John Chinaman is "in it;" but he has hitherto devoted himself to Puck or Judge, which papers, by the way, before being properly expelled from the library, were the most widely circulated, of their list of 478 periodicals. Harper's Weekly is next in demand, while Scribner's and Harper's are the most sought after of the magazines. Among the ladies', Don Don, Life, Harper's Bazar and the Century are the favorites, while of the newspapers, the Pilot is the first to wear out.

The average circulation of the entire list is about four hundred each night, but of course it is many times that amount during the day.

The trustees find a decided improvement in the class of readers since the enforcement of the new rule of closing at 9 P. M. instead of 10.

There are not so many of the tramp order to make the room a resting place. Boys are largely represented their papers, being the several juvenile and comic publications.—Transcript.

The Seventh Biennial Report of the Board of Directors of the Kansas State Historical Society for the period commencing Nov. 21, 1888 and ending Nov. 18, 1890 is at hand.

It shows how rapidly this library is growing. It is probable that no other library in the land is taking so much pains to collect files of papers which will really reflect the ways of living of the day better than any book can do. Not only is the list of Kansas papers very complete but a large array is shown from other states. Massachusetts is well represented.

The society has the advantage of an enthusiastic, indefatigable Secretary, Mr. F. G. Adams, who is ever on the alert to advance its interests. It is probable that the collections of the Kansas State Historical Society will excel in extent and interest all similar collections west of the Mississippi. There are already, nearly 60000 titles of books and pamphlets.

Table Talk for January is full of seasonal good things, spread out before the housewife by Mrs. Rorer in her own practical style. To run a household in a manner economical, and at the same time satisfactory to the demands of even an epicurean stomach, is, not we should think, an altogether easy task. Yet this is what Mrs. Rorer asserts can be done, and the province of her magazine is to show and teach exactly how it can be done. That Table Talk is quite equal to the task would seem verified by its six years of popularity and success. Published by the Table Talk Publishing Co. 113 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. $1 a year; 12c single copy.

During his connection with Punch, John Leech contributed over 3000 drawings to the paper, and received some £40,000 in payment.

The Dedham Historical Register for January is No. 1 of Vol. III of this Quarterly. Every number is a confirmation of the assumption that our towns have an abundance of material for publication. The field that the Register is working is a very rich and, apparently, an inexhaustible one.

We have, as a frontispiece, a heliotype of John Rogers's statuette of John Eliot preaching to the Indians. Of course, this is purely ideal but it is beautiful and let us hope that, some day, Roxbury, Newton or Natick may see the same set up, of heroic size in bronze or granite. "Indian Missions in Massachusetts" by Mary S. Locke which naturally follows this picture is the first of a series and is one of the most valuable compilations yet made on this subject. "Schools and Teachers in Dedham" continues to be an interesting theme. "Early Times in Dedham" introduces many names still familiar in this and neighboring towns. "Dover in the Revolution" and "Dedham in the Rebellion" are continued. Other titles are "The Ames Diary," "Franklin, Mass., Births," "First Parish in Needham," "The Editor of By-Gone Days," "Dover, Mass., Births," "Needham, Mass., Epitaphs," "John Eliot, the Indian Apostle," "Ezekiel Holliman," "First Church in Dorchester." The Register is published at $1 a year.

At the meeting of the Horticultural Society next Thursday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock the question for discussion will be "The preservation of roadside trees and the improvement of public grounds." James Draper will read a paper on the subject and a general discussion will follow.

Things Change.

A gentleman is now a member of the Legislature who was a member in "War Times." He says that circumstances have altered mightily. Then, men seemed to hold office by reason of merit, now somebody "hustles" and "gets there." As he puts it, "There is no such thing as preferment going by fitness, it goes to the man that makes the biggest stir and has the longest reach." Is there not a measure of truth in these words? And is the situation confined to the State Legislature?

Curious Corner.

Not infrequently an invention has been suggested by some trivial event which would have passed unnoticed had not a man with eyes and brains seen it. Argand, a poor Swiss, invented a lamp with a wick fitted into a hollow cylinder, up which a current of air was allowed to pass, thus giving a supply of oxygen to the interior as well as to the exterior of the circular flame. At first Argand used the lamp without a glass chimney. One day he was busy in his work room and sitting before the burning lamp. His little brother was amusing himself by placing a bottomless oil-flask over different articles; suddenly he placed it upon the flame of the lamp, which instantly shot up the long circular neck of the flask with increased brilliancy. It did more, for it flashed into Argand's mind the idea of the lamp-chimney, by which his invention was perfected.

Dr. Flint is quoted as saying: "I have never known a dyspeptic to recover vigorous health who undertook to live after a strictly regulated diet, and I have never known an instance of a healthy person living according to a strictly dietetic system who did not become a dyspeptic."

The Faithful Dog of Helvelly.

A monument has just been erected on Helvelly, (a mountain of Cumberland, England, 3,300 feet high) to the memory of Charles Gough, who, in the year 1805, was killed by falling from the high crags on the ridge that joins Striding Edge to the summit; and of the faithful dog who for three months watched over her master's remains. Sir Walter Scott describes the event in the poem "I climbed the dark brow of the mighty Helvelly," and Wordsworth records it in his lines on "Fidelity."

The young man was returning to Wythburn, where he lodged, from a fishing excursion to Patterdale. The accident was probably caused by a false step, during a blinding hail-storm or a dense fog that day. It happened on April 18, and on July 20 his bones were found, still watched by the starving dog, a little yellow, rough-haired female terrier. She had given birth to puppies, which were found dead by the side of the corpse. It is believed though unable to secure enough food for milk for her young, she maintained life by bits of carrion sheep which are not infrequently found on the hills; but she might have had to range far and wide during her three months' watch. The mere fact that the bones were found intact serves to prove the assertion that the dog did not touch the remains of her master, for dogs break the bones to suck the marrow. This animal died a few years afterward at Kendal.

The merit of the suggestion to erect this monument belongs to Miss Frances Power Cobbe, whose design has been carried into execution by the aid of the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley, Vicar of Crosthwaite, both names of some repute in literature.—Illustrated Evening News.

President G. Stanley Hall has been suffering from the grip this week.

Progression.

Within our minds is one conclusion fixed,
Not born of vain imaginings,
And that no warped opinion can restrict,
That 'tis our right to peer into
The unseen world, and view the light beyond.
If we but go de our straying feet
With heartfelt truth, and love, are ever fond
Of thoughts and deeds that will unfold
Our spirit's grandest purpose, we shall know
That the angels who more truly live,
We have but to improve this life, and grow
In graces that adorn the soul.
We know the unseen ones may far outrun
Our lagging feet, to reach their plane
We must maintain the strife for work undone.
Would saint or sinner bar our way?
Are we the worse for spirit cognizance?
May not our souls in sunlight bask?
E'en Christ Himself did not forbid the glance,
But bent our thoughts to things above,
And told us 'twould surely come again.
Proving the truth beyond a doubt
That there are many hearticals, not in vain
Sent to us from the world of love,
A subtle something is the sure response
Within our eager, anxious souls
About, which angels through a firmer scene
Gainst gloomy doubts, and sterner fear,
And in this truth is one incentive grand,
Our fainting hearts to guide and cheer,
That with the unseen ones we yet may stand
And in their presence learn to know
That progress lieth, as here, is proved a power,
Our souls are like all natural growth,
A fair, symmetrical, and budding flower,
The hand of Death is tender too,
It starts the spirit back to bloom anew,
A rare unfoldment is the end.
Nay, think not that we covet death, nor view
It as a monster dread, we feel
The force of gradual growth, and long to pace
Still nearer to the unseen ones—
The tokens of death will leave us no trace.
Death gives a royal robe, aside
The old one falls, Death is a summer shower
That waxes the soul bud to new life,
And with aptured fate will burst in flower.
A friend in Death is none the less,
Who leads us toward Elysian fields where we Through progress' mighty law are fit
To know the grandeur of eternity.
Our Father does not love us less
Because so human that the thought of eyes,
Dear spirit eyes, can move us to
More earnest work, and fault that in us lies Seems pitiful, and fills us with
A deep and constant sense of burning shame,
Because those loving eyes can see,
And grief for our misdeeds. He does not blame
The one who holds a truth, and proves
It good to their this earthly bidding place.
There is no call within this life
That fills us up with pure, and saintly grace
As knowledge that our angels know
Are conscious of each life and every deed.
And if we will accept the truth
The converse sweet will prove a royal need.
Why should we aliens be to truth?
Unveil your hearts, and let your lives resound
With knowledge that the world's commune,
Nor make your silence prove you alien bound.
—Mrs. A. H. Hinman.

Inasmuch.

The Scriptural words "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my children, etc.," have had a fresh illustration, recently, in this city, when Dr. B. F. Clough and wife set about securing means to properly bury the remains of the late Dr. Scribner. For many years a physician in Leicester and this city, but in later years, "Misfortunes had followed fast and followed faster" till in death there seemed only a burial at the public expense. All honor to his late associate and the latter's wife in moving in the matter so that his body may rest finally in some other place than the Potter's Field.

"Waiting."

BERTHA BRIDGMAN DAVIS.

[Concluded from last week.]

Aunt Polly's flower garden seemed like one dark abyss. Henry Warden sat near the window and mused. So had these from childhood's happy hours been planted in his heart, and had sprung up into fruitfulness of joy; but the mist that had been gathering in this last vacation time, now seemed to be settling over his future like one dense cloud.

But the happiest life has its night and with the rising wind his one long vacation day was drawing to a close.

He sat shut till the rain and wind compelled him to shut the window, from which he went to the one facing the sea. A remarkable sight met his gaze. The sky was a murky confusion.

Here and there great forming masses like dark fuel smoke, clouds rushing everywhere and terminating in remarkable heaps.

In another hour the sky was more overcast; and the wind was fiercer and when Night drew her wet mantle closer around the earth the hand could hardly be distinguished before the face, and again Henry Warden sat musing.

Thoughts of his own life and future happiness went drifting out to sea, with the wind and the waves, and soul tossed and weather tossed creatures of God.

Fisherman's tales become illustrated before his fixed vision, as a lightning flash would reveal to him only the depth of the darkness out there on the deep; and the pictures of men clinging to masts and souls striving after God came in quick succession. Afar off on the land were frantic wives and loving mothers, counting the minute hand of despairing time, while one sad sweet face remained before him waiting for one who might never return.

Still the storm increased and Henry Warden, saddened by the sight, but made nobler by his sorrowing, went to watch with her whose sorrow he so well knew.

When he arrived at the cottage there stood

"Mabel, with her face against the pane."

The kettle had been singing—

"Set the table, Maiden Mabel,
And make the cabin warm,
For your fisher lover
Is out there in the storm."

As the storm grew worse, the expression of terror upon her sweet face increased to one of hopeless despair.

With a peal of thunder, like the crashing and snapping of masts and timbers of some ship at sea which had fallen in the seething waters and struck bottom on the rocks and bones of former victims, immediately came a flash of lightning through the windows and played around the andirons; while the wind blew furiously down the big chimney leaving the moaning sound of a dying man ringing in her ears.

The night wore on. The day broke. Out-side, heaps upon heaps of dead leaves lay strewn all over the ground. Others just stripped of their last hope of life, were flying promiscuously through the air. While the wind breathed its worn out passion of nature, the sun came slyly up over the hills as though mistrusting the havoc of the night and doubting even that its light might be welcome to some sad hearts.

As the day grew, the winds abated as though driven back by the rising sun, which came peeping over the top of the barn and glanced in at the window, where through the long night was that face against the pane. Mabel had now left the window and the pale, calm face showed a repose in God. She went about preparing the morning meal, unconscious that the sun came in and played around the breakfast cups at the same time, encircling her throat like a golden chain and fastening itself like a warm loving clasp of friendship.

The neighbors flocked together to talk over the storm. It was pronounced the worst ever known on the coast and all walked down to the shore to gather any spoils that the waves, the ocean's mottos might have brought to the land.

Perhaps a cap of blue or a tie taking passage on some homeward bound remnant of the ship's side, come to tell of the wearer's doom or mayhap his last words, forgotten when parted, were cried out for the winds to carry, but were stifled and buried with the speaker in a watery grave. Some of these on-lookers turn away sad yet hopeful because not even a token came to tell of love, in that unspeakeable way.

Mabel and Henry Warden went, both very pale and anxious.

As they all drew nearer, they were startled by the sight of a long black shape stretched at full length upon the sand.

They hastened with bated breath, each looking for the outline of some beloved father, brother or friend.

Oh! The horrors of that moment as the figure came nearer to view.

Oh! The agony of suspense in the moment of recognition.

Do their faces speak of disappointment as they gently lift the body and turn its face toward the sun, where the purplish hue of a once fair visage discloses no clue to their fears?

The face is smooth. The lips are thin and compressed, while the forth-gurgling foam from out mouth and nostrils gives a ghastly look to the dead.

The curly hair, fast drying in the sun, is gloriously beautiful; and indicates the eyes of blue, those windows to that unseen soul were closed, but their draperies were hung in artistic repose.

Mabel turned away.

But some whose curiosity does not wane, searched his clothes, and find in one of the breast pockets a little testament with a tintype of a woman, whose undeniable likeness identifies him at once as somebody's darling and pride.

CHAPTER III.

A week passed and not one came back to tell of the fated vessel and again

"Mabel, timid Mabel, with her face against the pane, Stood looking out—" while the sun that had cloyed around the breakfast cups and encircled her neck now covered her in a halo of glory. She responded to the warm touch and gazed afar off into the fleecy clouds; saw it was a beautiful world and those of her loved ones gone, seemed nearer; and with beautiful thoughts she wandered to their guidance, to the very gates of heaven. There stood Ben at his portals. His countenance radiant. As he held the white gates open he seemed to say to her, "I am waiting for you, Mabel."

And in the vision she saw the throne and she thought of the great king of that country and the Savior of all; and with new hopes she put herself in His keeping and guidance; a newly born spirit was perceived, like the sun drawing the morning dew which has bathed the hills and sparkles on higher plane.

Just then the latch clicked and Henry Warden came to bid farewell.

The next day he must return to his debit and credit accounts, no more speculating with time, for his problem of life was about solved.

She met him as he came into the room; she knew for what he had come and was silent.

He took her hand and looked questioningly down into her face.

He read in it the expression of her heart and her late sorrow.

He would have kissed her but she drooped her head, then quickly raising it said, "'Tis not because I do not love you that I hesitate in this but"—Henry Warden with all the grandeur that his nature was capable of looked upon that sweet face and read her pure heart; and answering said, "I can't now because you would be sorry for it, God bless you," and he was gone.

CHAPTER IV.

'Twas when three months had passed in one of those large cities, a bookkeeper sat at his desk.

His face wore an expression as if in search of something he could not find. At last drawing a little slip, cut from a newspaper, he read from the scrap, "Brought to life, or Ben Hatch the sailor returned to tell of the fated vessel that was wrecked near the coast 16—" After reading it he felt satisfied even though it took away his last hope and the burden of his prayer continued to be "God bless her."

The sun was setting and left a fitful light around the fireside in Mabel's home. The kettle was singing its song—

"Go spread the supper table,
And set a steaming;
Your fisher lover—"

The kettle was taken off. The tea was made. The family gathered around the table and there listened as he told them of the terrors of that night.

How the thunder roared and the lightning flashed; showing the white face of some brother sinking just out of reach.

How he, Ben, clung to the ship's side till his body, floating on the top of the waters, came alongside of a spar and with one deep despairing clutch he caught the one fragment of hope, and with his fast failing strength, wound the rope around his body and fastened it to the spar; and tossed at the will of the sea was found unconscious by a foreign ship, and finally carried to a Sailors' Home.

There he lay powerless for weeks.

The story was a long one, but the telling of joy was longer.

To Ben it seemed many years since he had wooed his fair Mabel at the gate. But now was come the wedding day.

The little church stood on a green carpeted ground, arrayed in white like the bride, who glided down the aisle in a simple gown with flowing bridal veil.

And there at her throat catching two shreds of lace, a pin, one forget-me-not, set in a coll of gold. In the centre of the flower was fastened a pearl, just as though a tear had dropped thereon.

It came in a little white box, bearing the postmark—city. That was all it said. The marriage passes. Ben and Mabel walk down the church aisle, out into a new life.

CHAPTER V.

Ten fleeting years had passed.

Time had wrought but few changes to the landscape round about.

Long ago he had laid a clammy hand upon the brow of Squire Smith; and the sound of the axe was not heard for the workman was called to receive his wages and to labor near his master. The mail coach had again brought city boarders. But Aunt Polly, dear soul, was away.

They, the city folk, were taking their first stroll on the beach.

It happened to be the day when ten years ago that great storm swept the coast and gathered so many to the ocean's rough bosom.

They marveled at the change in nature, as the ebbing tide went out and the sea breezes fanned their cheeks.

One among them, walking as if alone, had a far off look upon his handsome face as though his thoughts might be in that distant ship, where only the white winged canvas could be seen fluttering near the heavens, like specks of pretty cloud.

The traveller left the shore and turned in the direction of the church. Passing some bushes where the wild flowers grew he stooped to pluck once more, the roses whose delicate pink reminded him of the flush of a cheek when beside him ten years before he had placed some in her hair.

While he picked the thorns scratched his hands, as if they could lay bare the old wound in his heart.

He was nearing the house from which he had once fled so quickly.

Meeting a fisherman, he accosted him with a word about the weather in which the old salt reminded him, that just ten years ago occurred that fearful storm—but here the old man seemed to be muttering, "Ben was saved but now he's gone to that shore, where they tell me no storms ever come and"—Henry Warden, for it was he, staggered, put his hand to his brow and asked, "Dead?" "Yes, Ben is dead and"—the old man finished to the winds what the traveller did not know. He had moved on, a hopeful look came into his face.

As the house came in sight, he became more pale and agitated.

To the left stood the church all white and ghostlike.

In the church yard side by side rose the mounds. As he stood at the gate with the soft wind kissing the leaves overhead, Henry Warden breathed a prayer for the one whose husband was lying there.

'Tis the beautiful sunset that speaks of a glorious future. But now the gray shadows of the night were darkening the horizon. Approaching the house, Henry Warden peered in at the doorway.

The kettle had ceased its song and the embers lay dying on the grate.

He was just about to knock when a lovely little girl came into the room, followed by an elderly woman, who asked the stranger in.

He began at once to speak of her whose image was before him.

"O, yes, she is dead; gone these two months" she said, and leaving the room she returned with a little box which she placed in the child's hands.

Little Mabel came towards him.

With a woman's intuition, she read the love in that kind face, and the heart full of tender feelings.

With the box in her hands she offered her little gift saying, "Mamma said if you ever came here, I must love you and give you this." Still holding it towards him looking up into his face she whispered to him "Will you take it?"

He took it and with it both little hands; and drawing her nearer, he gently raised the cover, as though some precious remembrance was hidden beneath the lid; and there shining like a crystalized tear, nestled the pearl in that flower which spoke to him as did that Angel in his dream; when she said—"I come to leave a child with thee, it is, 'Forget me not.'"

Clasping the child to his arms Henry Warden bowed his head, and the grave woman wondered when he said, "God bless her."

Dr. Lowell Mason.

The Medfield Historical Society, only recently organized, has fully justified its claim to recognition in the magnificent manner in which it celebrated the centennial of Lowell Mason's birth on Thursday, the 8th inst. The great singer's memory is fondly cherished in this beautiful town and the opportunity to fitly commemorate him was seized upon in an excellent spirit. It was something to remember that Dr. S. F. Smith, the author of "America" and a fellow worker of Dr. Mason, was on the platform and took part in the exercises. Some of the grandest of the great composer's tunes were sung, as the Missionary Hymn, Hebrew, Laban, Downs, Uxbridge and Hamburg. Of course, with the author present, America was sung. Mr. W. S. Tilden, the historian of Medfield, gave an interesting sketch of Dr. Mason's life. His family was long settled in Medfield and here the first twenty years of Dr. Mason's life were spent. Next he is found in Savannah, Ga., and afterwards in Boston in the banking business, but always a musician. The latter part of his life was spent in Orange, N. J.

Not the least attractive part of the program was the singing of the school children under Prof. Tilden, this being especially appropriate when we remember Dr. Mason's influence in popularizing the study of music with the young.

The speaking was unusually happy, and well it might be, for certainly there never was a better theme than that which the composer's life and career presented.

Joseph H. Allen was the president of the day and very fittingly did his part. Howard Lowell Mason, Esq., a grandson of the musician was present and spoke, as did the Rev. H. J. Patrick of West Newton, Mr. Charles Stone of Boston, Prof. N. T. Allen of West Newton, Mr. J. C. Haynes of Boston, and Mr. A. A. Lovell of Medfield but formerly of Worcester. He closed the speaking with a very feeling and worthy tribute to the character and work of Dr. Mason.

A Busy Man.

When a man conducts classes in the Y. M. C. A. and at the Worcester Academy, looks after the interests of his own flourishing institution and has the grip, besides, he must be kept pretty thoroughly active. And that is just what Mr. E. C. A. Becker has been doing for the past few weeks. He is a living illustration of what vim and energy can do. He may be found in regular hours at his Business College in Clark's Main Street block. No where, in this city, does a more studious air prevail than in the school rooms of this school. Everything, pertaining to business education, is taught here in first class manner. Mr. Becker has a grip on his business.

Quite So.

Some people never will be rich,
Because they're always stewing
And fussing over something which
Some other fellow's doing.

Our Teeth.

Some Branches of Dentistry. Importance of Mechanical Department.

Unfortunately this old term "Mechanical" has in it a tinge of odium to many good men in our profession and, may I not say to the majority of the dentists now just beginning? This branch of our profession seems almost to have been tabooed in our societies and sadly neglected in our offices. How many dentists have a large, well arranged, thoroughly equipped and lighted laboratory? On the contrary the laboratory is so often a small and out of the way, poorly lighted and poorly ventilated place. Neither time, thought nor expense is spent by the younger dentist in providing a well lighted convenient and commodious laboratory, provided with all the necessary appliances for conducting the most important branch of our noble profession; but see what time, money, thought, energy he will put into his operating room and how proudly he invites you to see his new and handsomely furnished office equipped with all the modern and most expensive improvements, as costly fountain spittoon, high-low Wilkerson chair, electric engine, electric mallet, with which he fills teeth with lightning rapidity. But listen, do you hear him invite you to see his modernly arranged laboratory? No sir, not one word about that. However, if perchance you accidentally allude to his laboratory, hoping he may show that place of places, he proudly remarks, "O! my time is all occupied in operating, you see. I have forty or fifty engagements on my books, at from $5.00 to $10.00 an hour, so of course I have no time to devote to mechanical dentistry, and besides, I hate to bother with it. We dentists who get so much per hour cannot afford to bother in making teeth for $10.00 a set. We can make more, filling teeth." Yet it is a notorious fact that the majority of our operative dentists are obliged to do more or less mechanical work in order to get the operative too. It is also a fact, worthy of our attention that most of the mechanical work, done by these high toned operative fellows fully demonstrates the fact, that they have not given the attention nor have they the artistic taste that every dentist should have in order to make a set of teeth suitable for the person. How many mouths are disfigured by teeth that look like white as marble and as large as gravestones? They make the mouth look hideous. There are few dentists who have taste for selecting teeth suitable for different mouths. They select the same teeth for all mouths, paying no regard to the condition of the face, complexion etc., and unless labeled, "This is a crown," "These are teeth" it might be difficult to say what they were intended to represent. Too many operators look upon the making of artificial teeth as something to be left to a boy, or after the dentist has taken the impression it is sent to some other dentist who knows how to make a set as it should be made if he only could see the person's mouth. Then he would have a conception of the form or features of the person for whom the teeth are constructed.

The person who practices prosthetic dentistry should possess an education to preserve the form and color adapted to the individual, as the artist, with his colors, produces a likeness of his subject. A wrong conception of what is mechanical dentistry exists in the minds of many a dentist.

The term mechanical dentistry is applied and confined to that portion of the art of dentistry which is practiced in a dental laboratory. I would claim, and so do the professors of our dental colleges, for this branch of dentistry, as much thought study and preparation as any part of dental art. The more experienced and intimate acquaintance I have with the duties devolving upon the practitioner of dentistry, the more I am inclined to the opinion that were the mechanical part to be taken out of the science of dentistry, little would be left to the gentlemen who so loftily ignore the title of mechanical dentist. Mechanical operations of various kinds comprise three-fourths, if not more, of all that is practiced in the dental profession. The preparing of a cavity in a tooth for filling is all mechanical, then all that is left to the operative or surgeon dentist, is the treatment of a few diseased conditions of the mouth. I would place mechanical dentistry on a broader basis, and give it a higher standard.

The professors of our dental colleges tell me that the students do not pay attention enough to artificial work and say that they go from the college with some book learning about filling teeth. They also say that if they could not show a young man how to fill a tooth in a few weeks he would never become a dentist, and had mistaken his calling. I would have the mechanical dentist, the peer of the operative dentist. I would have him endowed with inventive and imitative skill. He should be a judge of color, light, shade, form and size, and should have an acquired knowledge of Anatomy, Physiology, Chemistry, Surgery and general medicine, to be able to treat, successfully, all conditions of the mouth. Let this be the standard and our profession will not be weighed down by its odious members, and humanity will derive the full benefit of this most merciful calling. Since it is by means of the mechanical principles of dentistry that so many happy changes are made in the human face either by artificial dentures, crowns, bridge work filling etc. I am constrained to think that, perhaps, a more kindly feeling would be stimulated towards this branch of industry, if it were called by a different name. Considering the effect produced through mechanical dentistry, in restoring lost features and reproducing the personal appearance as it existed before the loss of a tooth or teeth, would not the term, "Artistic Dentistry" be more appropriate, sound more euphonious and help to remove much of the odium now hovering around the old term? Our young D. D. S. s., would be as proud of the title "Artistic Dentist" as they are now of the Operative Dentist. Surely the former would sound quite as aristocratic and professional as the term "Operative Dentist," so often used.

At the meeting of the Worcester Grange next Tuesday evening, Calvin L. Hartshorn, a member of the new State Dairy Bureau, will read a paper on the bureau, "its origin, organization and purposes." There will also be a musical program including a violin solo by Miss Nellie F. Cooley and a song by Mrs. L. J. Kendall.

Mr. George M. Bancroft announces that he is prepared to receive pupils for instruction on the violin, at his studio in the Knowles building, and as he has been an earnest student of the instrument almost from his childhood he should make a very efficient teacher. At the present time he is studying with the famous Prof. Bernard Stemann of Boston. He is also the director of the newly organized Worcester Concert Orchestra.

Public School Papers.

The Jew and the Janitor.

BY FRANCIS ZURI STONE.

I have often thought that while juvenile literature is rich in tales of school life in England we do not possess any really good tales of that class which appeal directly to the sympathies of an American, or if we do, I have yet to see them. Robert Grant, it is true, published something of the kind a few years ago, but the production was modeled on English lines and drew a picture of boy life as it might be at an ideal institution. As a painting it is a success, but as a photograph it strikes me unfavorably. Indeed so closely does it resemble Trans-Atlantic works of the same character that the great base-ball game at the close of the volume at once suggests a cricket match at Eton, Harrow or Rugby, the hero figuring of course as Captain of the triumphant eleven. We have boarding schools here, but only a very small number of boys, comparatively speaking, enjoy their questionable advantages. We deplore the existence of that unspeakably contemptible unique, the Anglo-Maniac, yet the unthinker might with some reason, point to foreign school stories, and ask us why our writers have given us no worthy rivals of their popularity based on that pre-eminently American institution, the public school. The absence of an international copyright has had as much to do with the breaking out of Anglo-mania as the reputation for safety and despatch enjoyed by the Cunard line.

It is my purpose to recall some of the most memorable events that occurred during the time I spent at a public school, in the hope that these reminiscences may be of interest to those who have had similar experiences.

The school that I attended longest, stood in one of the upper wards of New York City with the Hudson about a mile away and East River somewhat nearer. The building was erected during the Tweed regime I think, for a court house, but it was never used for that purpose, those who succeeded the great Boss in the management of Manbattan's property, having arrived at the conclusion that preventing crime is better than punishing it, and educating voters the surest way to avoid the extortions of official black-mailers. They decided to turn their court-house into a school. It would be a curious speculation, but I would like to know how much expense that decision has saved the people. No one who went there with me would question the propriety of terming New York a cosmopolitan city. I don't think over twenty per cent of the eighty boys usually drafted into a single class-room had names of English derivation, but of the 2100 pupils recorded on the rolls sixty per cent at least were of foreign parentage. I recall now that during a part of one term I sat with a Jap on one side, a recent arrival from Portugal on the other, a Polish Jew in front and a Swede behind. It was a good place to study the result of unrestricted immigration. I cannot say, however that I ever noticed any marked difference in scholastic ability between the races represented, though, to be sure, national characteristics often cropped out, especially with the Hebrews, who were nearly as numerous as the Americans,—the Germans outnumbered either. Speaking of Germans. I don't understand the policy of introducing that language in the public schools. If a German comes to this country are we to put a premium on his jealous retention of foreign custom and mannerism, by fitting our children to carry on their relations with him in the tongue of his fatherland? Are we going to assimilate the indigestible mass we have swallowed any quicker by keeping it alive in the stomach?

To return to the Hebrews. There was a little black-eyed scamp of precocious craftiness there, whose name was Levi; not that his name would easily fix his identity for there were innumerable Levis at our school. Well, the building had never been altered to any great extent from the original design, so there was a sort of jail-yard opening out of the cellar, guarded by iron bars twenty feet high. It was the practice of teachers to throw out of the back windows into this sunken yard any proscribed articles that were captured during the session. The stone pavement far down below and entirely out of reach was a veritable lake of tantalus to the boys who looked with longing eyes at wealth thus placed in chancery. There were jack-knives, (why "jack"—I never have been able to find out) balls, tops, puffy-blowers, "flippers" (bean-shooters, or sling shots I think they are called everywhere else), dime novels and a great variety of ingenious engines for the annoyance of the authorities.

Now the only person having access to this Golconda was red-haired John McGonnigle, the janitor, and John cared as little for riches as Timon of Athens. He was a misanthropic, pre-occupied man and had no interest in anything about him except the frequent pugilistic encounters that took place in front of the school. It was John's duty to stop all such affairs and I have always entertained the idea that a life-long endeavor to reconcile his duty to his inclination embittered his existence and made him the moody pessimistic man we knew. He never appeared upon the scene of action until the last moment (he had a window from which he watched the progress of chance misunderstanding with surly joy and with one eye fastened upon the infuriated gladiators fearful lest he should lose a detail, he would drive away the spectators first, thus saving every possible moment to the principals. But in the meantime he kept up a running fire, aimed at them, in which his charge sometimes failed to explode. While he flourished his broom and scattered the ring I have heard him address two lads in this way:—"Be hivins O'll repot yez,—Git on out av this now or O'll hav yez before th' principal—howly mother av God,—that was a nate swipe!—an' 'tis another wan roight an' th' o' that yez hov, me laddy buck. Yez ought to be ashamed. 'Tis a foine broth of a yue yez are! Hit him wan in th' ribs av him now!—'tis th' sap yez've started—nixt tome he jabs at your mou't' duck under and go for his hind. Faith o'll hov yez expelled!"

Young Levi was aware of the janitor's weakness and formulated a plan of campaign. From a sneaking, malicious young scamp he suddenly developed into a lad of metal, wearing chip epaulets and literally treading on the toes of every boy whom he considered pugilistically inferior to himself. As I have said before, he was a little fellow, but by no means an insignificant opponent as many learned to their cost. A week after digging up the hatchet he had become the idol of red headed John McGonnigle and the possessor of two black eyes, relics of a stubborn contest with a tough little Prussian named Eckert.

It was soon discovered that if the janitor loved the Jew the latter reciprocated his affection with all the warmth of an oriental nature. They were together at noon, and after the dismissal of school Levi lingered to comfort John. And one day a rumor went through the building that was astounding enough to be scoffed at as incredible. A cross-eyed youth named Coogan, having been "kept in" until four o'clock for blowing an ingenious instrument made from the fly leaf of a spelling book deposed that he saw Levi and the janitor together in a deserted class-room which the latter was sweeping. Nothing would induce Coogan to retract his statement to the effect that Levi was dusting desks! Of course there were few who could believe the Hebrew capable of this enormity, which was set down by some as a fact only in the imagination of cross-eyed Coogan, a theory rendered plausible by the circumstance of his having been thrashed only the day before by the person he now testified against. Others accepted a more charitable hypothesis, accounting for Coogan's calumny on the grounds of his oblique vision which, it was confidently asserted, enabled him to see double and thus possess a sort of second sight.

Time passed and the Jew's singular coalition with the janitor had ceased to be a matter of general discussion; other things of fresher interest absorbed the attention of our school, occurrences not so sensational, but newer: last year's great fire does not excite us as much today as a wordy altercation in wretched billingsgate between a licensed venter and a slattern servant girl down our street. But one afternoon just before the close of the session, Reddy Callahan, who had left the room a short time before returned in a state bordering on insanity. He threw himself into his seat and in a stage whisper informed Prehalski, a Polish Jew sitting next to him, that sheeny Levi [all Jews had "Sheeny" prefixed to their names at our school] had gained entrance to the cellar-yard, presumably by the connivance of McGonnigle, and was growing opulent with the treasures to be had for the mere picking up.

The tremendous news spread. Boys have a sort of freemasonry by means of which they communicate important intelligence without alarming the teacher. Never was a more profound sensation created in legislative halls by the sudden announcement that a minister has been recalled and war is imminent than was created by Reddy Callahan's words. Never was treachery duplicity more deeply execrated than was Levi's. Never was resentment more thoroughly or dangerously aroused.

There are certain laws, unwritten it is true, but none the less binding, which govern school boys in their mutual relations. The involuntary deposits in that bank to which sheeny Levi had, through soulless machinations, gained admittance were looked upon as public property alike unavailable for private recovery or individual assumption, just as most countries regard buried treasure as the requisite of the governmental treasury. Levi had set this law at naught. He had ruthlessly violated the most jealously guarded statute of the entire code.

When he emerged from the front door that afternoon with his feloniously obtained wealth his pockets bursting and his crafty face illumined with satiated avarice, he found himself confronted by an array of stern countenances that made his heart throb and then stand still in his breast. Sieur. Clubin, successful in wrecking the "Durande," with those sixty thousand blood-stained francs in his pocket, finding himself when the fog lifted, confronted not by the Hanways, but by those terrible Donvres over whose desolation death reigned supreme, must have experienced such a shock as the Hebrew experienced when he read his fate in the determined faces of the mob.

There was no escape. Like phantoms of past misdeeds around the bed of a dying felon, he saw around him those whom he had overcome to conciliate the guardian of the treasure chamber. He had toiled and plotted that his edifice might be complete, and behold it tottered beneath him as he stood upon the pinnacle. A moment later they faced each other. Then with a howl that had in it more of brute than human, the crowd fell upon Levi.

Five minutes later with blackened eyes and a bleeding nose; with his coat torn up the back and his hat missing,—without even a china alley to show what he had lost, the Jew was permitted to depart, bruised and limping to the house of his fathers.

The Tramp and the Violin.

A down town music store in Lewiston was surprised on Friday at the entrance of a tramp—a ragged, veteran tramp, who said that he was not vicious, but only unfortunate. "What made you come into a music store?" asked the proprietor. The thin cheeks of the tramp flushed as he said, "I am a musician." Having said that he played the violin they handed him one, and he laid a loving cheek against the fiddle and drew a bow of finished power across the trembling strings. For half an hour he played to a rapt audience, preluding with the skill of the improvisator and weaving the theme into many an airy fancy of the strings. Sometimes he marched up and down the floor playing and talking.

A new light was born in his eye. His rags were forgotten by all who saw him. His cheeks were flushed and his gray hair was tossed back by an impetuous wave of his head. In the imagery of the strings were palaces of delight and strange visions of wasted hopes and years. In the pleading voice of the violin one heard the voice of long ago, a mother's tone and a baby's cry. "That's all right," said he, as he laid it down and a silence fell upon all around, broken by the querulous voice of the tramp as he said, "Give me the price of a supper."—Lewiston (Mc) Journal.

Entertainments.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"Nobody's Claim," a border drama replete with interesting situation and hair-breadth escapes, has been drawing the usual large audiences at the Pleasant Street Theater this week. This is the drama in which J. J. Dawling and Haddon coined money for several years. Miss Ethel Tucker as Madge, the heroine, has an excellent opportunity to display her artistic powers and most charming personality. Her work is always of the best. Mr. Charles Baringer made his first appearance with the Tucker company, as Ward Deveraux, and was enthusiastically received. Miss Newhall is still a minor attraction.

The Katherine Rober company will occupy the theater next week and will produce that stellar attraction, "The Two Orphans." Miss Rober and her company are always sure of a hearty welcome.

The management are to be congratulated on the enormous business this house has done in the first six months of its existence, which shows conclusively that Worcester patrons of the drama are ready and willing to support good companies and a management which appreciates their necessities and does all in its power to give value for money received.

Dramatic Notes.

Scanlon, the actor, was making $60,000 a year, and now he is hopelessly insane and an inmate of the Bloomingdale Insane Asylum in New York. Success turned his brain.

George S. Knight, the genial and athletic comedian, who made considerable money and an extensive reputation as Otto, in "Over the Garden Wall," some years ago, has long been a victim of paresis. He is in perfect physical health. His wife recently declined the offer of a benefit for him in New York city, saying she was able to support him as long as he lived, from her salary as an actress. Such widely devotion is truly commendable.

In view of the generous newspaper puffing which the MacLean-Prescott Dramatic Company has been receiving in the leading papers throughout the country, the following opinion as expressed by an eminent New York dramatic critic will be of considerable interest to local theater-goers. The company is this week playing an engagement at the Worcester Theater, which ends this evening.

"In nothing that they have thus far done in New York have Mr. MacLean and Miss Prescott shown quite such a wealth of inadequateness as in 'The Merchant of Venice,' which was produced last night at the Union Square Theater.

"If Mr. MacLean had not been saturated with an infinite equipment of deadly and depressing dullness he might perhaps have risen at times to the point of burlesque, but he was not so bad as to be absolutely funny.

"He had not what might be called an intellectual grasp of Shylock at all. The fine qualities of Shakespeare's remarkable Jew were a dead letter to him, and there was a degree of coarseness and clumsiness about the reading of some of the speeches that seemed inconsistent with intelligent study.

"Indeed, what might be called the reading of the text was woefully lax throughout, but there was no more brazen sinner than Mr. McLean himself.

"It is late in the day to call attention to the possibilities of paths which lie in Shylock's lines. Unquestionably, much of the deft and subtle meaning which the poet meant to convey was lost upon some of the earlier actors who essayed the character, but for many years the possibilities have been fully revealed by students and commentators on Shakespeare.

"Of late years Mr. Booth and Mr. Irving have brought out the human qualities of the money-lender with great power, and Mr. Irving triumphed so far over conventional aversion to the character that he easily carried the sympathies of the audience with him towards the end of the great drama. Indeed, he has given few finer exhibitions of his power of expressing paths than in this part.

"It is, of course, not intended to contrast Mr. McLean's mistaken and immature performance of the rôle with the work of these two scholarly actors, but it is permissible, perhaps, to wonder that he has profited so little by the work of the several famous Shylocks of the stage. He was obtuse, noisy and untaught.

"Miss Prescott evidently had no idea of her own concerning Portia, and the colorless performance which she gave indicated that she did not even possess the skill to portray the stereotyped features of the part. There was no personal charm in her work.

"The support was wretchedly ineffective."

Samuel A. Porter.

For a number of years Mr. Porter had enjoyed the distinction of being one of the oldest ex-city officers in Worcester. To many people he was a sort of treasure house of facts pertaining to Worcester in earlier days and he seldom appeared in the street without having referred to him some question in which the earlier history of our city was concerned. His mind was very clear up to the date of his final illness which began, Dec. 22d, while attending to certain business in the Central Bank. Since that date he gradually failed till his death which took place Saturday, the 9th inst.

Mr. Porter was born in this city in October 1808 and for the most part has been a resident here ever since. He has in his career, worked at carpentering and blacksmithing, and had accumulated a comfortable fortune. He has long resided in Ward Two, where he was a prominent figure on the Republican side of politics. He represented the ward in the legislature in 1882. Among the other public offices he occupied were those of chief engineer of the Worcester fire department in 1859, member of the common council for six years, 1875 to 1880 inclusive, alderman for four years, 1884, to 1887.

His wife who survives him was a daughter Thomas Paige of Hardwick. They had no children of their own, but an adopted daughter is the widow of the late M. M. Ward. His funeral was attended at Plymouth Church Tuesday at 3 p. m., Dr. McCullough officiating.

Mrs. Levi Lincoln, who has been confined by sickness to her home, 10; Elm Street, since last September, is now so far recovered that she is able to be out.

South End News.

Mr. Chas. C. Brown has accepted a position with Putnam & Fobes, grocers, 600 Main Street.

Prof. Charles Edwards read a paper or "Negro Melody," at the residence of Mrs. W. B. Kehew, before the members of the Folk Lore Society, at Boston, last evening. Mrs. Edwards accompanied him upon the piano.

Mr. John J. Whittier, for the past six years with Mr. F. M. Harris in the drug business at 814 Main Street, will open a drug store at 6 Main Street, Feb. 1st, where all his South End friends will be welcome.

Members of Piedmont Church who have lamented the departure of Miss Evangeline Houghton will be surprised to learn that Mr. Clarence Shirley has also resigned to accept a more lucrative position in Boston. Mr. Shirley has been the leading tenor there for the past year and has proved very satisfactory to the music loving members.

Mr. J. Everett Toombs' new residence on Queen Street is nearing completion and is destined to be an ornament to the neighborhood.

Rev. Mr. Conrad gave another of his practical discourses to young people last Sunday evening on the proper use of the eyes.

Mr. Harry P. Davis, W. P. I. '89, who has been with the No. 9 Hathorn Street, has returned to the West.

Mr. Arthur Kent leaves next week to take charge of an electrical department in a mill near Webster.

Mr. James L. Amsden, the South American explorer and fruit dealer, has in his possession some of the new 50c., 25c. and 10c. pieces, issued in 1892.

Rev. D. O. Mears exchanged pulpits with Rev. Archibald McCullagh last Sunday morning and the South End people listened to very pleasing discourse.

LEICESTER.

Mr. Fairbanks, a student from Andover, preached in the Congregational church Sunday.

Rev. J. R. Pendell, of Genesee, N. Y., preached at the Methodist Church. The people hope to secure him to serve them until conference in April.

Tuesday, the members of the Methodist church served a turkey dinner and supper and in the evening an entertainment was provided by friends from Laurel Street Church, Worcester. The program consisted of songs readings and solos on the zither and violin.

The Christian Endeavor Society held a social Thursday evening at the home of Miss Lelia Jordan.

Wedding Bells.

At the Church of the Sacred Heart, by the Rev. Thos. J. Conaty, Wednesday, Patrick C. Comerford was married to Miss Minnie J. Dowd. The groom is of the firm of Comerford Burns and the bride has been employed for some time in Westby's Book Bindery. She is also the third recent departure from that place for the marriage altar.

A BILLION AND A HALF.

The above is estimated to be the amount due to heirs of enclined estates in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France and Germany. The heirs are supposed to be chiefly in the United States, descendants of people who crossed the ocean years ago. You who read this are earnestly requested to correspond with the undersigned, if your people came from across the sea. Remember that a letter to this country requires a five cent stamp. Be sure to write your name and address plainly. Also send 25 cents to pay for postage and correspondence. Good to Eat.

To make candy from honey, boil one cupful of honey, one cupful of sugar, one-fourth cupful of water and a large teaspoonful of butter. Test in water and pull while cooling.

Fried Apple Sauce

is easy to prepare, and perfectly delicious. Put a bit of butter in the saucepan, and let it brown without burning. Wash the apples and slice them without paring. Put them into the heated butter, and sprinkle on them a pinch of salt, also a tablespoonful of sugar. The latter, however, is to be added according to taste. Add half a cup of water, and cover closely. When the apples are tender, stir them gently about until they are well mixed, and serve hot. This makes one of the most convenient and easily prepared dishes for luncheon, and is relished by almost every one—many, indeed, preferring it to the ordinary popular apple sauce.

Date Pudding.

One cup of sour milk, one cup of sugar or molasses, one spoonful of butter, a teaspoonful of soda, spices to suit the taste, and one pound of dates with the stones removed. Stir quite stiff with Graham flour and steam two hours. Serve with cream and sugar. This is excellent.

Date Gems.

One cupful of dates cut fine, two cupfuls of sweet milk, one large spoonful of butter, a spoonful of baking powder, and three cupfuls of flour. A well beaten egg should be beaten in with the flour. Bake in gem pans twenty minutes in a hot oven.

Oyster Patties.

Linc ten patty pans with puff paste. Lay on each enough oysters to cover the bottom, season with butter, salt and pepper, put over this an egg batter and cover with a crust of paste pierced with a fork. Bake in a hot oven till nicely browned. Twenty cents will cover the cost.

Apple Fritters.

Put one cup of flour into a bowl. Beat the yolks of two eggs until light; add a half cup of cold water, a tablespoonful of olive oil, and now add this gradually to the flour; give a vigorous beating. If the batter is too thick, add just a little more water, and stand it away in a cold place for at least two hours; when ready to use add a pinch of salt and the well beaten whites of the eggs. Pare the apples, remove the cores, and cut the apples into rings; if you like they may be dusted with cinnamon. Dip each piece separately in this batter and drop in smoking hot fat; lift carefully, dish, dust with powdered sugar and serve.

Forgot What He Was Crying For.

A little boy sat on the floor, crying. After awhile he stopped and seemed buried in thought. Looking up suddenly, he said: "Mamma, what was I crying about?"
"Because I wouldn't let you go out to play."
"Oh, yes," and he set up another howl.—Birmingham Post.

ARTISTIC DENTISTRY.

The materials used to produce these artistic results are numerous. The market is flooded with good, bad and indifferent. Gold and aluminum plates with rubber attachments are among the best materials for making artistic artificial teeth. They make the most cleanly, durable, comfortable and beautiful sets of teeth. These plates can be fitted to any mouth, however irregular or ill-shaped, better than rubber or celluloid plates; perfect conductors of heat and cold, they thereby prevent inflammation of the mouth. The peculiar and original method of making artificial teeth, on the combination plate, renders it possible to give to the patient the advantage of both gold and aluminum at a price within the reach of all. Thank fortune, we are able to introduce this new method of making teeth, and, in the future, we hope to see more of this work done, instead of the cheap rubber sets, the cheapest and most popular on account of the cheapness. We have bought the right to use the combination plate. We shall be happy to see anyone at our office and to show them samples of this beautiful work at our dental office, a few doors from Main Street. Yours respectfully,

Now-a-days a bargain means some sort of a lic-generally, and very often a transparent one at that.

We add the word "bargain," to the word "cheap," and think them both rather antiquated—representing today much that is tricky in merchandizing.

We don't call this a bargain sale, although some cards may say so.

It isn't a "clearance" sale, although you may see that word also placarded.

It is a good deal more than our regular sale of standard stocks at a good deal better price than usual January low prices.

So it happens that we will sell you Splendid Black Silks at prices that you can believe in and that are really more in your favor than we have ever made before.

So it happens that, although our prices on Linens may not seem as low in print as you may have seen, you come here, as you tell us, because you "are sure that the reductions in prices are true."

So it happens that you come to our really important Hamburg sale absolutely sure of qualities, beauties and prices.

So it happens that you buy in one day so many pairs of our splendid blankets that we think there must be a mistake, and we go over the count again to find it all even as at first said.

So it happens that you are sure to give the same attention to the January sale of Cotton Underwear, just started, because your faith covers every department.

So it happens that if you want anything in an "Outside Garment" you come here for it because you know what you will get and that the price will be really as low as anywhere.

Fashion.

Many women who have a good black dress as a stand-by, not having many occasions for wearing gala gowns, may make a fashionable one by introducing revers and a waistcoat of some color: this is newer than only a waistcoat, and is much smarter.

On golden-haired women black gowns are the eccentric and fetching fancy of the moment. The material is wool, exquisitely fine and thin, or some of the silk crepe stuffs now so much in vogue. If the gown is simply for negligence, the material is black China silk, with turned-down pleatings of the same at the neck, and turned-back frills at the wrists. If the gown is supposed to appear at the afternoon tea, the high Medicis collar, the girdle, and turned-down cuffs which nearly cover the hand, all are solid with gold embroidery, flashing with many colored jewels. The effect of blonde beauty above this gown is striking and exquisite.

Broadcloth and beaver wraps have scattered over their surface large tufts of fur set in rings of passementerie, mink in rings of brown passementerie upon brown cloth, etc.

Dressy hats are often so extremely small as to be little more than the foundation for an upright aigrette, loops or tips at the back and toques or round hats have become almost equally diminished in size. Contrary extremes are reached by wide brimmed varieties and bonnets are well-nigh the only shapes in which moderation appears.

Miss Clara Burton says: "It is a good idea to give women a chance to be heard on topics outside of dress and fashion. It is humiliating to a woman of brains and opinions to arrive in a strange city, and after being interviewed find her dress and manners described at length, while her brain is not even mentioned. How do you suppose Chauncey Depew and men of his caliber would feel to go into a town and find the cut of their trousers, the shade and pattern or design minutely described, with the style of vest, coat and necktie, and the hair on their heads detailed at length, while not a word was said of his reputation as an orator or railroad man? What do you imagine Depew would say? It is just the same with women. It is belittling for women of wide experience to find their garb of more account than their opinions."

Hens in the Procession.

Col. William Olin told the following story at a little dinner party at Parker's the other day:

Two little children who had seen a Memorial day procession decided they would decorate the grave of a favorite pussy that had been buried under a pear tree in the back yard. So they marched toward the spot one behind the other. The first child, who carried a drum, was the band, and the second, with a tiny flag, was the Grand Army.

Before they reached the grave a lot of old hens ran in front of the procession.

"Shoo, shoo," cried the band.

"Don't do that sister," said the second division. "Don't scare them away. They're the Woman's Relief Corps!"—Boston Herald.

About Folks.

Alexander McGregor and family have gone to Huntington, West Virginia, for a six weeks' trip.

Mr. Alfred S. Roe gave his lecture on the "Passion Play," in Rutland, Friday night. He repeats the same next Tuesday night at Lake View. Sunday night he talks on "No License," in Clinton.

Rev. Austin Garver was present at the Brooks Herford Banquet, Tuesday, in Boston.

John Gilman has returned from a long trip to the West.

Off for California are J. F. Bicknell, wife and son, Asa Ross and wife, F. H. Pelton and wife, and Edwin Ames and wife. They left Thursday.

Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Fay, Miss Litta Fay, Miss Flora Fay, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Carpenter left Wednesday evening for California for the Winter.

Dr. and Mrs. George E. Francis, Miss Francis and Miss Fannie Clarke will sail from New York, Jan. 23, for a tour of several months in Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. George D. Webb left Thursday for a pleasure trip to California.

Mr. H. D. Magee of the business department of the Telegram, has been very ill during the past week with the most virulent type of la grippe. His wife and little boy are also battling with severe colds.

The small boy and the deadly cigarette are becoming intimate and lasting friends according to observation and current report. Parents cannot be too careful in watching their children. It does not seem possible that dealers in cigarettes would sell their wares to boys six and seven years old, but nevertheless it is a fact, else where do they obtain them. Shattered constitutions, defective eyesight and aimless lives will be the unhappy lot of those children who contract this pernicious habit in early years.

At the annual meeting of the Sons and Daughters of New Hampshire, held Tuesday evening, officers were elected as follows:—President, Dr. J. P. Rand; vice-presidents, Daniel Seagrave, John F. Marden, Mrs. George R. Leland; secretary, W. H. Andrews; treasurer, L. A. Ely; executive committee, H. C. Shepard, George N. Newhall, Mrs. J. F. Marden, Mrs. E. N. Goddard, Mrs. R. A. Abbott. It was decided that the annual reunion shall be held in Horticultural Hall, February 11 and committees were chosen to make the necessary arrangements.

The Home School.

Monday night, at this school, its fifth anniversary was observed in the presence of the pupils, teachers, patrons and friends who crowded the rooms to reception.

The exercises were held in the school room and they were opened by prayer by the Rev. W. G. Tuttle, himself a teacher of fifty years ago. Following, Miss E. A. Kimball, the Principal read the following history:

Five years ago tonight the evening was not unlike this. I remember it well. On that evening I made my way from the hospitable house of a warm hearted friend where I had been passing a few days, to untried scenes and untried work. It is one thing to teach in a school. It is quite another thing to make a school.

Varied were the thoughts that evening as I made my little pedestrian trip to Hammond Street. Numerous were the questions which arose. What would the morrow bring? Had I proceeded with wisdom? Would pupils come, even though they were expected?

But morning came, and with it came to that room a little group of young misses, gathering about me for instruction. I had little, if any, thought what the future might bring to us as a little company of students but, as it has proven, here was the nucleus of what we now call the Home School.

Nine girls were present on the morning of Jan. 10, 1887. It gives me pleasure to see some of their faces here tonight. They remember well that first morning, and trace the story of the school along with me. Later, three more were added to the number, so the school now seemed quite large, and we closed that fraction of our first school year with twelve pupils.

As viewed by the world outside, we passed an uneventful year. Few, a very few, knew of our existence as a school. Indeed we hardly gave ourselves that name. I hardly knew what we were. But perhaps few here have passed a year more full of thoughts and plans and interrogation points. But, the year went on, the questions were met and answered, one by one. But the great one remained "Should I go on with my school?" "Should I attempt to make it permanent?"

There on Hammond Street I was located only temporarily. If I continued I must secure a house where I could enlarge my school and make it a home. So I began to look about and to ask advice. I did not feel inclined to talk of the matter generally, but I did talk with some. From many, I received these encouraging words, "I don't know. Miss Kimball," "It's a great undertaking." I wonder how many times this was said to me? I hope I shall never be guilty of repeating these words to any one, looking hopefully toward a great work. "Everything follows the man or woman who goes ahead."

But, notwithstanding discouragements, I stepped forth. That summer I took the house at 58 Woodland Street, and proceeded to furnish it, and in all ways make ready to open a girl's boarding school. Here again, I received advice. In talking with one gentleman about school furniture, what quality I had better buy, etc., he advised me to buy pretty good chamber sets, as they would sell better at auction than poorer goods. I read his mind, although he did not intend I should.

That first Summer as I sat in the window that opens so near to Oberlin Street it was often easy to hear the conversation of passers-by. These were some of the stimulating remarks I heard. "They say a woman has taken this house, the whole of it. Think she can have a school of girls. Never can heat it, in the first place." "Cold as a barn."

Another, "Who wants to send girls to a private school here in Worcester?"

Another, "Going to manage the whole thing herself."

Another, "Women, on the whole, can't run business."

During the Summer an old friend from Kansas City called. A brisk, prominent lawyer, there. He looked about, eyes most of the time upon the ceiling, and, having apparently, "taken in" the situation, ventured the timely inquiry, "Did you ever hear of a school conducted in this way?" I replied modestly that I had. "Well, in my opinion you can't do it." But I did "do it." For three years we enjoyed a pleasant little school, over in the old house, for which I shall always cherish a fondness. It was the scene of the experiences of the first years of the school, and, as in any work they were years full of interest and earnest work. Although the anxious times came, yet success attended the school from its start.

But soon we began to be aware that we must fly from the little nest. We had barely room to eat, to sleep, to study, and certainly not to recite. However, it was not so easy to find a suitable home for ourselves. While our desires were moderate, they could be satisfied easily; but now we must have a somewhat spacious house. Finally, this place was found, admirably adapted to our needs. One year ago last Summer we came here, and this house, with the annex added last Summer, furnishes us a delightful school home. While the school is constantly increasing in members and, we trust, in usefulness.

Such is the little sketch of our brief life. Time will fail us to tell of the many experiences these years have brought to us. The thought and planning and study. The working and waiting and patience, the joys and the sorrows, all have been wrought in to help to complete the fabric we have been weaving.

In a sense these scraps of warning advice given above were judiciously given, I took them always, I trust, for what they were worth. Those who gave them did so from honest hearts. When we were well fitted here with a house full of girls, one gentleman of most excellent judgment said to me one evening, "Well, Miss Kimball, I congratulate you, I thought you had made a mistake this time. I did not think you could carry this." His thought was a wise one. Standing here as I do now, could I have been given the vision to see what such a work would cost me in days and nights of labor, in anxiety for girls entrusted to my care, the task of performing aright the varied and manifold duties of such a position, the responsibility it brings, I would never have dared undertake it. But how wisely we are shown only a glimpse of what is before us! I have stepped along, oftentimes with faltering step; but something has seemed to say to me "Step on, my child. You cannot see now, but you will see." Then there has come to me so often, and almost constantly this refrain: "He shall give his angels charge over thee." It has come to be a part of my life song. How can I go wrong, with such a host about me?

But other things deserve emphatic mention here. These words of discouragement so candidly given, and to which allusion has been made, had their weight. But they were out-balanced a thousand times, by words coming from practical men and women who actually bore me on in my plans. I never could have gone on without them. There are those here tonight, and many others who could not be reached nor hardly counted, who have helped me by their wise counsel, their words of commendation of the school, and their readiness to aid me in every possible way. Those first patrons of the school, some of whom I see before me, were tireless in their kindness to me. Good patrons, good neighbors, good friends have arisen about our steps, until now we feel that our school home is surrounded by an army of those who are ready to further our work, and in every possible way to help our good cause along.

Five years from tonight we hope to see you all here to celebrate the decennial of the school. We expect at that time to report, not so wonderful an increase in numbers, but we hope to report favorably along other lines. We want to show an advance in methods of study. We want to teach girls to study in a way which will give them the greatest possible mental development, with the least possible nervous pull and strain.

We want the school to be managed with more and more tact and skill and quiet.

We want it to bear more and more the atmosphere of home within its walls.

We want ever more and more confidence between teacher and pupils, and the repose which that confidence brings. We want to lead girls out into a broader and more useful womanhood. For these ends we shall labor and plant and watch, and we feel sure that God will give the increase.

The principal received a beautiful bouquet of roses from the young ladies of the school. In addition to her own instruction, Miss Kimball is ably aided by Misses Newcomb, Patten, Tregreilis, Habermyer and Laughton.

The Rev. Dr. Mears in his remarks evinced a hearty interest in the welfare of the school. He said the history of the school which had been read, was not new to him. He had watched its progress carefully, and was pleased with the success it had attained. He paid a high compliment to the school, pronouncing it a power for good in the city. Significant facts were given in regard to the founding of Mt. Holyoke Seminary and college, coming as it did from the earnestness and devotion of Mary Lyon. Then Wellesley following the same general plan, and lastly Smith College, all starting from schools like the Home School.

He then spoke in terms of praise of the appropriateness of the anniversary exercises in that they were of a character to be helpful to students, rather than merely pleasurable.

His words of advice and encouragement to the young ladies were such as to lead them to more earnest work. No complaints that the work of the school was hard would lead him to feel a less, but a greater confidence in the school. We succeed by succeeding, we grow by growing, we attain by attaining. Lowering the standard of scholarship is the first stab to any school. He urged upon the young ladies that no one had a right to do, in any case, what she would not be willing all should do. Each one must act as she would wish the school as a whole to act. He closed by warm congratulations to Miss Kimball upon the success of the school for the past five years.

Dr. Almon Gunnison of the First Universalist Church followed Dr. Mears in warm words of praise, saying that he had heard of the Home School, even before coming to Worcester, while yet a resident of Brooklyn, showing that its fame is, by no means local. His words of praise and congratulations must have been very pleasing to all friends of the school.

Principal Joseph Jackson of the Woodland Street School also spoke in a congratulatory manner. Though in public school work, himself, he could yet see a place for the private institution and they should labor in harmony side by side. Mr. Jackson's presence and words fittingly evidenced the relations existing between the Home School and the nearest public school. Miss Kimball has every reason to be happy over the work done in her five years of Worcester teaching.

Hon. W. W. Rice presided at the Bowdoin College Alumni meeting in Boston, Wednesday night.

In Society.

Mr. Frank Roe Batchelder, formerly connected with this paper and now the private secretary of Hon. Joseph H. Walker, is announced as engaged to Mabel C. Streeter.

Dr. George D. Kelley, son of the late Mayor Frank H. Kelley is announced as engaged to Miss Manning of Boston, a daughter of the late pastor of the Old South Church in that city.

The second of the Light Infantry's series of socials was held at the Armory last week Friday evening and was more largely attended and more enjoyable than the first. The dancing took place on the floor of the big drill shed and lasted until midnight. The officers' and company's quarters of Battery B, loaned to the Infantry by the battery for the evening, were used for ladies' and gentlemen's rooms and were handsomely decorated with flowers and potted plants. Lieut. P. L. Rider was floor manager, Captain Harry B. Fairbanks was chairman of the reception committee. Bicknell's orchestra furnished the music and Rebboli the collation. The last of the series will take place Friday evening, February 19.

The first of the subscription assemblies was held last week Friday evening in Colonial Hall. The attendance was as large as the hall could comfortably accommodate and the beautiful and elaborate dresses of the ladies and the abundance of floral decoration made a brilliant scene. The patronesses of the evening were Mrs. Francis H. Dewey, Mrs. Hallock Bartlett, Mrs. Frank K. Macullar, Mrs. Waldo Lincoln and Mrs. J. Fred Mason and the ushers Dr. George D. D. Moore, Col. Rockwood Hoar, Charles M. Thayer, William B. Scofield, George F. Dewey and Charles Ranlet. Dancing began at nine o'clock and lasted until one, with an intermission at eleven, when Rebboli served a collation of oysters, salads, ices, etc. The orchestra consisted of four pieces from the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by J. J. Heron at the piano. The second of the assemblies will take place February 5.

Col. Aaron S. Taft and several officers and members of the Continentals will attend the reception and ball of the Old Guard in New York next Thursday evening.

The Lakeside Boat Club elected officers Monday evening as follows: President Lawrence G. Bigelow; vice-president, Wilbur W. Hobbs; secretary, William E. Fairbanks; treasurer, D. W. Carter; executive committee, the officers, ex-officio, Harry B. Fairbanks and John H. Sykes; captain, Albert H. Lange; 1st lieutenant, Charles E. Putnam.

The club is holding a handicap pool tournament and a whist tournament will be begun next week. The club's Winter social will be held in Continental Hall, next Thursday evening, and unless it is an exception to the rule, it will be one of the most enjoyable of the season.

The first of the City Guards' series of socials will be held in the Armory next Friday evening.

Making Cake.

To make a good cake one must have good recipes: They must be closely followed, and other conditions favorable or that good "luck" will not appear. In the first place have everything you will need at hand. Clear the kitchen table and place every ingredient thereon. In warm weather let the eggs stand a few minutes in cold water; they will froth easier and finer. Always use fresh eggs in making cake, as no amount of beating will make a stiff froth if old.

Some cooks recommend greasing pans with fresh lard, preferring it to butter. Several thicknesses of paper should be placed in the bottom, the last thoroughly greased. In making cake, good butter should always be used, as heat develops bad qualities. In using milk, it is well to remember that sour milk makes a light, spongy cake: sweet milk, one that cuts like pound cake.

There is also some "knack" in beating cake, the true science of which is, don't stir, but beat thoroughly, bringing up from the bottom every time. The beating should be in the same direction and always from the bottom upward.

Attention should be given the oven, as too much heat or too little will ruin the cake, how ever much pains have been taking. Do not open the oven door too often, as steady heat, if not too hot, is best. Keep steady heat. If draft is checked, more regular heat is had; fuel must be added in small quantities, for if the fire grows slack the cake will be heavy or streaked. A "slow" oven is good to begin baking fruit cakes.—Housekeeper.

For severe cold on the lungs, use the following excellent remedy: A teaspoonful of strained honey, one-half teaspoonful of olive oil and the juice of one lemon, cook all together and take one teaspoonful every two hours.

For slight cuts take a piece of common brown paper wrapping-paper like that which butchers use for meat, and bind it on over the wound.

Clover tea is admirable for purifying the blood, for removing pimples and whitening the complexion, and has also good repute as a sleep inducing draught.

For cracking ice on the table are silver mallets and picks capable of giving a smart blow.

For dish rags buy white mosquito netting—a quarter of a yard is sufficient for one—which should be folded back and forth as many times as the width will allow and tuck as comfort. Some make them of a ball of candle-wick, knit on two wooden needles the size of lead pencil. Set up 20 stitches. Knit in plain garter knitting until the ball is used up. These are easily kept clean if washed in hot soapsuds after each meal; also wash the dish towels at the same time. A half-dozen are quite sufficient.

Success makes a fool seem wise.

Housecleaning and Poetry.

BY CORNELIA WELSON ROYDEN.

Oh! gentle Muse forsake me not,
Because, forsooth, it is my lot,
To wield the broom, the dust-pan too,
And many household duties do.

But while with dust-cap on my brow,
As wildly through the dirt I plough,
My thoughts shall weave fanciful say,
And glorious visions round me play.

And dreams of fame, and wealth, and power,
Their golden blessings on me shower,
Till every humble task is wrought,
And woven in with pleasant thought.

For though I've often heard folks tell,
Two things at once you can't do well.
In this I'm sure it is not true.
I'll make my verses, houseclean too.

But hark! the doorbell, I declare,
And here's my mop-pail on the stair,
I can't see callers in this plight,
Of stairs, I ne'er saw longer flight.

I'm sure I've worked hard all the day,
Yet scarce have made the least headway;
The dirt seems worse, the day's most gone,
I've swept and scrubbed from early morn.

Alas! fair Muse we beth must yield,
And give the mop and broom the field;
For while among the clouds I dwell,
I fear I cannot clean house well.

An Eye to Business.

Distracting Customer—Well, Shears, what did you think of the bishop's sermon on Sunday? I saw you in church.
Barber—Yes, sir, but to tell the truth there was a man sat in front of me whose hair wanted cutting so badly that I couldn't hear a word.—The Jester.

Mme. Giraldy Delsarte.

She is a tall, dark woman, rather slim, and of a thoroughly French cast of features. She appears to be about thirty-five years old. She wore a plain gown of black silk when she arrived, with a long cloak of the same color, trimmed with fur. Her hair, which is very abundant, is dark brown. Her face is remarkable as a study. In general outline and appearance it bears a marked resemblance to Sarah Bernhardt's. The eyes are dark brown, the lips thin, and the nose decidedly aquiline. The sympathy and range of expression that it possesses display themselves instantly on even casual observation. But there is no trace of consciousness or artificial cultivation in a single movement the face makes. It simply strikes one as being extremely sensitive and expressive. The same characteristics belong to her voice, which is low and sweet, and exquisitely modulated.—Boston Sunday Times.

Important Business.

"Oh, papa," she said with a blush, "young Mr. Chestnut, who owns so many coal mines in Pennsylvania, is coming again this evening, and says he wants to see you on some important business."
"All right, my dear," responded the old man, chuckling her playfully under the chin. "I guess I know what the young man wants."
That evening Mr. Chestnut came to the point at once.
"Mr. Hendricks," he said, boldly, "I want to ask you if you have laid in your Winter's stock of coal."

CROUPY SOUNDS

At night, from baby's crib, are distracting to parents who are at a loss for a medicine equal to the emergency. Not so with those who have Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in the house. A dose of this medicine affords certain and speedy relief. To cure colds, coughs, sore throat, asthma, bronchitis, hoarseness, and the various disorders of the breathing apparatus, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has no equal. It soothes the inflamed tissue, expectorates, and induces repose. T. P. Carley, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my family for thirty years and have always found it the best remedy for croup, to which complaint my children were subject."
"I use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral in my practice, and pronounce it to be unequalled as a remedy for colds and coughs."—J. G. Gordon, M. D., Carroll Co., Virginia.

PUTNAM & SPRAGUE CO.

During the dull season we will sell Furniture at reduced prices. We have no unsalable goods; but a clean stock, rather large for the beginning of the year.

We must make room for goods in process of manufacture, and will make it an object for all buyers to make their purchases at our store.

We have everything desirable in stock from Common to Fine Furniture.

PUTNAM & SPRAGUE CO.

247 and 249 Main Street, corner of Central.

BARNARD, SUMNER & Co.

Skirts—thanks to the reduction—begin at 50c with cambric ruffles, Hamburg edge topped with triple tucks.

75c brings out a skirt with Hamburg ruffle and cluster tucks.

If you say $1.00, then a beauty appears. Bear in mind that all these skirts are full length and full width and that the material and making are perfect.

Night Gowns with tucked yokes you'll decide are the best ever offered at 50c.

62 1-2, and you have one with pleated back. 75c and $1.00 will produce night gowns so pretty that you'll be surprised.

Drawers, plain, 3 tucks, well made and good cotton, 25c.

You can add trimming to please you and make them pretty as you wish.

37c, and you have Hamburg ruffle added. 42c, and you have cluster tucks and cambric ruffle.

50c and 75c get you what cost last month a great deal more.

Take it altogether, you will be ever so much pleased with the pretty Cotton Underwear at our double January prices.

You are sure to look them all over, and then it will still be pleasant to hear you say again: "Here, just as I expected, and just as you said."

Perhaps you had better make up your mind to buy a new carpet after all.

The one in the parlor, sitting room or chamber is looking a little away from its best.

It's a good time now—
Moquettes—Smith's—for $1.12 1-2 a yard, with borders to match.

And then:—
There's the greatest Carpet bargain of the year:—

All Wool Extra Super Ingrain Carpets.
Only fifty-five cents a yard.

LIGHT

Vol. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1892.

No. 21

Ofit like a sudden pencil of rich light,
Piercing the thickest umbrage of the wood
Will shoot, amidst, our troubles infinite,
The Spirit's voice.
—Thomas Burridge.

The election of a superintendent of street lights might seem to be a subject coming properly in this column.

Anything savoring of light arouses a response immediately, but doesn't it seem a little queer that out of all the candidates (K)night should have been selected to look after light.

The amusing situations into which Shott and Knott fell, as set forth by James Russell Lowell, are at once suggested. If the light is not up to the mark it will be the fault of (K)night and when was it otherwise, but what a queer condition when the light is first class and all through the care of (K)night?

The reign of wonders never ends,
But over day and night extends,
Till now we smile at getting light
By favor of its obverse, (K)night.

It is a long time yet to street sprinkling, but the act of the Council in reporting adversely on the proposition to have the city take the matter in hand will discourage many people. There is no good reason why the city should not supervise the watering of the streets just as much as the keeping of them in repair.

The proposition for a new city hall seems to be resting at present. Perhaps it will break out again with new violence at some unexpected moment. So long as there has been room for a shoe store under one half of the present structure, in other words, so long as the city hall has had room to rent it would not appear that there was any crying need of new and larger quarters. The old hall, paid for, is a deal better than a big, new one with a mortgage on it.

The notion of Senator Manderson of Nebraska to have the bodies of all deceased Presidents of the United States removed to Washington is an absurd one. There are some Americans who can never get over the idea that this country should have a Westminster Abbey. They entirely forget that our nation is made up of a multitude of states, many of them much larger than all of Britain, and the idea that our noted dead must be buried in one great mausoleum may please Anglo-maniacs, but not the public at large.

Our people in their respective states are proud of their local interests. Can any one imagine Tennessee giving up her Jackson's remains, or Virginia those of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe and Tyler, to say nothing of those of Washington. Fancy, if possible, a disinterment of the bodies of Van Buren, Fillmore and Arthur and their removal from the Empire State. All over this broad land are halloved inclosures, objects of veneration to the dwellers near and places visited by pilgrims, where sleep the dead once known to fame. Let them sleep where loving hands have placed them.

All this ado is over the fact that General Grant's body is in Riverside Park in New York. Both the General, himself, and his family have expressed themselves as favorable to that burial place. Why then disturb him? Who will be benefited? The distribution of remains of our great Rebellion Generals seems particularly happy. New York, Washington and St. Louis hold, Grant, Sheridan and Sherman or, at least, all that is mortal of them. There they should continue to rest and had Thomas been buried where he died on the Pacific coast, there would be nothing lacking to the propriety of their burial; new bonds to hold our great country together. Senator Manderson's proposition should not be encouraged.

BOSTON, Jan. 19.—Two young children of Arthur Hiserot of Roxbury secured a flask of whiskey from a closet, early Sunday morning, before their parents were up, and drank freely of its contents. When the mother arose she found her two children in a beastly state of intoxication. Every means was tried to resuscitate the children, but to no avail. One died Sunday forenoon and the other passed away in the evening. They were buried today.

Is not this a case where, if not the long named society, at least that which cares for children should act? Of course, life cannot be restored; but how long will people continue to consider alcohol, in its various guises, as anything else than rank poison. The feelings of these parents, in coming years, cannot be envied.

"A correspondent writes as follows:

What is your bias concerning clubs? Not the former, twenty years ago glittering sample room, whose various aspects of club sin have been depicted,—the prickly burr of domestic discontent, but the modern elegancies of life, where the "Chappie" may "cultivate not only the cornfields of the mind, but the pleasure-grounds also." I am writing "Selveges," and I lean towards less active ignorance, since the question has shifted and women may use their common sense and regulate "Sorosis," she feels and acts less an ultraist. I would not favor my family men going every night and all night to the club, but if other women's men cannot be happy at home, I would elevate their resorts to proper places where they could "invite their soul"—then advise making home a superior, attractive spot, stimulate the revival of the reclaimed, spin a web of unafected patience around about—and, therewith, I pause.

Perhaps no further word is necessary, but LIGHT has ever acted on the principle that "There is no place like home." It should rule in preference to any club or society. If men properly appreciate home they will have little need of clubs of any sort.

Keep Books.

The advice which Daniel Webster gave to a neighbor of his, in the following anecdote, might be followed with advantage by many people. Indeed, the reader will be likely to think that it might have been followed to very good advantage by Mr. Webster himself.

On one occasion a man presented to Mr. Webster a bill for payment.

"Why, Mr. N—," said the statesman, "it seems to me that I have paid that bill."

Mr. N— protested that it had not been paid, and Mr. Webster told him to call in a few days and he would attend to the matter. After the man had gone Mr. Webster asked his clerk to look over a quantity of bills and see if he could find a receipt for the amount. To his surprise two receipts were found, indicating that the bill had been paid twice.

In due time Mr. N— called, just at the dinner hour, as it chanced, and Mr. Webster invited him in to dine. After the meal was over they proceeded to the business in hand.

"Mr. N—, do you keep books?" Mr. Webster inquired.

"No," was the reply.
"I thought so," said Mr. Webster. "Now I advise you to keep books. If you had kept books you would have known that I had this receipted bill,"—showing him one.
Mr. N— was greatly surprised and mortified and apologized as best he could for his mistake.

"Yes, it is always a good plan to keep books," continued Mr. Webster, showing him a second receipt.

Then, knowing Mr. N— to be an honest man, and not wishing to annoy him, he suggested that perhaps receipted bills had been presented, but really left unpaid, and insisted that Mr. N— should take the money.—
Youth's Companion.

The Pretty Girl.

The pretty girl knows she is pretty, and because she knows it she is kindness personified to plain girls, for she knows her charms will never suffer from comparison with theirs, says a writer in Texas Siftings. All plain girls detest all pretty girls, and will never say a good word for them if they can help it, and when they ever do it is the "faint praise that damns." The pretty girl has the most beaux, goes to the most balls and idiotic society gatherings, and is the last girl to get married. She thinks because she is handsome she is entitled to a better grade of husband than falls to the lot of most women, and she defers making a choice until some fine morning she wakes up with a realization that her feet are slipping from the green shores of girlhood into the murky sea of old maidenhood, and then she goeth out and hustles for a husband, just as her plainer sisters do; and this is why so many handsome women marry so many ugly men. Pretty girls are never very true lovers or very good wives, but they are among the most desirable of the few good things the angry gods left upon the earth when they went in wrath to their abode upon Mt. Olympus.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, JAN. 23, 1892.

Wesby, the bookbinder, has put out an elegant advertisement in the shape of what he calls an every day book. Running through it are notices of the work that Wesby does so well and the blank pages are for memoranda. It is neatly bound and just fits the side pocket.

Humanity and Health is a new claimant for public favor. It is devoted to the "physical, moral, mental and spiritual health of mankind." A monthly published in New York, 18 Clinton Place, by E. A. Jennings, M. D. There, certainly, is a field for such a periodical and this is filled with valuable material bearing on the well being of humanity.

"Baby." Isn't that a queer title for a paper? The word is common enough in well conducted homes but for a paper, it is something new. The paper, itself, is diminutive in form as it ought to be and has as an illustration the face of America's most famous infant, "Baby McKee" unless it be "Kath" Cleveland, but as she is only an heiress possible, her picture will naturally follow that of the one really in power. By the way, this picture reminds LIGHT of a quatrain, that was quite popular two years ago. It ran thus:

"Johnny Wanny runs the Post Office,
And Morton runs the bar,
Baby McKee runs the White House
And— it, there you are."

But the new Baby is a journal for mothers and it will be strange if mothers don't appreciate it. It is published fortnightly, at 907 Broadway, New York, at $1 a year. It is filled with interesting and practical matter pertaining to the good of the bald headed ruler who is the generally obeyed despot in every household. Long life and success to Baby!

In Society.

The next of the series of house cottillions will be held at Mariemonte, the residence of Mrs. George Crompton, next Friday evening, January 29.

Miss Grace Whiting, daughter of Mrs. C. B. Whiting, was married at Emanuel Church on Thursday afternoon to Mr. George Francis Meyers of Pittsburg. Mr. Benjamin T. Hill was best man—Boston paper.

Miss Whiting was formerly a resident of Worcester, a graduate of the High School, Class of 1878 and a member of All Saints Church. Mr. Meyers is a graduate of the Polytechnic Institute, class of '88 and of the Cornell University School of Mines, class of '90, and is now associated with George M. Irwin as electrical engineers and contractors in Pittsburg.

The engagement is announced of Mr. Harry V. Davis, W. P. L. '89, and Miss Agnes, daughter of Mr. R. C. Taylor.

The engagement is announced of Herbert A. Warren of the class of '91, Worcester Polytechnic Institute, and Miss Maud S. Bosworth, a teacher at Dix Street School.

Cards had been issued for the marriage of Mr. Thomas Howard and Miss Rose Post of New York. They have a novel wording, to the effect that Miss Post's wedding "with," instead of "to" Mr. Howard, will be celebrated; but it is correct.

E. S. Nash of Boston spent last Sunday with Worcester friends.

The newly-elected young man now expects an engagement ring as well as his fiancée. Sapphires set low in plain gold bands are favorites with men.

The engagement of Miss Lillie M. Nichols of Rutland, a graduate of the Worcester High School, '89, and Geo. M. Glazier, Jr., of Cambridge is announced.

As an outgrowth of the social ties formed by those taking part in the game of Living Whist, an organization has been formed among the young people of the Church of the Unity for the purpose of holding a series of social assemblies. A committee was appointed consisting of Mr. E. D. Stoddard, Mr. Charles M. Thayer, Mr. J. H. Jewett, Col. T. S. Johnson and Mr. C. A. Waite, to arrange for the socials, the first of which will be held next week Wednesday or Thursday evening in Salisbury Hall. The officers of the Ladies' Charitable Society of the Church of the Unity, Mrs. O. F. Rawson, Mrs. W. A. Williams, Mrs. J. H. Jewett, Mrs. C. S. Wood, Mrs. F. C. Thayer and Miss Linnie Allen will be the patronesses for that evening.

The Lakeside Boat Club's annual Winter Social was held in Continental Hall, Thursday evening. There were about forty couples present. George W. Eddy was the floor manager and his aids were Charles E. Putnam, Harry B. Fairbanks, S. Frank Gates and Wm. E. Fairbanks. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Linus Sibley, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Weixler, Miss Mollie Taft, Miss Anna Milliken, Miss Anna Howe, Miss Allen of Milne, Miss Minnie Fish, Miss Marie Fay, Miss Maud Knowlton, Miss Upton, Miss Brooks, Miss Carrie Goodwin, Miss Sibley, Miss Nellie Fairbanks, Miss Gertrude Whiting, Miss Edith Hagan, Miss Edith Curtis, Miss Cora Goodwin, Misses Whitney, J. Declamation Contest.

Worcester never heard a better nor more evenly contested trial of declamatory skill than that which took place in Horticultural Hall, Thursday evening, under the direction of Messrs. W. E. Bowen and R. B. Simmonds. There were eleven contestants and, from first to last, there was not a slip in memory; scarcely one gesture or expression. There were few hackneyed selections; but newness abounded. Judges never had a harder task in deciding than did the gentlemen who undertook to appportion the $25, given to the winners. It would be a pleasure to mention in detail the names and to describe the efforts of every speaker but want of space prevents, suffice it to say that there was not a speaker who did not evidence most careful study and preparation and if their teachers were in the audience, they had every reason for pleasure at their pupils' success. The declaimers and their selections were as follows: Emma Hewitt, "Genevra;" Bessie M. Lawrence, "The Pilot's Story;" Lou M. Isaacs, "Lasca;" Ella Johnson, "Gone With a Handsome Man;" Althea Bigelow, "The Gypsy Flower Girl;" Anna F. Carberry, "The Ride of Collins' Graves;" Harry Hosley, "The First and Last Race;" J. J. Shea, "Swore Off;" Mabelle Jenkins, "Romeo and Juliet;" John W. Heffern, "The Uncle;" Amy Buck, "Little Crystal." The latter is a very little girl and though she did finely was hardly in the same category with the older contestants. The prizes were awarded in the following order 1st, $10, to J. W. Heffern; two seconds, $5, each to Misses Emma Hewitt and Anna F. Carberry; and two thirds, $2.50 each to Misses Althea Bigelow and Lou F. Isaacs. The judges were Alfred S. Roe, Eben Francis Thompson and Francis P. McKeon.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Jan. 23, 1892.

Signed

i.

"Hast thou a charm to stay the morning star
In his steep course?"

BAPTIST.

FIRST BAPTIST.—At the annual parish meeting held last week, E. C. Gilman was elected clerk; Gilbert G. Davis, treasurer; Geo. C. Whitney, Wm. Knowles and Dr. Ray W. Greene, assessors; P. B. Towne, R. F. Upham and C. G. Stowell, music committee; James Jenkins and Wm. H. Cook, auditors. The report of the treasurer showed the parish to be in good condition financially, there being a balance of $40 in the treasury after all bills had been paid.

Y. P. S. C. E.

At the meeting of the executive board of the Local Union, held Monday evening in the Young Men's Christian Association parlor, the Paxton Society was admitted to membership and the following resolutions, drawn up by a committee consisting of J. H. Child, D. B. Tucker and Mrs. R. W. Robinson, were adopted:

Whereas, It has seemed wise to some of the Societies of our Local Union to form a Junior Branch Society, in order that the work among the younger members of our Societies and Sunday Schools may be carried on more successfully and

Whereas, It has been thought best for the further forwarding of this most important work that a Local Union of Juniors Branch Societies be formed—

Resolved—1st, That we the Senior Local Union of Y. P. S. C. E. extend to the Junior Union the assurance of our sincere interest in their welfare.

2d, That we assure them of our readiness to give them any assistance in our power.

3d, That the Secretary be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to the Junior Union and to enter them on the record book of this Local Union.

A plan was adopted of having a distinguishing color for each of the committees so that, at the meetings, the members might recognize those in other societies doing the same kind of committee work, and Mr. Irving Bigelow, Miss Carrie L. Thompson were appointed a committee to choose the colors, and they selected as follows: Prayer meeting, lavender; lookout, peacock blue; temperance, white; social, red; visiting and flower, green; Sunday School, yellow; music, pink; missionary, light blue. Also, the amendments to be acted upon at the meeting of the Union the following evening were accepted.

There was to have been held a conference of the lookout committees of the Local Union in Piedmont Church this week, but on account of the illness of the mother of Miss Gates, who had the matter in charge, it was indefinitely postponed.

The January meeting of the Local Union was held in Pilgrim Church Tuesday evening and there was a large attendance in spite of the snow-storm. The program began with singing after which President D. B. Tucker read from the Scriptures, Rev. C. M. Southgate led in prayer, the Pilgrim Ladies Quartet sang a selection and President Walter S. Davis of the Pilgrim Society welcomed the visitors with a brief speech. Then after the count of the members present from the various societies had been taken, Mr. Arthur E. Gray, the Union's delegate to the state convention gave an account of what he had heard there. After singing, Miss Lila Fletcher, superintendent of the Pilgrim Junior Endeavor Society, read a paper on Junior Work. After singing again the announcement of the result of the contest for the banner was made, Pilgrim Society winning, having 78.4 per cent of its members present. Dewey Street Baptist was second with 72.7 per cent; Belmont Society had 54.1 per cent; Church of Christ 51 per cent and the Park Society, which won the banner at the last two meetings, had 47 per cent. Amendments to the constitution were adopted, the substance of which are as follows: Hereafter the meetings of the Union shall be held in January, March, May, September, and November and the annual election of officers shall take place in September; the presidents of the individual societies shall be vice-presidents of the Local Union and members of the executive board for one year from the date of their election and the corresponding secretaries shall be permanent members of the board; the constitution may be amended by the executive board, provided notice has been given in writing at the previous meeting and a majority of those present wrote to so do.

The meeting closed with a consecration meeting of ten minutes, led by Mr. A. A. McLaughlin, in which sixty spoke, among them being a young colored man from Nashville, Tenn., who extended the greetings of the societies in that city.

After the meeting a social was held in the vestry, entertainment being furnished by Miss Lois Thompson and Mrs. Ada Harrington, vocalists and Miss Gertrude Witherby, reader.

METHODIST.

THOMAS STREET SWEDISH—Fourteen joined the church on probation and two by letter last Sunday. The revival work which has been done during the past few weeks has been very successful.

Sons and Daughters of Vermont.

The Sons and Daughters of Vermont held their 19th annual reunion in Horticultural Hall Tuesday evening. Owing to the storm and prevailing epidemic the attendance was not as large as usual, but to those present it was an enjoyable occasion. President Adams had Mayor Harrington and wife, Col. Albert Clark of Boston and Vice-President A. W. Edson upon his right; and Rev. Dr. Gunnison and the various officers of the Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine associations upon his left and on the opposite side of the table.

Grace was said by Dr. Gunnison, after which an hour was devoted to the discussion of the menu provided by C. S. Yeaw, which was very satisfactory.

The speaking in the main hall led by Mayor Harrington, followed by Judge Jilson, Dr. Gunnison and Col. Clark, was full of interesting reminiscences of interest of the early history of the state. Col. Clark gave a sketch of the record of the 8th Vermont at the battle of Cedar Creek. Letters were read by Secretary Pritchard from Governor and Ex-Governor Page and Dillingham and telegrams from associations in Providence; after which a pleasant entertainment was given under the direction of Mr. Harry C. Robinson, with Ben S. Hammond, accompanist, closing with dancing. Osborne's orchestra officiated with C. P. G. Parker with his five aids.

Salmon Putnam.

Almost as old as the Century, for it was in 1800, Dec. 29, that Mr Putnam was born in Sutton, a member of a family, long resident there, but originally coming from Essex County, and thereby connected with that of the famous Israel Putnam of Revolutionary note. He was born and reared on a farm, which is still in the hands of the Putnam family. His father was Cyrus Putnam and his mother Lucinda Hathaway. In early life he was fond of military duty and was a member of the militia, training in the Washington Fusiliers, of which company, in the days of Governor Marcus Morton, he became captain. To his latest day, he retained lively memories of those stirring times. He once marched his company off the field when ordered to camp in an improper place, a course that secured for him and his men better usage. By trade he was a carpenter and worked at this business in Leicester, Worcester and Boston. As a contractor and builder he erected the Leicester bank, the residences of the Messrs. Denny in that town and many other fine buildings. In Worcester, he built Coes' Wrench factory in New Worcester, the Barnard & Sumner block, and the residence of G. L. Newton on Harvard Street, besides many more of the best structures in the city. In fact his friends have said that the work done by him should have made him a millionaire. It was during the Forties that he lived in Worcester. His first wife was Tryphena Bigelow of Spencer, and she was the mother of his children, Otis E. and Samuel H. merchants of this city, Mary L. a teacher in Leicester and Persis Jane widow of Frank L. Coes of New Worcester. Their oldest child, Henry died in childhood, more than sixty years ago, but as long as Mr. Putnam lived any reference to his first born produced a trembling voice and a tearful eye. All the children were born in Leicester.

His first wife died in 1865 and later he married Mrs. Hawes of Leicester and with her moved to a small farm in Holden just north of the Holden reservoir. Here his life has passed quietly, for the last few years, he being able to care for the needs of his home and farm till prostrated by a fall during the Autumn. His thigh bone was broken and since then he has been confined to his bed, though his mind was clear to the end. An object of loving care and tender affection, to his children he has been visited by some one of them nearly every day since his misfortune. He died Thursday at 4 o'clock in the morning. His funeral will be attended at 2 p. m. today. A former member of the Old South, its pastor, the Rev. A. Z. Conrad, will officiate.

Expression by Voice and Manners.

Abstract of Miss Annie Haydn Webster's Lecture.

The true theory of expression is little understood to-day and less practiced. The laws upon which all natural expression is based and which pertain to the development and expression of the soul, the divine within us, are so misunderstood and misapplied to-day that most of the expression (as it presents itself to our eyes and ears by the audible and visible modes of expression,) reminds us but slightly of that spark of the divine within us—the soul.

Why do we hear so little of true naturalness and elegance in the voices of our so-called educated people of this age of culture, may well be demanded, when the modern educational system claims such superiority over the education of the ancient Greeks. If to accumulate masses of knowledge and rich gems of thought for our own selfish benefit be the true motive of education, then we must admit that a setting as narrow and contracted may be consistent for the presentation of such a miserly acquisition of that which was designed to benefit humanity. Such voices and such manners we actually do observe in the every day speech and gesture of those who but slightly comprehend what a broad education means. If, on the other hand, a broad education implies that training of the voice and manner which shall fittingly present the valuable knowledge acquired, then we may well turn and ask why the Expression of Knowledge be so slighted in the educational system. Why must we listen to angular, rough, unmusical voices and unrhythmic motions of the physical agents, when God's laws of educational growth demand harmony of expression? When we see and hear in all the motions of nature about us such wonderful beauty and harmony of expression, why shall we, representatives of the highest type of nature—human nature—deem ourselves exempt from those same harmonious laws as God moves through us as we speak, sing, and use these physical agents?

Who can define or comprehend these marvelous laws by means of which the soul moves outward and touches other souls? Who that has ever given the matter a passing thought can be content to so misapply these laws of soul expression as to ill-dress and ill-present truth? The parent in the home, the professor in the college, the clergyman in the pulpit, all are often perplexed as they are compelled to recognize, again and again, that their words seem to have left no impression upon those whom they were designed to impress, convince and persuade. But if they conscientiously investigate the reasons, they will too frequently find the cause is subjective; they have failed to impress because they have not touched the souls of the hearers; they have failed to recognize that the most potent vehicle of thought transmission is the voice, and that the voice is the very "organ of the soul." They have combined their intellectual-physical forces and thought it possible to persuade thereby; they have failed and will continue to fail in their efforts until they recognize that the human voice—rightly moved through—is the great instructor's direct means of swaying souls. Half the argument, half the labor in teaching might be avoided, if the pure, rich, musical speaking voice were deemed a first requisite in education, as it truly should be.

And what does such training involve? What did the ancient Greeks, whose speaking voices were music itself to the ear, place at the foundation of their educational system? Rhythm; and that is a comprehensive word and pertains equally to voice and manner. Therefore they argued that a well trained voice depends, first, upon a blended condition of the soul emotions, and implies a religious life, that there may be no disconnection between the fountain head and the outlet. Secondly, the cultivated voice depends upon the training of the intellectual and physical agents to express the soul. As a result of this careful training, the threefold nature was harmonized and the voice (which Plato declared would always reveal the soul as acted with or against by the intellectual and physical agents) could not be otherwise than harmonious. Such harmony of expression was in the Greek education considered an absolute necessity, not, as in our modern times, a mere accomplishment. Much of the modern vocal training even, leaves out of consideration the beautiful life within, as though the study of the beautiful, as applied to the soul development, were for Sunday as a special dress.

Now rhythm is the very essence of harmonious motion in the universe, and is not less necessary in voice and manner, but as soon as we begin to grow conscious that we are trying to speak or move by rule, rhythm is absent. It is a subtle soul principle; it permeates all nature, but just so surely as the teacher or student of expression tries to reduce it to mathematical rules or to define it by a logical arrangement of words, it immediately departs for broader spheres. There is the great and difficult problem in expression of modern times, and as a result, unconsciousness of the physical agents, "the art of concealing art," is rarely attained. The physical agents are in the way of the soul, instead of being under its control and at its service.

The intellectual faculties, with all their skillful devices, seem, to thwart the graceful soul motions and emotions, while the general effect is studied, stereotyped, and ungraceful in the extreme. True originality, individuality, and naturalness in voice or manner is rarely observed even among our most distinguished speakers and singers. Our modern artists in this department, which should rank first, reflect conventional rules and soul environments in too many cases, far more than their own souls. They shine by reflected light and frequently present others' soul reflections where we might expect their own. As a result of this contagion in expression, the stereotyped articulation, pronunciation, accent and, I might almost say, quality of vocal expression and gesture, have come to supplant the persuasive force and polished charm which characterized the expression of the ancients. Words lose their force, voice loses its charm and power, manner is graceless, and all because the soul, the divine spark that lights the body, is compelled to shine through all kinds of obstacles, and oftentimes its brightest beams are so hindered that the world is unable to recognize them and be benefited thereby.

The three species of soul radiation observed in visible expression as we observe it in the human face may be compared to the three grades of light emanating from the sun. The average degree of light may be compared to the photosphere, which closely surrounds the solid man. It hugs the surface, and outlines it as we look at the average face. It suggests the physical face as acted upon by the external light, rather than the light from within shining through. Then there is another species of facial radiation that is more suggestive of the chromosphere, and is the result of a greater degree of intelligence and soul development; yet it is not a free radiation, for it is as though the intellectual faculties, more fully developed, were saying to the soul "it is not in accordance with conventional rules to be emotional." "You must not be very different from other souls for if you do, you will render me what the world calls eccentric." And so this species of soul radiation indicates a struggle between soul, intellectual faculties and the physical agents, and as a result the rays are held back. The third type is of a higher and more brilliant nature and seems to reflect a great variety of soul emotions through the intellectual and physical avenues. It corresponds to the beautiful corona, surrounding and emanating from the grand center. This species of facial radiation permits the beautiful soul within to shine out unrestricted.

The training and discipline that develop such soul illumination recognize that psychic law; namely, that the human soul knows no limits of power, and when it is rightly developed in its physical setting it completely possesses and sways the material body. It recognizes the great soul force whence it draws its light and power; it permits unlimited soul force to enter and ignite the individual soul and to pass out and ignite all souls with which it comes in contact. It is, like the beautiful corona of the sun that comes to light our otherwise dull, material world, travelling through millions of miles to meet our demands and to make us acquainted with each other and the wonderful law of light. What a wonderful law is this law of reflected light; and what a beautiful thought it is that all light, through how many soever bodies it has been reflected or from however many surfaces it may have been reflected is still light, and is still harmonious vibration, designed to aid humanity. Ah, there is the true secret of expression, audible or visible. If it is confined to narrow limits like the photosphere and chromosphere, it will never accomplish the greatest good for humanity; but if, like the radiant, far-reaching corona light we permit our souls to ferment and shine through our dust-bodies and illuminate those with whom we daily come in contact, we may truly be worthy students, to use all the power there is, for light is power and power is God and "in him is no darkness."

What then is the first step in the study of expression? Soul development. A harmonious inner life, a blending of the emotions.

Without this as a basis of all vocal and physical training, there can be no harmony of voice or manner; without this inner poise, there can be no outer poise. There must be friction, friction, friction in every tone and motion until the life within us be perfectly in harmony with God and his laws. The coronals—those the Christ face are no imaginary lines. His face was radiant with divine light. It shone through that body that was in perfect harmony with God. That "still small voice," that knew no limits to its power, expanded according to those same laws of radiation. Light and sound are sisters in expression, and must work together. Now this, then, that your power lies in a consecrated life, whether you speak, sing, or move. A thorough soul-technique would render unnecessary ninety per cent of the intellectual technique that that monopolizes the time and thought of the average student of expression, leaving him, after all, a poor cripple, bereft of real thought.

If then, you wish a sweet, gentle musical voice, attend carefully to the harmonizing of your threefold nature, for God never designed that it should secure other than a unit of expression. "Union is strength," and such strength will be yours when you make the conditions. The soul's nature is expansive; remove the debris and shine out audibly and visibly.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Lothrop's Opera House.

The attraction at the Pleasant Street Opera House this week is the well-known "Two Orphans," in which Kate Claxton is at present starring in the western part of the country. Miss Katherine Rober, in the character of Louise, the blind girl, has a part well-fitted to her peculiar talents, and is a pronounced success. Max Freeman, as Pierre Frochard, is seen to excellent advantage. The work of the entire company well merits the generous applause accorded at each performance.

The most severe test a play-house can be subjected to is the bad weather which has of late prevailed extensively throughout the New England states, and which has been detrimental to every line of business, except, perhaps, that of the undertaker, physician and druggist. Especially is this true directly after the holidays. Even with these serious conditions to contend against Lothrop's Opera House has felt no perceptible decrease in the box office receipts. The drama at popular prices is a phenomenal success in this city, and just as long as the management continues to furnish such excellent plays they will surely receive the hearty support of the people.

"The Doll's Hospital," which was to have formed a part of the program of the entertainment, December 7, of the School of English Speech, but which was postponed, will be given next Monday afternoon at four o'clock in Horticultural Hall. Those who have saved their tickets to the first entertainment will be admitted on them Monday. The entertainment is for the benefit of the Memorial Hospital.

Dramatic Notes.

Edwin Booth's physical condition is such as to cause his friends much anxiety, and it is doubtful if he ever makes his appearance again on the stage. He is undoubtedly the greatest and most popular actor of his time. Nothing has ever been said against his professional or private life. It is said that tobacco has been the primary cause in wrecking his health.

Maria Sheldon, the wife of Robert Mantell, the romantic actor, has compelled her husband to pay her $100 per week for separate maintenance, and she also has the custody of their two children. There are many ladies in Mantell's audiences, but it is not generally known that his cranium is as destitute of hair as the smooth surface of a billiard ball. A wig in his case is not only artistic, but very useful.

Scanlan's appearance on the stage was very deceiving, owing to his make-up, which gave him the semblance of an athlete. He is a small man, very nervous in manner, with very dark hair. He always wore a light wig, which set off his laughing face in a becoming manner.

It is reported that J. Gordon Edwards is endeavoring to secure a divorce from his wife, Miss Edith Pollock, who was formerly a member of the Lowell Music Hall Company. Miss Pollock has two sisters in the theatrical profession. Her father was before his death, some years ago, a prominent New York newspaper man.

The management of the Lillian Russell "La Cigale" company in New York, have been forced by Commodore Gerry's society to dispense with the services of young children in connection with the production of the opera. Miss Russell is indignant, but public opinion is against her. Early impressions consequent upon the surroundings of the theater are not on a line with sound and wholesome education. Let the good work go on in the interests of humanity and the stage.

Schurtz on Franklin.

Monday, the 18th, was the 186th birthday of Benjamin Franklin and this is what Carl Schurtz said about him at a New York celebration.

"One may learn from Ben Franklin how to grow up from a very bad boy to a very good man. As a young man, Franklin was capable of embezzling money and of associating with very disgraceful people in shameful intimacy. But Franklin saved himself from any such fate by some very plain and simple methods of self-control." And again: "Franklin did not set out to do great things, but he did set out to do useful things, and by doing a great many useful things he became a very great man. The record of his public service is a delight. He continued an honest politician in spite of the fact that he started as an alderman. He never asked for public office, but he was continued in it because he won public regard by faithful service."

Worcester Academy.

Next Wednesday evening President Small of Colby University will lecture at the Academy on "The Ideals of Higher Education."

Next Week's Poultry Show.

"The hottest show of New England will be in Worcester, under the auspices of the Central Mass. Poultry Club. The organization of the proposed New England Poultry Club will take place during this show. The banquet will be a fine affair, and a good time can be anticipated. Everybody will be welcome."

The above paragraph is taken from one of the leading poultry journals of the country, and is an editorial expression of opinion. In fact, all the poultry journals unite in commending the Central Massachusetts show, and advising all fanciers to exhibit at it.

The Central Mass. Poultry Club held its last exhibition four years ago, but during the past year it has renewed its lease of life and comes to the fore prepared to give the finest show ever seen in the city. January 26, 27 and 28 are the days set for the show. Mechanics Hall is the place and the entries close today.

It is a well known fact that Worcester County is the very centre of the poultry industry. It is said that seven-tenths of the prize winners of the country are raised within twenty-five miles of this city. With such a reputation as this, there is no reason why Worcester should not become famous for its exhibitions, and it is the intention of the managers of the coming affair to lay the foundation of a national reputation.

There are numerous causes that go to ensure success in the exhibition. A meeting of the fanciers of New England will be held for the purpose of perfecting an organization. This is a scheme that interests hen men all over the Eastern States and will draw many well-known men that might not otherwise be present. The Buff Cochins Club will also hold their exhibition in connection with the large one, and probably 150 specimens of that variety will be shown.

There will be many special features that will add greatly to the attractiveness of the show. There will be large exhibits of pigeons, peacocks, pheasants, water birds, rabbits, etc., and on the platform will be a large cage containing either two or four ostriches. These birds came from Ohio where experiments are being made at ostrich farming and $500 was paid to get an exhibit to New York last Winter. There will also be several incubators of large size in operation and an exhibit of poultry supplies. The hall will be scientifically disinfected during the exhibition.

LIGHT is not a poultry paper and this notice was not written for the poultry breeders, for they can get more from papers devoted especially to that subject than LIGHT can give. But it was written for the benefit of the thousands in Worcester who are not in the strict sense poultry fanciers, but who, nevertheless, enjoy seeing the exhibition, and for the purpose of letting these people know that they have never had an opportunity of seeing a finer exhibition.

Truant School.

Superintendent Frank L. Johnson of the Truant School in Oakdale has proclaimed the same to be ready for the reception of lads, properly designated. It is probable, however, that he would not like to have all of the Worcester boys in a lump. One at a time is better.

The Reform Club.

Sixteen full years of doing good. That is the record behind the Reform Club. Before it, the line stretches out interminably for, unfortunately, it seems as though there would always be need of reformation. The cosy quarters, at 570 Main Street, were well filled Monday night by members and friends who came together to review the past and to note the anniversary. It was in the Old South, the 16th of Jan. 1876 that the Club had its inception, under the direction of Dr. Reynolds and it has not faltered a moment since.

President Wm. H. Robinson opened the exercises with reading from the Bible and he was followed by Mrs. D. D. Tatman of the First W. C. T. U. in prayer. After reading several letters from absent friends, he introduced ex-president Major F. G. Stiles who also read two or three letters and then spoke most eloquently of what the Club had done and of its mission. After the Major, remarks were made by Alfred S. Roe, the Rev. J. D. Pickles of Trinity Church, Rev. H. J. White of the Pleasant Street Baptist; Mrs. D. D. Tatman of the First W. C. T. U.; Charles F. Rugg, President of the Y. M. C. A.; Rev. G. H. S. Bell, of the Zion A. M. E. Church; vice-president, J. A. Stowell; Carl T. Thomas, Col. E. J. Russell, Probation Officer, and H. E. Townsend. It was a pleasant evening within, though stormy without. Especial stress was laid by speakers, outside of the Club, on the work done by the Club in the recent No License campaign, while members spoke more especially of the good that had been accomplished for themselves and their home.

Here are passages from some of the letters read. From Dr. H. T. Cheever, "Only hold fast in this way, under the conviction that perpetual vigilance is the price of safety and you will be justified in the claim to be one of the chief motors of public opinion in our godly city."

Rev. George H. Gould wrote "I want to congratulate the Reform Club on their grand and effective leadership in carrying our city for No License in December. Now let us work to make our glorious victory permanent."

Mrs. Townsend, President of the W. C. T. U. said, "There are many things to discourage us in the work but God is on our side and one with him is a majority."

Rev. W. T. Sleeper, "I appreciate your noble work of taking the hand of the fallen and helping them to walk in a straight path."

Sarah B. Earle, "May the good God whom we serve, keep you all."

Rev. A. Z. Conrad, "I honor the men engaged in the work and any assistance a busy pastor can render will be cheerfully given."

Rev. J. O. Peck, formerly of this city wrote at some length of his appreciation of the Club's good work.

Judge P. Emory Aldrich, "I hope I may be permitted to express my sincere wishes for the success of your anniversary celebration and the continued prosperity of your club."

Letters of regrets over necessary absence were also received from Deacon H. H. Merriam, Rev. Thomas Scully of Cambridge, Governor Wm. E. Russell, Rev. Francis G. Burgess, Rev. W. T. Worth, and S. M. Carpenter of Woonsocket.

The letter of the widow of the late Dr. Alonzo Hill, of the 1st Unitarian Church is especially good. She says, "Intemperance is the source of most of the poverty, ignorance and crime in the land, and Heaven's richest blessings must rest on those who perseveringly and earnestly labor for its suppression."

But perhaps nothing more interesting was submitted to the meeting than two letters from Mrs. Sarah R. Barnard, a lady ninety-two years old. Writing in her girlhood must have been taught better than it is to-day, for the result is like copperplate, wonderfully clear and beautiful. At Christmas she writes inclosing a gift, "Worcester has nobly, for one year pledged herself for the right and with GOD'S blessing I hope for many or forever." For the anniversary she writes, "It is my wish you may have a large and increasing number with you even before May first."

* * * I take a deep interest in your organization and every earnest effort to shut saloon doors for the benefit of individuals, the city and the state."

WORCESTER SOCIETY AGOG

Over a Unique and Free Exhibition.

A great many well known ladies and gentlemen were heard to say yesterday, "I never saw anything like it." "This is the most beautiful and magnificent sight I have ever seen." "Everything is so odd and handsome" "I never would have believed so many rare things could have been gotten together in one place, if I hadn't seen it with my own eyes."

The above remarks are in reference to the most unusual exhibition and display of antique and oriental mats, rugs, carpets, portieres and embroideries at Denholm & McKay Co.'s Carpet Department, Main Street, Worcester. There never was a more GENUINE or thoroughly honest collection of REAL antique Persian, Cashmere, Daghestan, Bokhara, Circassian, Egyptian, Armenian, Gourgistan, Arzang, Moorish, Kouristan, Boulagistan, Damgaly, Afghan, Tifizi, Camel's hair Ashiret, and Kerebla rugs, carpets, mats, portieres, and embroideries. The goods are all the way from 50 to 2,000 years old, and have come from the palaces of the Khedive of Egypt, Sultan of Turkey, Shah of Persia, Amir of Afghanistan, Czar of Russia, Bey of Circassia, Dighanghirs of India, and from the temples, mosque, ruins, and other sacred places of the Old World.

The great number and beautiful blending of colors in all the goods is something marvelous. Why don't you go in this morning or this afternoon and see them. It is truly a rare treat and such an one as you may never see again. You might travel in the Orient for years and not see an equal display in any one place. There are 800 pieces. The exhibitors feel that every customer, every friend; in fact, every lady and gentleman in Worcester county should visit this free exhibition. It will close Saturday night, and Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday there will begin at 10.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m. an auction sale, when every one of these beautiful rugs will be sold at whatever price they will bring regardless of any value.

SOUTH END NEWS.

At the regular meeting of the Piedmont Choral Union held last Monday evening, Mendelssohn's Oratorio of St. Paul was rehearsed.

Miss Viola Wright has recently moved into the Brightside, having come from Rochester, N. Y., where she was held in high esteem for her musical attainments.

The members of the Woman's Suffrage League met with Mrs. Kabley, 7 Allen Street, Thursday afternoon, and a very enjoyable time was the result.

This part of the city is, after many years, fortunate in the possession of a skating pond, so long lacking. The ice on University Park the past week has been in excellent condition and crowds of merry skaters have enjoyed the sport.

LEICESTER.

It took just about one-half minute to remove the town of Leicester back to its old location, two hours away from Worcester. The Electric Road had placed the hill tops so near Worcester, that they began to look like the 11th Ward of this city, but whir, buzz, bang and the engine stopped and the town slipped back again. However, those interested claim that the damage can soon be repaired and that, within ten days, we shall again be near each other. A supplementary engine is needed so, as in the case of the Chinaman's watches "When one is sicked, the other will be able to goe."

Physical Culture.

Physical culture and everything pertaining to health of body and mind are numbered among the accomplishments of the educated young lady or gentleman of today. There are many schools and teachers and systems for the graceful development of the human body, but that teacher who is conscientious and painstaking, and the system which is the best, are invariably the cheapest in the end. The Worcester School of Elocution and Oratory, of which Miss Stella M. Haynes is the principal, has decided to give lessons in physical culture, embracing only those exercises from which permanent benefit will be received, to young ladies and gentlemen on Friday evenings at 7.30 o'clock. The classes will meet at the rooms of the school in Clark's Block, No. 492 Main Street.

Y. M. C. A. Course.

The second series of the Association course was opened Thursday evening with an exceedingly entertaining concert by the Temple Quartet, assisted by Professor Tripp, reader.

Mechanics Course.

The last entertainment in course B will be given next Monday evening by the Schubert Quartet of Chicago.

The Ontario Mine.

Late one afternoon in June, I left Ogden for a visit to the largest mine in Utah. In the East a journey of forty miles is undertaken only after much preparation, but in the West, such a distance is thought little of. Indeed our next-door neighbor, Salt Lake City, is thirty miles away, and a trip there is not an uncommon occurrence. The sun was still an hour above the horizon, and it was two hours before the darkness would shut out the scenes along the road. For a few miles the railroad runs across the valley, and along the base of the mountain, as if looking for a place to get through. It has been raining, and after passing Uintah, we come to the opening in the mountain. Beside us is the Weber river, and before us the mountains. As we look ahead, a scented beauty is presented that we will not soon forget. The chæon with almost perpendicular walls seems to invite our entrance, while spanning the opening is the Bow of Promise, the rainbow, resting in the golden pots on either side, as if to dispel any fears that might arise. With such surroundings we enter, and are hurried along amid ever changing scenes, now on this side, now on that side of the river, till we reach a turn at right angles that would seem to bar our progress. But what can hinder the march of civilization? What can stop the inventive genius of man? The pioneer would be startled by the loud snort of the iron horse.

The cart road has been in sight all the way now it is below us, and it easily follows the bendings of the river, but the curve would be too sharp for the engine. What is to be done? Part of the mountain must come down. We are soon in a cut with walls high above cars but only for a minute, when we join the river again. More bridges, two tunnels, and the cañon begins to widen, and a fertile plain is reached. But let us go back for a moment. We have passed through the Devil's Gate, and one side we soon come to that strange formation of rocks known as the Devil's Slide. It is an outcrop of two parallel ridges of stone, extending from the top to the bottom of the mountain. Farther along and on the other side is the 1000 mile cañon, said to be 1000 miles from Omaha, but in vain do we look for the 1000 mile tree said to mark that place. For two miles we scan the track on both sides, and had nearly given up seeing it. But near the 998th mile post we spy the tree, still holding out the sign that has told so many of the early pioneers that they were almost to their new home.

It is dusk when we reach Echo, interesting for the peculiar rocks known as the Wittches, and the Pulpit Rock, from which Brigham Young preached his first sermon in Utah. Here we leave the main line of the Union Pacific, and taking a branch, begin to climb the mountain. Progress is slow. In many places the grade can be seen by looking from one end of the car to the other. There is often a rise of 200 feet to the mile.

Early the next morning we were up to see all that can be seen in the short time we remain. Park City is a curious little town, built on both sides of the cañon, all length and no width. The mines are a mile from the depot and much higher than the town. On either side of the road are small houses of one room, or at most two rooms, and many of them are above the road on account of the nearness of the mountain slopes. A stream of clear cold water comes down beside the road, and in many places where the sun does not reach, large banks of snow still remain. Near the top I passed through a cut in a snow-drift that was six feet deep.

There are three shafts known as No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3. No. 1 is the deepest, being at present 1300 feet deep. I had some difficulty in getting permission to go into the mines, for the Superintendent and all who could give permission were away. But having come forty miles for the purpose of seeing them, I was unwilling to go away without going down into them. Through the kindness of the foreman of No. 1, I was told to come back after dinner, and he would show me the process of mining. I was on hand at one o'clock, and preparatory to the descent was provided with a rubber suit, —bat, coat, and boots. They were all about three sizes too big for me, and I must have cut a fine figure in them, but they were a good protection from the water.

The sensation of going down a shaft is better experienced than described. We went so fast that it seemed as if we were falling, and I clung to the side of the cage for fear of tumbling off. It was total darkness save the glimmer of the smoky lantern. There are openings every 100 feet, but few of them are worked except the lower one. Below the 600 level the water began to drip, and when we reached the bottom there was a heavy fall of water. We then set out on a tour of exploration I saw the miners at their work, and climbed up into some of the—chambers they could hardly be called, for there was scarce room to turn around. Some specimens I also obtained. The pump that keeps out the water so that the work may go on raises it to the 600 feet level from which it flows through a tunnel to shaft No. 3. Here is the largest machinery and while waiting for the pump man to come up, I had plenty of time to examine it. There are three cages in the shaft, one of which is used for human freight, the other two bring up the ore. As the cars come up they are rolled away and emptied. A stick in the car indicates that it contains ore, the other cars are dumped on the waste heap. The most interesting piece of machinery here is the pump and the engine that runs it. The flywheel is very large and moves very slowly. The connecting rod, which runs from the engine to the pistons, is made of a square piece of timber 12 x 15 and extends to the lowest level 1000 ft. At two points along its length there are immense weights to balance it, each weighing 27 tons. Thus the weight of this connecting rod must be over 50 tons. At the 600 feet level there are two pistons or rather plungers, and there are the same at the bottom. From the former level a tunnel runs to the mill in the valley. Through this tunnel the water finds exit and also cars of ore may be run direct to the mill. The mine is worked day and night, each shift of men, as they are called, working eight hours.

My next visit was to the mill where the ore is converted into bullion. The ore first goes to the battery, where it is reduced to a powder. The din of the hammers renders it almost impossible to hear conversation, and the dust compels the workmen to wear a sponge over their nose and mouth. Belt elevators then take it, after it has been mixed with salt, and carry it to the top of a large square chimney, several feet across, and a sieve causes the particles to fall at some distance from each other. During the drop from top to bottom the intense heat effects a union between the salt and ore and silver chloride is produced. This is drawn from the bottom red-hot, and after cooling for several days goes to the agitators. These are large tubs of water which is constantly being changed. A thin mud is formed and the lightest of it runs off as waste. Silver is heavy and so sinks. But the better to effect a separation, mercury is added. It attacks the chloride and forms an amalgam with the silver. This amalgam is still heavier than the silver, and is drawn off from the bottom. The mercury may be removed by a fine strainer. The silver, then nearly pure, is run into bricks. The mercury may be used over and over again. The mills run night and day, some of the machinery, I was told, had not stopped for sixteen years, except when necessary for repairs. The constant din of the mill is somewhat disturbing to the stranger, who sleeps for the first time in Park City. But one soon gets used to the noise, and sleeps as soundly as if in a quiet place. The day was a busy one, and late at night, I sought the retirement of my room. It was a day well spent.

FLACTIONS.

Newspaper Men.

The "typical newspaper man" of to-day is a young man. He is college bred; he comes from a good family, and is a gentleman by birth and breeding. He is brighter, quicker, has broad knowledge of men and affairs and he makes and spends more money than his brother who goes into "business." He is well dressed, well housed and well fed. He has learned that bohemianism, as exemplified by irregular hours, infrequent baths and incessant rum, does not pay, and he has left that sort of bohemianism to chronic bummers and greenhorns. The tone, the moral of the profession have changed within the last twenty years, and the public is only just beginning to find it out.

Educated people who keep their eyes open realize that their notions of the "typical newspaper man" are sadly out of joint, and they are revising their types. The profession is slowly moving toward its rightful place in public estimation, and the time is not very far off when it will stand, not on a par with, but ahead of the law, the pulpit, medicine and the other liberal professions. In the meantime we will be obliged to endure with what grace we may the would be brilliant sketches of playwrights and novelists and the unintentionally stupid conclusions of misinformed outsiders who see in every whiskey soreheaded scribbler a typical newspaper man.—Printer's Ink.

Old Men's Home.

At a recent meeting thanks were tendered to Albert Curtis for continued munificence and it was voted to petition the Legislature for the privilege of changing the name to "Home for Aged Men."

Books and Bookmen

"They do most by books who could do much without them."—Sir Thomas Browne

The next number of the Riverside Paper Series will be Mrs. Kirk's popular story, Walford.

A new long story by Bret Harte, A First Family of Tasajara, will be published soon by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Miss Bagg's Secretary is the name of a new story by Clara Louise Burnham, author of Next Door, and other popular novels. The sub-title describes it as a West Point Romance.

Under the title The Early Renaissance and Other Essays, Professor J. M. Hoppin, of Yale, will shortly bring out a volume which promises to be a valuable and agreeable addition to art literature.

Two or three winters ago Mr Lowell delivered at the Lowell Institute a course of lectures on the English Dramatists. These will be published under Professor Norton's editorial supervision, next Autumn by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

This is a season for printing final poems and papers by Mr. Lowell. Scribner's publishes his latest unpublished poem for the February number and Harper's announces several unpublished essays. The aftermath of so active a life will be considerable.

The February Atlantic will contain an article of great interest by Professor Shaler, of Harvard, a native Kentuckian, giving the reasons which led him to join the Union Army in the War of the Rebellion.

Professor Rodolfo Lanciani, author of Ancient Rome in the Light of Recent Discoveries, will contribute to the February Atlantic a very remarkable paper on "The Pageant at Rome in the Year 17, B. C.," giving the details of some inscriptions very recently discovered, commemorating the celebration of secular games under Augustus, for which Horace wrote his famous Carmen Seculare.

Everyone fond of hunting, fishing and canoeing, and those interested in natural history, fish culture, rifle and trap shooting, and owners of dogs, who like to read interesting, instructive and practical articles on these subjects, should read the Amateur Sportsman, a magazine published monthly at one dollar per year. Each number of the Amateur Sportsman contains numerous practical articles—many of them illustrated—that should be read by every lover of the gun, rod and dog. Send to The Amateur Sportsman Co., 6 College Place, New York, for a free specimen copy.

The Artist Printer for December reaches us somewhat delayed but none the less welcome on this account. The engravings and subject matter are of a high order. Considerable space is given to the life and work of Mr. John Anderson, the head of the Publishing Company, bearing his name. This is the most considerable Scandinavian publishing establishment in the country. Mr. John Marder of Chicago one of the prominent type founders of that city. Margaret Mather as Medea is the most striking portrait in the number and the face and pose are beautiful. "Gathering Flowers" is a delightful realization of childhood. "The Tower of London" shows the wonderful result attainable by rule work. Published in Chicago and St. Louis by A. C. Cameron & Co. $1 a year.

The following is of interest in connection with a question recently raised as to the late Adin Thayer's connection with the famous Anthony Burns affair. LIGHT has mailed to Colonel Higginson a paper containing an account of our late ex-Alderman Porter.

CAMBRIDGE, Jan. 14, 1892.

A. S. Roe, Esq.

DEAR SIR: In answer to Mr. Tainter's inquiry, in your last issue, I can only say that I never before heard of any such conversation as that which he describes as occurring between Adin Thayer and myself; nor do I think that Mr. Thayer was in Court Square on the evening of the Burns affair. I do not know who Samuel Porter is, whom Mr. Tainter mentions as his authority. Yours very truly,

T. W. HIGGINSON.

For the Old Sake's Sake by Alan St. Aubyn, from Rand, McNally & Co., Chicago and New York.

Any one who has read A Fellow of Trinity will take this book up eagerly as written by the same hand. It is a story of love and sacrifice with sadness which calls for our sincerest pity. Lettice Primrose prepares to marry a young student of her father's but just on the wedding day her step-mother dies and her father with the baby daughter are left to mourn alone. Lettice gives up her lover and stays behind to care for them while he goes to India. After twenty years absence he returns and, finding Lettice older and faded, falls in love with the beautiful girl whom he only remembers as a desolate baby. By a thorny pathway they all reach a place of peace. Lettice, whose whole life has been one of sacrifice, makes one more and goes her way with burdens a little heavier but knowing that her sister and her lover will be happy. The book may be had in paper covers for 50 cents.

A Reporter's Romance by "The Deacon," from Rand, McNally & Co., publishers, Chicago and New York.

This is a story of St. Louis and brings in much of the high life of that city. If begins with the reporter, Paul Terry, being sent in to report in the dress to be to worn by a famous belle at a coming ball. The story centers on this young girl, her love affairs and Paul and his art as a reporter and partial detective. A madman, a ring and locket, a French chateau, and in fact all the necessary items for a thrilling love story are in the book and made the most of. It is number 166 of the Globe Library Series.

Ingalls' Home and Art Magazine published by J. F. Ingalls, Lynn, Mass.

The frontispiece is a lion's head by Rosa

Bonheur and directions as well as the palette for painting are given. This number has several pages devoted to needlework and also descriptions of odd entertainments with directions for carrying them out successfully. There is something of drawing and charcoal work and altogether the magazine is worth the price which is $1 per year.

The February Pansy is a notable number. The article "About Boston," which concerns itself with the city's historical points of interest, and the article on "William Wordsworth" (English Literature Papers), which ably discusses this great man and his work, would be enough to recommend its worth, were there no stories by Pansy and Margaret Sidney, and the delightful Baby's Corner by Mrs. C. M. Livingstone. Taking into consideration all these, and the ably written papers pertaining to foreign life and ways, short biographical articles and timely sketches, Pansy, with its shorter stories, verses and illustrations, is a magazine no family can afford to do without. Price $1 a year, 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

Little Men and Women for February gives a kindly greeting to all boys and girls so fortunate as to have this magazine for a monthly visitor. It contains "Another Voice from a Menagerie," a helpful Natural History story, "A Boy and a Girl," a real boy and girl story, "Joker and His Relations," a remarkable monkey who is clever and amusing, "The Studio Dolls," whose plot is full of extraordinary doings, "Uncle Roy's Story," "The Snow Man's Opinion," while "Willie in the Woods" and "Sussy's Dolls and Playhouse," as well as the jingles and verse make a bright, cheerful and entertaining number, well set off by its attractive pictures which charmingly illustrate the best magazine, made by the best writers for little men and women just beginning to read for themselves.

Price $1 a year, 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

The February Babyland, with its bits of poetry, scraps of song, and pretty stories, is as charming and dainty as the babies for which it was made. "The Breakfast Song," to be sung and told to Baby, "The Tiptoe Twins," and the big kite, the "Baby's Story," and "Sweetheart's Bath," will entertain and amuse the nursery folks, and they will want to hear the story of the "Baby-Tenders" and "Our Carlo" told many times. Babyland is Baby's own magazine.

Price 50 cents a year, 5 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

A Study in Girls by Edmond Smith Middleton, New York, G. W. Dillingham, Publisher.

Mr. Middleton is well known to many dwellers in this city, having been, for a time, the Assistant Rector at All Saints' Church and there are many acquaintances who will hail a book from his pen with no little pleasure. His Study in Girls is well named. It bears, to the full story, just the relation that the artist's Summer sketch, quickly made, does to the finished product of his brush when Winter leisure enables him to put upon canvas his lasting impressions. Mr. Middleton writes with admirable ease and on every page gives the impression of being thoroughly familiar with the terms and scenes introduced.

"Faith, A Not Unusual Girl," is extremely good and, after some tribulation, becomes the wife of her pastor. "Annette, A Literary Girl" becomes a novelist of note and in her case, the writer gives just a little touch of realism. "Suzanne, A Shop Girl" is a very sensible young woman and marries well. "Lora, A Stage Girl" is not to be envied. Let us hope that her kind is not legion. "Grace, A Summer Girl" is much more pleasing than many of her sort are said to be. "Nellie, A Wayward Girl" is treated very delicately, yet truly. "Myone, A Marriageable Girl" is one of the most interesting of the studies, showing some of the finest skill in treating characters.

Mr. Middleton's Worcester friends will find his book entertaining and, quite likely, many will read to find out whether any characters were drawn from acquaintances made here.

Manual-Plane Geometry on the Heuristic Plan, with numerous Extra Exercises, both theorems and problems, for advanced work by G. Irving Hopkins, Instructor in Mathematics and Physics in the High School, Manchester, N. H., Boston, D. C. Heath & Co., 1891.

A new geometry is not taken up with the expectation of finding new truths. Euclid pretty nearly exhausted the subject, but we may and do find, in later books, new ways of expressing long accepted principles and that is just what this book gives us. It is not divided into books nor chapters, as the most of our geometries are. This may or may not be an improvement. There are divisions, but those who used Davies Legendre and other similar treatises have little trouble in assigning a geometrical statement to its appropriate place in its chapter. Possibly, the emphasized headings in Mr. Hopkins' book will do as well. But the chief merit of the book lies in leaving something for the student to discover for himself. Prescott, the historian, who, as a boy, memorized his demonstrations would have failed with this book. There is no question as to the utility of a system that makes the pupil seek for reasons. The book contains all the essentials for College and Scientific School Examinations in Plane Geometry. The quadrature of a circle is treated in an especially entertaining manner.

The Atlantic-Pacific Railway Tunnel Company that is rocking a tunnel five miles long through the Rocky Mountain mineral backbone of the continent, 60 miles west from Denver in Colorado, for railway and gold and silver mining purposes, closes the year 1891 without a dollar for floating debt or unpaid bills; with exceeding $4,521,000 of fully paid for assets, and is on the direct road to success and profit for all investors. For particulars of this wonderful enterprise, the greatest of its kind, send four cents to Mark M. Pomeroy, President, Room 46, World Building, New York City, for a large illustrated 34-page pamphlet telling of the enterprise, and you will also receive free a sample copy of Advantage Thought, his red-hot monthly, if you will mention this paper.

The January Inland Printer is a joy to the eye. Seemingly, nothing could be finer than this number in every respect. As ever the engravings are superb. The text is valuable, every word of it. The Development of Book-making is of interest to every printer and lover of books. Then come some very practical treatises on many departments of work in a printing office. It is a pity that every one in the office, little and big, could not read them. There is a good statement of the way half tone prints, those used in LIGHT, are made. The description of the palatial abode of the Chicago Herald makes eastern people long for the "Wild and Woolly West." For the practical printer the book is indispensable. Published in Chicago for $2 per year.

Johnson's History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, edited with an introduction on methods of study by Fred N. Scott, Ph. D., Assistant Professor of Rhetoric in the University of Michigan. Leach, Shewell and Sanborn, Boston and New York.

Another volume in the Student's Series of English Classics. In the same familiar form, with the same colored covers as heretofore, this set of books will put the reading of these classics on a more useful basis than ever before. Of course, the main spring in their compilation is the preparing of young people for college examinations in English composition and reading. The editor gives an entertaining biographical sketch of the writer, good enough to prompt the reader to try "Boswell" at once. Methods of Study is crammed full of advice to the student. Then come "Aids to the Study of Rasselas," which the student will carefully heed. The Chronological outline is Johnson's life in brief. After the story are three appendices. In the first are notes sufficient to make clear the dark places in the text. The second illustrates Dr. Johnson's power as a poet by quotations from "The Vanity of Human Wishes" and in the third are given some selections from his best prose thoughts. The book may be had for 42 cts.

The publishers of Outing made the January number the holiday number, enclosing it in a white cover printed in blue and gold. No single article takes particular precedence, all being entertaining reading and sufficiently varied in subject to suit many tastes. The illustrations are fine and numerous, but as they are always so, it is almost superfluous to say it. The fiction includes "The Bear's Head Brooch," by Ernest Ingersoll; "Saddle and Sentiment" (continued) by Wenona Gilman and "Harry's Career at Yale" (continued) by John Seymour Wood. Walter Camp begins a series of articles on "Training," the first one being entitled, "Indoor Appliances for Outdoor Sport." Besides these there are stories of travel, of sport with rod and gun, of life among the cowboys of the West, of military life and of the present Canadian Militia, besides practical suggestions for photographers and the monthly record of all branches of recreation. Thousands of readers enjoy Outing's monthly visits.

Curious Corner.

Told by the Nails.

Fortune-telling by means of the finger-nails, onychomancy, as it was called, was not uncommon in the ancient times, says Medical Classics. The practice was to rub the nails with oil and soot or wax and to hold up the nails thus prepared against the sun, and upon the transparent horny substance were supposed to appear figures or characters, which gave the answer required. In more recent times people have been found predicting by means of the nails of the hand and telling the dispositions of persons with certain descriptions of the nails. However absurd it may appear, we shall give examples of this superstition. A person of broad nails is of gentle nature, timid and bashful. Those whose nails grow into the flesh at the points or sides are given to luxury. A white mark on the nail speaks misfortune. Persons with very pale nails are subject to much infirmity of the flesh and persecution by neighbors and friends. People with narrow nails are ambitious and quarrelsome. Lovers of knowledge and liberal sentiment have round nails. Indolent people have generally fleshy nails. Small nails indicate littleness of mind, obstinacy and conceit. Melancholy persons are distinguished by their pale or lead-colored nails, and choleric, martial men, delighting in war, have red and stotted nails.

How Wasps Work.

F. H. Stauffer, in the Christian Union, says: Two boys of my acquaintance one morning took a walk with a naturalist.

"Do you notice anything peculiar in the movements of those wasps?" he asked, as he pointed to a puddle in the middle of the road.

"Nothing, except that they seem to come and go," replied one of the boys.

The other was less prompt in his reply, but he had observed to some purpose.

"I notice that they fly away in pairs," he said. "One has a little pellet of mud, the other nothing. Are there drones among wasps as among bees?"

"Both were alike busy and each went away with a burden, replied the naturalist. 'The one you thought a 'do nothing' had a mouthful of water. They reach their nest together; the one deposits his pellet of mud, and the other ejects the water upon it, which makes it of the consistency of mortar. They then paddle it upon the nest, and fly away for more materials.'

"You see, one boy observed a little, and the other a good deal more, while the naturalist had something to tell them that surprised them very much.

Boys, be observant. Cultivate the faculty. Hear sharply, look keenly. Glance at a shop window as you pass it, and then try how many things you can recall that you noticed in it. Open your eyes wider when you stroll across the meadow, through the woods, or along the brook. There are ten thousand interesting things to be seen, noted, wondered at, and explained. Animals, birds, plants and insects, with their habits, intelligence and peculiarities, will command your admiration.

Aunt Kezia's Outing.

Yes, I was down to Worcester last Fall a visitin' Lizzie Jackson, she that was a Bullard. She was Mary Walker's daughter. Mary and I was cousins, and set a store by each other when we was girls. She married Judson Bullard for her second husband, and they went down Boston way to live.

He was smart and fore-handed and made a powerful lot of money and they had everything that heart could wish for, but it never made no difference with Mary, she wasn't a bit set up by it. When she used to come up home to Vermont a visitin', she was always just as pleased to see me as if we was rich folks too.

And Lizzie was just the same. Her mother brought her up sensible like. I hadn't seen her for nigh a dozen years, but when she come to be married, she sent me a card and a chunk of weddin' cake all done up nice in a little paper box, just to fit and tied up with narrer white satin ribbon.

And after a while she wrote me a nice letter, too, a tellin' me what a good husband she'd got, and sayin' I must come down to Worcester sometime and see them.

Well, I kept a thinkin' all along I would, but lands uz, there was always something to hinder. But I ain't one of the kind that gives up easy, and I meant to go sometime, just the same.

I wasn't very well last summer and Hiram he got kind of scared about me. The doctor said a change would do me a sight more good than medicine; and one way and another, I thought now was my chance to go down and see Lizzie.

It was a pretty good time, too, for me to get away, for the season was forward and hayin' was over early and the men got rid of, and Mahaly Grant was willin' to come and stay a spell and see to things. Hiram said I could go just as well as not.

Of course I had to get ready some. Mary Bullard was always real particular and Lizzie took after her mother, and I didn't want to shame her.

So I had Mahaly help me fix over my alpaca I had three winters ago, and put a new braid round the bottom and we turned and made over my grey wool dress, and I got me a new bonnet and felt as if I could go in pretty good shape.

Hiram, he got Israel Perkins to see me safe on board the cars when I left the stage, for I wasn't much used to travellin' on railroads.

I got dreadful tuckered out with the journey, and worried to death for fear somethin' would hinder Lizzie from meetin' me when I'd got to Worcester as she'd written she would.

But the very first person I set my eyes on after I'd got out of the cars and was a prospectin' round, was Lizzie. I recognized her from her picture she'd sent me when she graduated at the High School. But I should have known her anywhere, she favored her mother so.

She had her coop-a, as she called it, at the depot, and it wasn't long a takin' us to where she lived.

My! Wasn't it a grand house. I'd always thought her folks had things pretty nice, but Lizzie was way ahead of them.

The chairs and sofy in the parlor was covered with satin and plush—every one a different color, and there was the most beautiful pictures on the wall and in one room a marble image almost a big as Lizzie was herself the last time I'd seen her.

There was elegant lace curtains at the windows, and the blinds all open and the sun a pourin' right in onto the parlor carpet. I told Lizzie she needn't have opened the parlor and made company of me, I'd just as lief set somewhere else, but she said they always kept it open and they used it all they wanted to just like any room. There was lots of other rooms too—any one of them nice enough for the president's wife.

The cutest thing about was a couple of lamps. I didn't know what they was at first. There was a brass stand as shiny as gold, and pretty near as tall as I be, and on top of each was a satin parasol. One was pink with white all frilled round the edge and the other was just the color of a sunflower and had fringe round it.

They was real pretty when they was lighted, but it did seem the queerest notion to use parasols—and such fancy ones too—for lampshades.

They had chandyleers too. When she wanted it lighter than them lamps made it, Lizzie just took hold of a little chain that dangled and gave it the least mite of a pull, and I declare, if them chandyleers didn't just light themselves.

Lizzie explained that it was done by 'lectricity, but I couldn't get to understand it any more than I could what it was that made the 'lectric cars go, and I tried real hard to get it through my head how 'twas all done. Mr. Jackson, Lizzie's husband, was real good and explained it all out to me but it seemed to me that the more he explained, the less I knew about it.

Lizzie took me for a ride on one of the cars. We set on the very front seat. The driver—they called him somethin' else, but I can't remember what it was—just turned a little wheel and we started off. It seemed almost like flyin' for I couldn't see a thing that made the car go. It just followed along the track as easy, and the end of the pole a stickin' out of the top of the car slid along on a little clothesline that was stretched all the way over the track.

While I was to Lizzie's I went to a dreadful big concert. They was havin' "Festival week." I got to Lizzie's on a Thursday, and Lizzie and her husband went that night but I was too tired out from my journey to go anywhere but to bed, so Lizzie she took me the next afternoon.

She had told me that Mechanics Hall, where they had the concerts was a big place and I should see it pretty well filled; but it about took my breath away when I saw what a crowd there was. Lots of men, too. I wondered how they could leave their work. There was lots and lots of singers. It seemed as if all Podunk and East Hadwick and the Three Corners thrown in, wouldn't fill them chorus seats.

Then there was the band—such a big one—all a sittin' on the platform.

When everything was ready the leader waved his hand with a little stick in it and they all started in, the little fiddles and the big ones and all the different kinds of flutes and horns and trumpets and drums and then the golden harp and the big organ.

It was a beautiful sound and real inspirin'; but I kept wishin' the tune would begin. But it didn't all the way along. I was real disappointed for they called it a Sympathy Concert and I expected I should hear "Come ye disconsolate" or "Cower" or "The Portuguese Hymn" which was all kind of cheering and soothing, and favorites of mine,—but they just played on, and on, and on; and, if you'll believe me, there wasn't a bit of tune from the beginning of that piece to the end!

I couldn't help thinkin' how grand "Coronation" would have sounded with all them instruments and the soloist's voices a soarin' above them all.

We went again in the evenin' and I enjoyed it better. The chorus was all there and when they all let them voices out it was like a sea of music.

It was worth considerable to see the fine clothes the women soloists had on. The stuff their dresses was made of was beautiful and must have cost a lot of money. I told Lizzie I didn't believe they could hire singers that dressed like that for less than five dollars a night, and Lizzie's husband he smiled and said he didn't think so either.

There was lots of beautiful dresses down in the hall, too; and more'n half the women had their bonnets off just as if they was at home. It beat all how every lady had their sleeves made—the tops of them puffed most up to their ears, and to think how Mahaly had been so careful to get the new ones to my grey dress to fit snug about the shoulders.

Then the skirts! They was so tight and skimpy that it looked as if the dressmaker had made the sleeves first and it took so much cloth that there wasn't any left to get the rest of the dress out of.

I had a nice time, but I couldn't stay in Worcester as long as I wanted to. When I come away, Lizzie was gettin' ready to have a butter-cup tea.

I thought it mighty queer when I first heard her talking about it. Of all things to make tea of, butter-cup herbs was about the last. I thought I'd heard of everything in the way of her drinks, but that beat me.

But I didn't say anything for I thought it wouldn't be polite to make any remarks about it, and it was lucky I held my tongue for after a while I found out that it didn't mean at all that Lizzie was goin' to give her company tea made out of buttercups, flowers or branches, but that she was goin' to wear a yellow dress and everything about the room and the table and the things to eat that she could think of, was to be yellow.

She was goin' to have yellowish jelly and honey and gold cake and other cake frosted with the yolks of the eggs, and lots of things to match.

I told her she'd ought to have some of Mrs. Deacon Simpson's biscuits. She always gets in so much saleratus that they come onto the table lookin' like saffron.

Lizzie was goin' to have candles too. City folks are the queerest. There she has got gas and them sunshade lamps already.

I couldn't help sayin' I thought there'd be a plenty of light to show off the things without the candles. But she said they'd make the rooms look pretty and she would have a chance to have a little yellow paper shade over every one of them.

It all seemed sort of foolish and frivolous like—but there! Its like the things that grows. Some of them are good and nourishin' for man and beast, and some don't seem to have any mortal use only to look pretty. But yet 'tis the Lord who makes them all. May be its just as much our duty to give our minds some of the time to the things which are pleasing to the eye only as it is to be attendin' to what's useful. What do you think?

Manners in Children.

If we desire children to be courteous we must treat them with respect. They will infallibly copy our manners; so we must take care that they are the best. Let us be careful of their feelings as we wish them to be of those of others. When it is necessary to administer reproof, let it be given in private. Many children are very sensitive on this point, and they feel acutely, although they cannot put their emotions into words. To tell a child in public that it has been rude, or lacking in good breeding, is as unwarrantable as it would be to tell a guest so. It is no excuse to say that we are trying to teach it to do better; we can do this with greater effect if we take it aside at the first convenient moment and gently point out where the error was, and what should be done the next time.—Elizabeth Scovill in Ladies' Home Journal.

Principal Abercrombie of the Academy attended a meeting of Brown University Academy boys in Providence last week. Such gatherings are particularly pleasant.

Samuel A. Pratt.

When a man can attain his seventieth birthday and look as hale and hearty, lively and vigorous as Mr. Pratt, Superintendent of the Protective Union does, it is a standing argument for Temperance and honest dealing. The 16th inst. was his birthday and his life record is one in which he must take no little satisfaction. At any rate, his friends praise him and even those who do not accept all his strict principles respect him.

Is Worcester Musical?

Judging from the success of the September Festival, one might deem the question an idle one, but when we find it impossible to insure the cost of Paderewski's coming to Worcester; when the balance sheet for such high order of music as that lately offered by Mr. Anderson at Central Church is not favorable; when symphony concerts never pay; in fine, when musical exercises of high order regularly go begging for audiences in Worcester, it would appear that the question, so often asked, is not so much out of place. If not musical, then why is the Festival a success? Is it a fad? Has it become the rage and do people expect, then and thereby, to perform all their musical duties? The Springfield Republican, lately, gives Worcester a hard rub for her neglect to call the Polish wonder.

He hath no leisure who useth it not.

The Price He Paid.

BY COUSIN CONSTANCE.

George Harding flung his hat in a despairing way on the rack and exclaimed,

"Oh, dear, what am I to do?"

His cousin, Sarah Hall, who for the past year had taken charge of his house and two motherless children, had just read him the letter that informed her that her mother had been stricken with paralysis, leaving her helpless. She had buried her father a year before coming to George's home, and as she was an only child her presence was desired at once at the home, a hundred miles away on the breezy hills of New Hampshire.

This news fell like a blow on her cousin George, a widower of a year, who at the death of his father had been left the entire estate, consisting of a fine house and grounds and well established business in the heart of the city of C.

At the death of his mother, when he was a lad of sixteen, his father had sent George to board with his sister, the mother of Sarah. There he staid while at school and they had grown up together, almost as brother and sister. She was five years his senior, and his life had been influenced more by her quiet Christian character than by any other person, so that when he lost his wife, he turned to her as the one best suited to train his children.

"I must go George, there is no one can do for mother as she needs. I know it will be hard for you, but try and bear it manfully"—"for the tears were actually in his eyes"—and at once advertise for a housekeeper and make all inquiries in the meantime, for I must go by Saturday. Mrs. Benson wrote that she would stay with mother until then. Abbie, who was here when the letter arrived, set at once to work to find a housekeeper for you; here she comes now, and a bright-faced rosy girl of eighteen dropped breathless into a chair, and in reply to Sarah's question as to her success, said, "I just caught her, in an hour she would have been engaged but I persuaded her to wait until I let you know. Hulda Dean, that nice, good tempered woman who has been nursing at the Longley's you know, Sarah. You saw her once as we passed and liked her face so much."

"Oh George, the very one for you, can we get her?"

"If you go at once. She left the Longley's yesterday and has partly engaged to go to another place, but as there is a larger family than yours, she gives you the preference."

George had his hat in hand, and a more hopeful face than a half hour ago.

"Engage her to come by Friday night, if possible George, and Abbie says she will take care of the children while I prepare for my journey."

He was gone. Abbie threw off her wraps and addressed herself to the care of the children while Sarah made haste to pack her trunk, see to the girl in the kitchen, persuade her she would get along nicely with Miss Dean and when, in an hour, George returned saying Miss Dean would report for duty Friday night, the atmosphere of the Harding house was decidedly clearer to George's view, helped no little by the efforts of Miss Abbie May, the only child of a near neighbor who since Sarah's arrival, had been on intimate terms with her.

The next day she came over and with winning ways cared for the children, assisted Sarah in seeing that all was prepared for the new housekeeper who appeared promptly that night. Then kissing Sarah goodby, as she was to take the early train in the morning, she said to George, who opened the hall door for her, and warmly spoke his thanks for the part she had taken in furnishing the new housekeeper, "I'm very glad I have been of a little use to any one," flung one of her bewildering glances, said good night and ran across the street.

The children, Millie, a sweet sensitive girl of five, and Ned, a sturdy roo of two years, were asleep, Miss Dean, with the girl in the kitchen and George and Sarah sat down to talk over all necessary things before her departure.

With a heavy heart the young widower said, "I dread to have you go Sarah, such a help as you have been to me and the little ones, how they will miss you. What I shall do if they don't take to Hulda, I don't know."

"They will, I know; when I talked with Millie before she went to sleep the dear child was so thoughtful, so determined to do all 'dear cousin wished,' the pretty lips quivering all the time, because I was going to leave her. I assure you, George, I had hard work to keep calm myself, that child is very dear to me," and the fond cousin swallowed a sob.

"I believe you Sarah, I thank you for my heart for all your care of them. I am sorry your mother will need so much of your care and strength now, I fear you will overtax yourself."

"Yes, it's going to be a sad task I fear, for I believe she will eventually lose her mind and that will be worse than all to me. But I shall be carried through," and the calm, serene expression, George remembered so well, that always came into her face in times of trial when he was in their home, almost faded him.

"I wish I could feel as you do in view of cares, but somehow they seem to make me hopeless and almost helpless. You must rise as often as you can. I shall need your courageous words."

"Yes and I shall so much wish I could have a report of every day's happenings here, but that will be too much to expect."

"Oh, you'll hear as often as you will wish. I shall fly to you in all troubles."

It was rather a sorry smile he tried to give.

"There goes ten o'clock. Miss Dean said breakfast should be ready at five and the train leaves at thirty minutes past, so good night. I kissed the dear children good by so I would not disturb them in the morning."

"I shall be on hand to see you safe off," said George, "so good night," and soon all were asleep.

True to her word Miss Dean had breakfast all ready in season, but good as it was, little was eaten by George or Sarah in the anxieties before them. He sadly watched the train that bore her away, found his children waiting to kiss him before he left for his office, where he tried in the absorption of business to forget the sad change in his household.

Hulda assumed her duties with a steady hand. Millie from the first was drawn to her, crept often to her side and if she did not meet with the caresses of Abbie, she knew the good woman pitied her motherless state and would do all her duty by her. Master Ned found little chance for mischief with that steady eye upon him, and the constant efforts of his thoughtful sister in trying to amuse him. Often when George came in to his tea he found the light hearted Abbie frolicing with Ned and quite willing to sit down to tea, spend the evening with him and join him in a game of chess or make her pretty white hands look whiter, as they flew in and out of the bright worsted she was working.

"Have you heard from Sarah yet?" she asked about a week after her departure.

"No, but I shall look for a letter certainly tomorrow. Of course her mother will be such a care she will find but little time to write."

The morrow brought the letter. Sarah was well, rested somewhat, was longing to hear from all, "Sent love to Abbie." He told her as he found her walking with Ned in the garden. She declined his invitation to come into tea, and giving him Ned went home. Ned, it was but confessed was a sore trial to poor Huldah and had not Abbie often taken him off with her to her home she would hardly have thought she could stay, so wearing was he becoming to her, who had never been used to children in the families where she had lived. She declared to Mr. Harding that he seemed to mind that gay good natured girl better than any one, and she could do anything with him.

Yes, George had seen it, he told her, was glad he could be brought under to any one, and as he said the words a thought came into his heart, "How I wish she could be here all the time. I wish Millie did not seem to fear her so, I wonder why it is, she will hardly let her kiss or caress her."

Poor little Millie with her keen intuition had seemed to divine all the dislike felt for her by Abbie and nothing could charm away the distrust and once when reproved for it by her father, she had burst into such an uncontrollable fit of weeping as to become ill from its effects, and he never tried it again, for dearer than life he held this child in his heart, and the knowledge that Abbie did not at all share this feeling in regard to her had gone far to keep him from the infatuation of her presence.

Day by day, he saw her and on every occasion her bright playfulness wore him out of his cares and loneliness at the loss of Sarah. Did she fail to see this too? Was she not even building upon it for the future? She had seen for weeks his manner grow tenderer, his desire to have her company stronger. Was it strange that this fine, gentlemanly widower, with his ample means, evident partiality for her should offer attractions to this idolized only child, whose father was so far advanced in consumption as to be unable longer to follow his business and whose death would leave her and her mother entirely without means?

She tried to overcome her dislike of Millie and succeeded so well as deceive the too willing father and it was not long before he, tired of his loneliness when she was absent, determined to try his fate, for Abbie had plenty of lovers and that fact with what he had learned from a friend that she favored one, Charley Meyers, hurried him on in his determination. How could he find out in regard to Meyers? He thought of Sarah and the intimacy that had existed between the two girls the past year. She might in a confidential moment have told Sarah if engaged. He wrote to her at once asking if she had ever told her of an engagement?

Ominous question, thought his cousin as with a sigh she closed the letter and sat down to answer at once. She had always dreaded the thought of a second marriage for George, and remembering at once the very words of Abbie she wrote

"MY DEAR COUSIN: We were glad to hear from you and that all is going on so well at home. The important question you ask shall be answered at once. I well recollect Abbie's words when I asked her, after one of Charles' calls, if there was an engagement, as I knew she loved him. She did not deny it, but said 'there is no positive engagement. I suppose he thinks when his father's estate is settled and he gets his share that I shall marry him. He begged hard for an engagement but I was firm. I was young, so was he, we might change so he was obliged to be contented with that.' Those were her words. Oh George, your letter has made me so anxious. Do not, I beg, forget the dear children. Remember the duties laid upon you and do not be blinded by any inclination of your own. Had you no children I would not say this, but has any man or woman a right to peril their happiness?"

Faithfully,
SARAH."

George Harding was positively angry at Sarah's letter, angry that she had answered his question, had been able to recall Abbie's words, angry that she had seen intuitively his purpose in writing.

"Her not allowing the engagement is proof enough that she does not love him much; a girl is quite willing to engage herself to one she loves. Meyers is over there tonight. She will be here in the morning and I will chaff her a little. I think I shall be able to learn the truth, she's so ingenuous," said George to himself.

When her rosy face appeared at the door in the morning with a request for Nedlie to take a walk with her, George was just ready to start for his store and so Ned was made ready and each taking a hand of the happy boy they went down the street. "There's Meyers," said George, "I saw him go into your house last evening and rather envied him in my lonely study." She looked up brightly with a pleased smile.

"He's a fine fellow, a favorite with the girls, I believe."

"Yes, Charley is good company; will make some one a nice husband some time." This with a nonchalant air as though he were nothing to her in particular. How the widower's heart danced as he said,

"Why rumor makes him a favorite with you?" "Rumor is often mistaken, you know."

"I'm glad it is in this instance," he rejoined.

She looked suddenly up, the fine eyes of George were searching hers, but with a most adoring expression, not lost upon Abbie, who with a bright blush caught at Ned's hand that he had loosed for a run.

"Here we are at the store and Ned and I must turn about, so goodbye."

"For awhile, only, I hope," he answered as he entered, flinging back a tender smile at her.

Life seemed so bright to him for that morning walk. He said to himself, that girl never could have dissembled so. In speaking of Charlie not a tremor in her voice. All right, I can hope now and I can speak, as I shall, after one more letter to Sarah.

Somehow in all his elation a strange sense of insecurity haunted him.

At night he dispatched this letter to his cousin.

"MY DEAR SARAH: Your letter was a surprise to me, as this may be to you. If, as you say, Abbie loved Charles Meyers it was a girlish attachment, now a thing of the past, for I have seen her since you wrote and spoken of him in a way to draw out her real feelings toward him and I assure you she is changed, without egotism. I may say that the look she bestows on your humble servant warrants the hope that he may win her for a wife as I wish to do. Life is so lonely for me since you left. You seemed to like Abbie, do you not think it best for me to marry and she is so fond of Ned, can do anything with the rogue?"

I must believe her not indifferent to me, also that she has ceased to love Meyers. She could not have dissembled so when we spoke of him. And you know how she can brighten a home, how sweet tempered she is. I want your advice and counsel in this critical stage of affairs. Please give it truly and charitably too.

As ever yours,
GEORGE."

The reply came at once.

"MY DEAR GEORGE: I must write soon. I could not postpone so plain a duty. And first let me assure you that I am not surprised that a lonely young widower, seeing every day a bewitching, sweet-tempered young lady should think he must win her for a mother to his children. So at the start do not believe that I think you 'a sinner above all others.'"

Ah, I could wish you were the only sinner, that the world was not full of just such blinded ones. I say blinded ones because, if otherwise, how could they help seeing that all women, however sweet tempered, after taking a step-mother's place become deceitful, soured, intriguing, a hard word to use, but knowing what I do, too true.

Blinded, that they should for a moment suppose that, much as they may like the father, they will love another woman's children, those children standing between them and the entire love of the man. It is truer, I believe, that the dearer the child to the father the more it is hated by the step-mother, a perfectly natural thing, too, if there can be one natural feeling in such an unnatural relation. I have sometimes thought of the colossal egotism of a man assuming that a woman is glad to take the place of nurse to children, not her own, and be faithful to her trust; that he should think it a favor in him to throw upon her a share of the burdens she is in no way accountable for. There, George, I have stated what will be an unwelcome truth to you, but it is the truth, in all cases, I believe.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR AND MOLES PERMANENTLY REMOVED

ELECTRIC BY THE NEEDLE.

NO PAIN, NO SCARRING, OR OTHER INJURY, AND NO RETURN OF THE HAIR OR MOLES AFTER REMOVAL.

It is the triumph of science.

Electricity is the scientific king of the day, the synonym of progress, and the solution of the wildest dreams of thinking men.

The ancient Greek philosopher declared that there was "one universal force in matter." Modern scholars know that force is to be all-permeating Electricity.

What will this prince of progress not accomplish for mankind?

For the woman whose feminine beauty is marred, and whose features are rendered masculine by a growth of hair or disfigured by moles upon her face, much to the mortification of her friends, and her own personal shame, it has brought release from the bane and curse of her life.

Thanks to Electricity, there need be no more sensitive dreading or public gaze, no more keen sorrowing in secret because she is not as other women, no more bitter shrinking from the pleasures of society, no more hateful using of the razor or tweezers.

I take this means of respectfully inviting the attention of ladies thus afflicted, and their friends, to the fact that I have opened quarters at room 17, Clark building, 492 Main St., Worcester, near the Boston store, where I am prepared with every modern convenience and comfort to do work in this line, assisted by experienced lady operators, on the most reasonable terms possible.

DO NOT FAIL TO READ THE POSITIVE GUARANTEE OF SATISFACTION offered below.

Do not fail to call upon me. A visit to my rooms will cost you nothing, and may prove a life-long blessing.

The success of this method of removing superfluous hair and moles permanently from any part of the body is so universally acknowledged by men of science, that it is only necessary for you to consult your family physician, if he is a well-read man, and up to the times in his profession, and he will unhesitatingly tell you not only that it is beyond all question a success, but also that it is positively the only method known for surely and permanently destroying these obnoxious growths.

But, better still, your own intelligence will tell you that all argument on the subject must close when I say that if you are at all doubtful, you will not be required to place a single dollar in my hands until the work is completed, and a sufficient length of time has elapsed to satisfactorily settle the question of permanency. In other words, it will not be necessary for you to pay for the work until you are perfectly satisfied with it. The method will be carefully, fully and convincingly explained to all who will call at my office.

I have scores of testimonials, but as I never give publicity to the names of my patrons, I do not publish these testimonials here, but have adopted the better plan of placing those who are interested in direct correspondence with those for whom I have done such work, many of whom are easily accessible, personally, to people living in Worcester, and vicinity.

I am just completing work for one of my patrons, from whose face and neck I will have removed, when the work is finished, no less than sixteen thousand hairs. This lady is so grateful for the results accomplished in the permanent removal of this enormous growth of hair, which for years has been the bane of her life, that she has voluntarily consented to see and talk with any one interested, and afflicted as she has been. I have photographs of this lady, showing her as she was, and you can see her as she is. Notwithstanding the immense amount of work accomplished, not a scar can be seen upon her face, which presents precisely the natural appearance of one upon whose face no hair had ever grown. What has been accomplished for her and others, may surely be accomplished for you.

For ladies living out of town, pains will be taken to secure suitable board and lodging, at reasonable rates, when required unrequested. All correspondence carefully and promptly attended to.

The utmost privacy strictly maintained. Office hours, 9 a. m. to 4 p. m. daily.

DR. B. F. LONGSTREET, A. M., Physician and Surgeon,
CLARK BUILDING, 492 MAIN ST., ROOM 17. TAKE ELEVATOR.

If you knew all I suffer in view of what you are sure to bring upon your family, and upon Abbie too, for much as I like her, amiable as she appears, I foresee how all that will go down before the terrible realities of the situation unnatural and unsanctioned as I believe, by God, of step-motherdom.

Have you any security that what seems amiability in her is not merely the result of never being crossed in one desire of her heart? When it comes to self abnegation, a sharing of love with others, when she must of course covet it all, when sleepless nights and wearisome days may be her lot with the family, and she, never used to this, a petted, only child, the idol of her parents, should this happen to her would you not see all the truth that you could never believe before marriage?

I would spare Abbie all this dreadful transformation, spare you all the terrible awakening, your children,—here the tears will flow—the ruin it will be to them. Do you remember Aunt Carrie, whose suicide took place when you boarded with us, but the particulars of which you never knew? nor would you now could I withhold them, in my anxiety for your good. I was the confidant of all her sorrows, before she committed the deed, and I can never forget her anguished face as she told me she had no desire to live, she had utterly failed in trying to love and do her duty by another's children; of their father's treatment through their misrepresentations, that he never could have loved her as he professed to before marriage; that her own little Arthur was actually hated out of his life by them all, and here her eyes blazed with frenzy. Oh, I have so often wished I had told my parents, she might have been saved perhaps taking her life, but she enjoined secrecy from me, said nothing could be done to lighten her lot, so I kept silence, and she perished a victim to an unnatural relative.

Never can I believe in it, never sanction it by word of mine. Evil and only evil can come of it.

You speak of Charles Meyers, believe she has never loved him as she can you. Do you, my dear George, forget that Abbie has nothing to depend upon in case of her father's death? I was told that their house was heavily mortgaged to enable them to eke out a living now, and at his death must be sold leaving them homeless. Do you forget that Charles will have but a pittance out of his father's estate, and that with Abbie's love of dress and social pleasures, with the most he can earn can never support her in the style she wishes. Is it strange that she should prefer your established position and ample means? Ask yourself is it love of you or herself that will prompt her to accede to your proposal?

Oh be wise if it is not too late, save yourself and her, and the dear little ones. Do be warned by your faithful cousin who will give you one more fact that has hitherto been hidden in her heart, her parents only sharing the secret. You will remember the wealthy Mr. H— of our town, a widower with a son and daughter about my own age at that time. This I tell you in confidence, I would spare him and his. That man proposed to me, urged me, young as I was to become a mother to his children, when by age I could but be a companion to them. I at once refused, was deaf to all his protestations of love, etc., and had have never regretted it. I tell you this that you may see that I practice what I preach to others. By every means at my command I entreat you give up this thing. Make your children your all. Our duties are laid upon us by a wise Father. We may shirk them, controlling our own inclinations, but depend upon it, it is at our peril, for this life and the one beyond. Be the brave cousin I wish. Devote yourself to your family and business. What if lonely hours are yours now. Time passes so swiftly that ere you are aware dear Millie will be a young lady, capable of presiding at your home, better than any step-mother, and loving you oh, so much more truly. These are your darkest days. I truly believe. If only you take the advice of one who you have ever called your 'good angel.' Undeserving as I may be of the name, be assured I am your truest friend, and I shall remain so though my advice is not taken. You asked it, I have given it. God grant, not in vain.

Most faithfully,

SARAH.

P. S. Kisses may be for the dear children."

Rev. William True Sleeper.

It is given to some men to plant, to others to water and foster. Clearly, whoever has been the Apollus of Worcester Congregationalism, Mr. Sleeper is its Paul, and God has given a wonderful increase. It is said that names frequently go by contraries, and in this case the rule certainly applies, for in no other way could such a combination of nerve and activity have received his surname. If there ever were an ancestor, so allied to that legendary seven of Ephesus, as to merit the appellation of Sleeper, his Nineteenth Century descendant has completely erased any and all application.

Since his first coming to Worcester, a generation of "articulately speaking men" has departed from the stage of life. There is not another Congregationalist pastor in Worcester who was here then, save Dr. Ebenzer Cutler, then at Union Church, and quite likely his contemporaries there are not living now. In fact his denomination, then, had only the Old South, Central, Salem Square and Union Churches. Great strides have been taken since the early Fifties, and in this advance Mr. Sleeper has borne an important part.

The ancestry of those whom we respect is always interesting and it is pleasant to know that Mr. Sleeper came from one of the "Fat" streaks of New Hampshire. Danbury was his native town and there he was born, Feb 9, 1819, so he is not far away from his seventy third birthday. His parents were Jonathan and Mary (Parker) Sleeper and his early life knew the joys and hardships of New Hampshire rural life. The thirst for knowledge was early developed and his first acquisitions were had at Lebanon, Salisbury and Phillips Exeter Academies. Thence he entered Vermont University in Burlington and was graduated in 1850. Next we find him at the Andover Theological Seminary and he received his diploma in 1853. Ad interim, he had taught for two terms in Sanbornton, N. H. long enough to become acquainted with the lady who afterwards became his wife.

He came to this place in 1853, as City Missionary and here was ordained an evangelist in 1854, June 29. Worcester continued to be his home till 1856. He was the projector, as early as 1853 of the Summer Street Church with which so much of his life has been passed. From 1856 to 1860 he was chaplain at the State Reform School for Boys in Westboro and LIGHT takes pleasure in thinking of the good that those years must have done for the hundreds of unfortunate lads, thus early given to crime.

His next move was a long one, for he went away down to Maine where till 1875 he was a Home missionary in Aroostook County. The work was hard though congenial and there certainly was wilderness enough to be made to bud and blossom. His stations, till 1872, were in Patten, Island Falls and Sherman (Golden Ridge) and for the next three years in Caribou and Fort Fairfield. He built churches in Patten, Sherman and Fort Fairfield and in Sherman, he organized the Congregational Church. His record of church work in Maine is an unbroken one of devotion and success, a glorious extension of the Master's vineyard. He was installed at Sherman, June 16, 1870 and ended his labors there, Jan. 1, 1872, and finished his work at Caribou and Fort Fairfield, April 25, 1875. During these years in Maine he received into the church on confession of faith 140 people and 83 by letter.

Nor was his work entirely spiritual. He was supervisor of schools in Aroostook County in 1868-'71 and he was the chief agent in securing a railroad, running from Caribou to New Brunswick, a distance of 14 miles. He projected the road, raised the funds and was the first president there in 1874. Also he established and edited, in conjunction with his older son, two papers, the Voice at Sherman and the North Star at Caribou. The latter is now published in Presque Isle. The younger Mr. Sleeper says the income from these papers helped to defray his college expenses.

In 1875, May 1, we find our active clergyman again in Worcester and here he has been since. The Summer Street Church and he seem inseparably united. His labors have furnished many members for other churches. He has seen its membership grow from 15 to 200 but the number is much less now, so many preferring other locations. He was instrumental in starting the City Missionary Society in 1878 and under its fostering care, the most of the Congregational advances in this city, since that date, have been made. The very latest venture in which our brother is interested is the Bethany Church in New Worcester. For a little more than a year, the movement has been afoot. In November last, a church was begun and in February, it is expected that the basement will be occupied. Whenever and wherever in Worcester any thing likely to accrue to the good of Congregationalism is projected, there Mr. Sleeper is sure to be found early.

Those terms of teaching in Sanbornton, N. H. introduced him to Miss Emily Elizabeth daughter of James and Eliza (Morrison) Taylor of that place, and Sept. 4, 1853, she became his wife. They have three children. The Rev. Wm. W. Sleeper, the oldest, is a graduate of Amherst and has been a missionary in Bulgaria. For a time he was assistant pastor of Salem Square Church, and is now settled in Stoneham. His wife is Mabel, a daughter of Mr. B. D. Allen of Worcester. Mr. Sleeper's only daughter, May is the wife of F. W. Ruggles of this city. She was graduated at our High School and went thence to Wellesley College. She has much local note as a singer, in fact music is a prominent characteristic in the whole family. The youngest child and second son, is Henry Dike, who went from the Worcester Academy to Harvard and thence to the Hartford Theological School. He was ordained in this city a few weeks since and is now Professor of Music in Beloit College, Wisconsin. While in Harvard he published a valuable collection of college music. Mr. Sleeper, himself, has the poetic faculty and has published several volumes of verses and prose. In 1866, he put out "Walks and Talks" and in 1883, "The Rejected King and Hymns of Jesus, a devotional Book of Poems." His life is one of activity in every respect. The mental, spiritual and physical man are thoroughly in unison, but even the most active must rest. A trip to Florida is in contemplation and thousands of Worcester people wish Mr. and Mrs. Sleeper a deal of pleasure as they contrast semi tropical scenes with those of far away, almost Arctic Aroostook or even more tolerable Worcester.

At the meeting of the Worcester County Horticultural Society next Thursday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock, the question for discussion will be "Hardy Grapes, their cultivation and variety." Mr. G. B. Andrews of Fitchburg will open the discussion with a paper on the subject.

There are many friends in this city who hailed with pleasure the coming of Miss Annie Athy in the play of Hazel Kirke. She has had a long and exacting trip in the South and her coming home is a common gratification to herself and friends. "There's no place like home."

"Funny thing at one of the hospitals last month," said an undertaker. "What was it?" "Oh, a doctor who loves to see his name in print had a long account of a delicate surgical operation he had performed—removing a tumor, I believe. The whole thing was minutely described, and the doctor was praised highly. But no mention was made of the fact that my services were required, for the patient died the next day. Any one reading the item would have supposed that the sufferer had been restored to perfect health.—Cincinnati Times-Star.

A pianist recently spent the evening at the house of a lady. The company was agreeable and he stayed somewhat late. As he rose to take his departure the lady said: "Pray don't go yet, Mr. Jones; I want you to play something for me." "Oh, you must excuse me to night; it is very late, and I should disturb the neighbors." "Never mind the neighbors," answered the young lady quickly; "they poured our dog yesterday."—Musical Courier, Congress should pass a law that postage should be changed but once in twenty-five years; about every postmaster-general has a preference in designs, and before the people have become accustomed to one set, a change is made, and an entire new deal is the consequence. What is wanted is cheap and quick transportation of the mails. The color, or the design, of the stamp for transmission is of no consequence.—Lowell Sunday Critic.

Incog.

There is one noted man in Massachusetts who would have hard work to disguise himself. The birthmark, giving to one side of President Eliot's face a livid red, makes the head of Harvard College a marked man wherever he goes. Only a few days ago, he was on the train from Albany to Boston, and many questions were asked as to his name; even the omniscient conductor was at fault till one who knew volunteered the information that he was carrying the most distinguished college president in America. He will not forget him again, nor does any enquirer have to ask a second time. That face is never forgotten. He couldn't be incog. if he desired to be ever so much.

Oh, Grippe! Grippe! Grippe!

You ruel old torment, creating more ill's
Than our doctors can fight night and day with their pills
You are dread, I've shunned and hated by all
As the cr. eel's cure that man's an ideal
Why tarry you here when we urge you to go
Where your father is calling to you from below
He says that your lurching has long since run out
And begs to know what on our earth you're about
He is weary with waiting and watching for you
For he can't give the t'ing as you used to do
He can keep his fires running that momentary snags,
But you're his "best night" is two's joints out of shape
Ah! yes, we all know from what warm 'ome you came
But I'll not spill my ink by penning its name
If you wish a diploma we'll give it to you
For causing more pain than we'er before knew
Our cars are electric, the best means I know
To take you with speed to regions below

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE.

High School.

Disappointments will happen, the best we can do and one came to those who were looting upon the High School sleighride. Matters were nearly completed for one last week, but the weather is so changeable that they dare not appoint a given day until the weather will allow it.

In addition to the prize offered for the best debates by the Assembly Alumni, there is also another one being considered for the best paper and declaimer for the next two terms.

The Rhetorical Exercises, held in the hall last Tuesday evening were varied a little, in stead of Holmes works alone being read, there were some of Whittier's, Lowell's and Holmes poems on Agassiz read and declaimed by Miss Laird and Masters Colley and Ellinwood.

Mr. Muzzy, the book-keeping teacher, has been ill and unable to attend to school duties for several lessons. We wish him a speedy recovery that he may have ample time to do his 26 weeks' work.

Franz Boas is at work at the school. There seems to be a ready response among the pupils.

Brown.

On Wednesday evening Prin. D. W. Abercrombie was the guest of the Worcester Academy club. The club assembled in Tillingham's parlors and after the refreshments, speeches were made by Ex-Gov. R. C. Taft, Prin. Abercrombie and members of the club.

The Debating Union met and organized last Saturday evening. Constitution and by-laws were adopted and officers chosen. Regular meetings are to be held on alternate Monday evenings.

During the past week the officers have elected leaders for the exhibition drill. This drill is to be a feature of the indoor meet to occur in Infantry Hall sometime during the Winter.

The services of Hugh Duffly, Captain of the Boston Reds, have been secured to train the base ball team. Lovett of the Brooklyn's will have the handling of the pitchers.

On Friday afternoon a most interesting lecture was given by Walter Damosch on "Music." This is the second lecture by this famous musician given under the auspices of the Brown Lecture Association.

Hubert A. Whitman, '95, of this city is at home during a slight illness. "SMILAX."

A BILLION AND A HALF.

The above is estimated to be the amount due to heirs of unclaimed estates in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France and Germany. The heirs are supposed to be chiefly in the United States. Descendants of people who crossed the ocean years ago. You who read this are earnestly requested to correspond with the undersigned, if your people came from across the sea. Remember that a letter to this country requires a five cent stamp. Be sure to write your name and address plainly. Also send 25 cents to pay for postage and correspondence. We charge nothing for investigating—
WILLIAM LORD MOORE, 5, Ingersoll Road, Shepherd's Bush, London, England.

Good to Eat.

Fig Rock.

For this take one cupful of sugar, three-quarters of a cupful of water, and a quarter of a teaspoonful of cream of tartar. Boil till the mixture becomes an amber color, but do not stir during the process; add the cream of tartar just before taking from the fire. Wash the figs, split them in half, and lay them flat on a dish, pour the mixture over them, and let it stand till cold.

Clam Chowder.

For ten people, allow one hundred soft-shell clams, two dozen small potatoes, four onions, one-half pound salt pork, a cupful of milk, about four tablespoonfuls of flour, salt and pepper. Separate the soft part of the clam from the hard and chop the latter very fine; chop fine the pork and onions, peel the potatoes and cut them into slices, mix the flour and milk for thickening. Put a soup-kettle over a good fire, and when it is hot put in the chopped pork; put the onions on top and cover the pot, and let them cook together for a while; put in the potatoes, and then nearly fill the pot with hot water: when the potatoes are almost done, add the clams—the soft parts and the chopped ones; season; cook for a few moments; then add the thickening. If the chowder seems very thick, do not use all the flour and milk; if not thick enough, use more. Be sure and put in enough salt to make it tasty.

Butter Scotch.

Put into a very clean pan one pound and a half of soft sugar, two ounces of butter, half a teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and half a teaspoonful of cold water. Let the whole boil for about ten minutes without stirring, then dip a spoon in cold water, pop it into the pan, and back again with its contents into cold water, when if the mixture hardens it will do. You may add, if you like, a little powdered ginger or vanilla essence just before pouring it out. Mark it into neat squares when it cools a little.

Date Sandwiches. (for School Lunches)

One scant cupful of sugar, one-half cupful of butter, one egg, and one cupful of thin sour cream; add one spoonful of soda and one of vanilla. Flour to roll very thin. Roll out one long sheet. spread with split dates, and cover with another thin sheet of paste. Cut in squares or circles, after pressing well together, and bake in a hot oven. These may be iced, and are very nice. Another way is to roll light bread dough out thin, butter well, spread with dates, and cover, and let them rise until night. Wash the tops with milk before baking.

Stuffed Eggs.

Halve ten hard-boiled eggs; take out the yolks and season, adding minced meat of any kind preferred; fill the eggs, join and put in a dish. Use bread crumbs and milk with the remainder of the mixture: pour over all and bake.

That beautiful glossy sheen, so much admired in hair, can be secured by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. There is nothing better than this preparation for strengthening the scalp and keeping it free from dandruff and itching eruptions.

Cake Keeps Moist and Fresh if made with Cleveland's Baking Powder.

The reason is Cleveland's is a pure cream of tartar powder free from alum and ammonia, which make cake dry and husky.

Of Thomas Arnold, Longfellow said,
"For him the teacher's chair became a throne."

Dr. Souther, Superintendent Marble, Dr. Duggan, Ex-Mayor Jillson, and Rev. Dr. Garver have been appointed a committee to look after a principal for the new English High School.

These gentlemen constitute a sub-committee on the part of the High School Committee, to look after the end named. The new English High School edifice figures in the latest report of the State Police, having in full the Spy's description of it. The place is given thus, on account of the subject of sanitation.

The most beautiful and desirable building mentioned in the book is the new High School building in Plymouth. This town has solved the problem of making a building with all the rooms, save the chemical and physical laboratories upon the first floor. The effect is fine. Plymouth will be a fine place for people with children to educate to live in. First floor elevators must be the rule some time.

Boston's University Club seems to have proved of success. As resident members include those residing within a radius of fifty miles, it looks as though Worcester college men could belong if they chose. Of course, next to being an Englishman, the next most desirable thing is to be from Boston, at least that is the way many feel. Now is their chance to attain their heart's desire and not change their abodes. Does Boston, by this act, annex all the included territory? Of the possible five hundred resident members, there are, already, more than four hundred. "Nothing succeeds like success."

Amherst.

The opening of the Winter term found nearly all the men back, only a few being detained by sickness. During the vacation, however, there was considerable sickness among the townspeople and the students who remained here. The college has settled down to the work of the winter term, which is proverbially the working term of the year. The catalogue for '91-'92 has not yet appeared, and probably will not for a month, owing to extensive changes in the curriculum. The distribution of electives is modified, and more science will probably be required in the Sophomore year.

Among the ten speakers announced for the Lester prize exhibition in oratory for May 11, is Lewis T. Reed, '93. Since the establishment of the prize six years ago Worcester has been represented by graduates of the High School in four of the yearly contests.

Wellsley.

College opened on Thursday, Jan. 7, '92, after a vacation of three weeks. Quite a number of the students, and several of the faculty were still at home, however, detained by their own illness, or that of some of their family. President Shafer was detained by the severe illness of her sister, but she is expected to return this week.

The college has been saddened by the news of the death of Miss Angie Lacey Peck, president of the class of '90. Miss Peck was a woman of rare talents, one of the charter members of Phi Sigma, the founder of the Students' Association, and even in her absence very closely identified with the life of the college.

Prof. Lyon of Harvard has given two lectures before the students of Old Testament history. The first, on Jan. 8, was a most interesting account of the "Babylonian Stories of the Creation and Deluge." The second was a description of the instructive tablets which have been found during the past few years on the banks of the Nile, and which throw so much light upon the customs of the patriarchs.

Sunday, Jan. 10, was really spent in India, at least so it seemed, as we listened to the inspiring address of the Rev. Mr. E. S. Hume, of the Bombay High School, in which he graphically described the progress and condition of India. In the afternoon Mrs. Hume dressed her five year old girl in the costume of the child-brides of India, and in the evening she addressed us upon the condition of the women in India.

Monday evening, Jan. 11, Mr. N. J. Corey gave another of his interpretations of Wagner. He has become quite well known to Wellesley audiences by his lectures on the Niebelungenlied in former years. On this occasion he lectured upon the opera, "Parsifal," illustrating his remarks by stereopticon views and by musical selections.

Through the kindness of Major Pond, we enjoyed a special treat on Wednesday, Jan. 13, in listening to readings by Mr. T. Nelson Page and Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith, from their dialect stories. They also kindly sent complimentary tickets to the Seniors to attend the public reading in Boston, Friday evening.

Thursday evening about forty delegates from the four literary societies accepted an invitation to attend the Harvard-Yale debate at Cambridge.

Examinations began Saturday, Jan. 16, and will last ten days. As the time has come round again, the usual question is raised as to whether the energy spent in this way might not be more profitably spent in class room reviews.

One of the most interesting concerts of the season was given Monday evening, Jan. 18. The artists were Miss Emma S. Howe, soprano; Mr. Wilhelm Heinrich, tenor; Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, harpist; and Dr. Louis Kelterborn, accompanist.

Boston University.

At a recent meeting of the finance committee of the trustees of Boston University it was voted to let the students in the Law School have the use of the Y. M. C. A. Gymnasium on the same terms as the Liberal Arts students; namely, the trustees pay five dollars and the students pay the remaining three dollars of the membership fee.

Prof. Thomas B. Lindsay delivered a lecture on Sanskrit Literature before the Philological Association last week.

At the recent meeting of the trustees of Boston University, Messrs. Melville M. Bigelow, Frank Goodwin, Arthur H. Wellman, and Homer Albers, were appointed full professors of the School of Law.

The Juniors held a class social last week Friday evening.

The College of Liberal Arts buildings are soon to be lighted by electricity. The trustees are making arrangements to have a dynamo placed in one of the buildings.

The Philomathean Society instituted a new feature at its meeting last week by having the annual prize contest in expression. The following students of the College of Liberal Arts were the contestants: Carl T. Taylor, '95; Miss Charlotte E. Joselyn, '92; Miss Myrtle M. Hurditt, '92; H. L. Shepherd, '93; Louis C. Strang, '92; Miss Eleanor Thomas, '93, and Clifford Gregg, '95. Mrs. Mary B. Claffin, the wife of ex-Gov. Claffin, Mrs. Sarah Haright Curry of the School of Expression, and Moses Trueman Brown of the Boston School of Oratory were the judges. The prizes were awarded by Mr. Brown to Miss Joselyn and Mr. Strang.

Polytechnic.

Last Thursday evening the Annual "Half Way Through" Supper of the Middle class was celebrated by Ninety-three. It was a decided departure from all previous affairs of its kind and must have exceeded them in elaborateness. Instead of having the supper served at a hotel, Grange Hall was hired and fitted up for the occasion. Rebboli was the caterer. At 8 p. m., the class to the number of fifty-seven together with Messrs. J. H. Childs, C. T. Tatman and R. H. Hammond, ex-members, gathered about the tables. Rumor had it that the Juniors had planned to kidnap some of the class officers, but every precaution was taken and nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of the evening. The menu cards were very elaborate, made by Geo. C. Whitney of this city. They had an oblong, ragged edge cover upon the front of which was a fancy cut in silver bronze with the title in yellow hand letters, and upon the back a picture of a goat's head, the class mascot. This was tied together on the longer edge by the class colors. Within were four pages, upon the first of which was a picture of an Indian scene, with warriors drawn up in double line and a student running the gauntlet. The student was '93 and the warriors had the faces of members of the Faculty. Other pages were the menu in German, the list of toasts and the list of the class members. The hall was decorated with blue and white bunting, the class mascot, etc.,

After the supper had been disposed of, President Flynn rapped the gathering to order and introduced the toastmaster of the evening. The speeches which followed were replete with witticisms upon school subjects. The respondents and their toasts were: Half Way 'Thro', Charles O. Rogers; The Class Goat, Gumpel Kuwada; Athletics, Leslie P. Strong; Our Fair Friends, Nathan Heald; Past Members, Chas. T. Tatman; The Faculty, William H. Parker. Mr. Kuwada's response was an humorous account of the search for the golden fleece, or the history of the mascot, and caused much laughter. Letters were read from ex-members unable to attend and a poem written for the occasion by a friend and replete with grinds upon the class, was read by Mr. Howe.

After the speaking was finished, chairs were drawn about the platform and for the next hour the members indulged in one continual roar over a minstrel show furnished by the entertainment committee. The line was as follows: Interlocutor, H. L. Phillips; Bones, E. W. Marshall, C. W. D. Dyer; Middle Men, Derby, Metcalf, Andrews, Higgins, Clark and Cleveland. The solos, Polytech Fair, Tarara-boom-dee, Tidings of Comfort and Joy by Dyer and Fly little Children, Fly and Hear dat Bell by Marshall were written for the occasion and were utterly ridiculous. Numerous hits upon the students and Faculty occupied the time between the songs.

After the entertainment, a business meeting was held at which the following officers for the next half-year were elected: President, Nathan Heald; vice president, W. N. Stark; secretary, E. W. Vaill, Jr.; treasurer, W. H. Larkin, Jr. Mr. C. O. Rogers was elected class historian, W. H. Denny, athletic director. At 2 a. m. Friday, amid cheer after cheer the gathering broke up and the members sought their rooms.

The engagement of William I. Thompson of the City Engineer's office and Miss Mary E. Browning of Rutland, is announced.

The committee of Post 10, G. A. R., who had charge of the management of the recent presentation of "The Drummer Boy" tendered a social, last week Friday evening, in Grand Army Hall, to the members of the cast. The company numbered over two hundred, including besides those having "speaking" parts in the drama, the City Guards, the members of Battery B who gave the sabre drill, the High School Glee Club, who sang in the choruses, members of Post 10, Gen. A. A. Goodell Camp 2, Sons of Veterans, and Clara Barton Tent 3, Daughters of Veterans, besides the lady friends of the gentlemen present. Chairman

Charles H. Pinkham called the gathering to order and made a few remarks in which he thanked the members for their efforts toward making the play a success. Then, at once, the line for the grand march was formed, Mr. and Mrs. Pinkham leading and it was followed by an order of nearly twenty dances. Refreshments were served during an intermission. Mr. Pinkham was floor director and was assisted by members of the Post.

Household.

A Song for Mothers.

O, weary mothers, mixing dough,
Don't you wish that food would grow?
You lips would smile, I know, to see
A cookie bush or a pancake tree.

No hurry, or worry, or boiling pot;
No waiting to get the oven hot;
But you could send your child to see
If the pies had baked on the cherry tree.

A beefsteak bush would be quite fine;
If you had plucked from its tender vine;
A sponge cake plant our pet would be,
We'd read and sew 'neath the muffin tree.

—The Household.

Old tablecloths and napkins make the very best glass cloths.

Cool the blood by drinking cold water in which a little pure cream of tartar has been dissolved.

Watery solutions are difficult to mix with vaseline, but this difficulty can be overcome by means of a little castor oil.

Put a teaspoonful of borax in your rinsing water; it will whiten the clothes, and also removes the yellow cast on garments that have been laid aside for two or three years.

For bread that has become chilled or is slow in rising, wring a towel out of water as hot as the hands can bear, and use it as a sub-cover to a dry, warm one, taking care to change it as often as it cools.

The quantity of water in making soup should be in proportion to the quantity of meat used. Allow a quart of water to a pound of meat. In making soup from fresh meat always put it on to cook in cold water. To keep the quantity full up from the teakettle, which should be boiling, so as not to stop your soup boiling.

It was not long ago the fancy of a young mother to mark each piece of the dainty wardrobe made for her first child with white violets. This pretty idea so delighted many mothers who heard of it that now hundreds of babies are born under the shadow of some flower, and women who are not skillful with their needles are delegating the delightful work to needlewomen.

Alabaster figures are cleaned with the following mixture: One ounce of borax and a quart of boiling water. When cool, wash the figures gently, and dry with a silk handkerchief. If badly stained, try a paste of quick lime and water, and let it remain on for a day; then wash off in soap and water. Olive oil occasionally applied with a soft woollen cloth keeps bulb cabinets and ormolu ornaments bright; first clean off all of the dust.

Kitchen Flooring.

In the modern kitchen, carpeting should have no place. It may be painted a light drab or amber, but linoleum is better than paint or oilcloths. Made out of ground cork and linseed oil, it can be had for one dollar per square yard, and its lasting qualities are immense. With an occasional coat of varnish, linoleum will outlast the house itself.

Next Friday the Tatnuck Farmers' Club will hold an all day meeting. This will be the annual meeting.

General Chamberlain.

General Daniel H. Chamberlain, W. H. S. '59, and later of Yale College and still later Governor of South Carolina, now practicing law in New York, is giving a course of lectures on "Constitutional Law," in Cornell University. They are very highly spoken of.

New York Fashions.

The popularity in evening dresses, of corsages cut low and round is doubtless due to the great partiality shown for berthas of lace, chiffon or tulle, chiefly the two first named which in their graceful fall are especially adapted to outlines where sharp angles do not occur. In square or pointed necks, fur trimmings take precedence and for these on evening dresses there is quite a rage. The hands used are invariably narrow and when they outline corsages, a garniture to match is placed on the bottom of the skirt, while in case of combination dresses, where perhaps the front breadths are of brocade, with satin or velvet train, a line of fur runs up the skirt where the two materials join. Lower edges of basques are trimmed to correspond; girdles of fur may give finish, or diagonal, or suspender like bands appear on corsages. Otter is very fashionable and this season, a good deal of ermine is used as an evening trimming, possibly because its black spots harmonize with the prevalent idea of black as a contrast.

Satin Bodices

with skirts of spangled tulle or chiffon are particularly fashionable for young girls and either of those fabrics are liked by matrons as a softening finish about the neck, when heavy costumes of brocade and plain material to match, are worn. Gimpes of the latter are often covered by chiffon or tulle, with very pretty effect and one of the most admired costumes of the season, is a dress furnished by Lord & Taylor, to a society leader, in which the pale yellow gimpes of peau de soie is covered with silver spangled chiffon. The combination is pale blue brocade outlined by silver on a white ground. Peasant waists or corsets are finished by gathered tulle or chiffon placed over silk or satin cut in a point about the neck; square necks are filled in with either of these lovely fabrics, in which case, they often compose puffed sleeves to match or again the sleeve may be of satin or some kindred fabric cut in slashed puffs to show the tulle or chiffon below. A lovely softening effect is also given by tulle or chiffon placed over front breadths or trains of heavy goods. Ribbon also plays quite an important part in finish on evening dresses and a new way, after various elaborations on fronts or skirts, is to bring it to the back, either at the waist, where it hangs in prolonged lengths almost reaching the floor, or to the top of the corsage where with long, floating ends, it forms a survol-moi (follow me) bow. Baby ribbon made into imitation chrysanthemums is also a new trimming placed as may be convenient.

ROSALIND MAY.

The Difference.

'Tis easy to be brave
When the world is on our side
When nothing is to fear,
Careless to hide.

'Tis easy to hope
When all goes well;
When the sky is clear,
Fine weather to foretell.

But to hope when all's despaired,
And be brave when we are scared
That's another thing, my dear!
And will do to tell.

—Anthony Morehead.

FOR THE TOILET

There is no more useful or elegant article than Ayer's Hair Vigor—the most popular and economical hair-restorer in the market. It causes the hair to grow abundantly and retain the beauty and texture of youth; prevents baldness, keeps the troublesome humors of the scalp and keeps it clean, cool and healthy. Both ladies and gentlemen everywhere prefer Ayer's Hair Vigor to any other dressing for the hair. Mrs. Lydia O. E. Pratt writes: "I have used it for some time, and it has cured my dandruff and falling hair, so that I have rapidly becoming bald, but since using the Vigor, my hair is perfectly clear of dandruff, the hair has ceased coming out, and I now have a good growth of the same color as when I was a young woman. I can honestly testify to the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor being superior for curing from dandruff or loss of hair."

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1892.

No. 22

"The night has a thousand eyes,
And the day but one;
Yet the light of the bright world dies
With the setting sun.

"The mind has a thousand eyes,
But the heart but one,
Yet the light of the whole life dies
When love is done."

The trouble with Chill has a decided bearing in impression, when we find our Light Infantry expressing itself ready to go at a moment's warning.

The Infantry of today did not even belong to the infant class, when the Infantry of '61 responded to the call of country, but the same spirit exists.

To the young, the call of War has ever an exciting interest. The blare of trumpets and the flaunting of banners are items to stir the blood not only in youth but in those of older growth. Is it patriotism or is it love of excitement?

At the first shrill bugle note, much of devotion to party disappears and adherence to country comes to the surface. It matters not at whose instance the war began, the flag floats over all and there never was a time when thousands were not ready to sacrifice their all for country, right or wrong.

Chill is a long way off; in another zone, even. While winter clasps us in icy bonds, Chill belies its name and revels in summer heats. Possibly some of the valorous volunteers fancy that the trip to below the Equator would be only a bright summer excursion, but in reality, it would be one along whose backward way only a few would come. Climatic changes would kill more than bullet and bayonet.

Yet no such consideration ever deterred valorous youth from what he considered the way of duty. "The Minstrel Boy to the War has gone," sang Tom Moore, years ago and long before his day and ever since the same was and has been true and thus it will be for ages to come. Not only the Minstrel Boy but all his associates gird on the father's sword and tie themselves away to the fight.

But what is it all about? The papers team with all sorts of matter pertaining to the affair, some that is apropos, more that is not. Chill had a war of her own. The victorious party fancied that the United States had not sufficiently sympathized with the rebellious portion and so wreaked their vengeance on certain American sailors who were at their mercy in a Chilian port. The neglect of the government to atone for this action seems to be the source of the present danger of war.

Our President has not rushed into the matter with unseemly haste, but after proper consideration sends to Congress a message which by its judicious and manly tone conmands the approbation of all parties and brings out the desirable fact that, if necessary, our representatives can, for the nonce, let the American feeling rise above the consideration that they are Democrats or Republicans. All unite in praises of the dignified yet patriotic bearing of the Nation's Executive.

From considerations of war, it is pleasant to turn to those of Peace and to note the fact that Worcester has, at last, her Board of Trade. The moving of Iver Johnson's factory to Fitchburg was, undoubtedly, the cause of the present interest in this organization. Now that it is organized, what can it do? Can it retain works already here? Can it bring new industries to this city? While it has been organizing, the great Washburn & Moen Company has been erecting immense works in Waukegan, Ill., and the very day of its first public meeting, the daily papers contain mention of the proposed moving of the Jerome Wheelock Engine Company to Chicago.

Accordingly, this Board of Trade has work before it, if it would keep it Worcester the first, already, is and if it would add to the city's industries anything new. Palatial quarters will not do all this. There must be a booming of the city's advantages. Such an announcement as southern and western cities are constantly making on much less foundation. The truth about Worcester, properly expressed and judiciously placed, ought to do for her far more than the lying, windy encomiums, so often found in descriptions of other places, have accomplished for them.

The 25th inst. was the birthday of Robert Burns. We are 133 years away from the year of his birth, but some of his words are as freely used today as when, in 1796, he died his early death. Nothing shows the universality of his genius as this constant application of his lines. Our Scotch citizens do well in annually coming together to recite the praises of the Bard of Ayr. From the day when the eloquent Parry charmed his listeners to the latest, when the equally eloquent McCullagh spoke of Scotland's most noted citizen to his sympathizing auditors there has been no year, when Burns' good qualities have not been recalled and his faults overlooked. The glory of Robert Burns extends far beyond the confines of Scotia. The world applauds him.

Reforming the Criminal.

If science teaches anything, it is that character and conduct are the product of heredity and environment. We cannot alter the inheritance of a man arrested on a criminal charge; but we can change his environment, from one of idleness to one of industry, from ignorance to knowledge, from bad to good sanitary surroundings, and we can surround him with a new moral and religious atmosphere. It is absurd to suppose that no change can be effected in him, under right influences, intelligently brought to bear for a sufficient length of time. The question is one of methods and of the right man behind them, as it is in medicine. It would be equally rational to abandon the sick and the wounded to their fate and that in conditions known to be unfavorable to their recovery.—Rev. F. H. Wines.

A Young Man of Push.

The longer we live the stronger grows the conviction that despite the poopooers there is a great deal in "the art of putting things." I have just heard of an incident that illustrates this significant truth in a striking manner.

Twelve years ago a young man came to New York in search of employment and fortune. He carried his own trunk to a lodging house because he could not afford the expense of a hired carrier. His honest face and speech won for him his landlady's consent to a week's living on tick. So far so good. Now then, for the bold plunge. He went down to the offices of the Herald, Times and Tribune and invested his last shilling in an advertisement in these words:

"I want something to do and must have it in twenty-four hours. Address 'Push,' this office." In a little while he had received about three hundred answers to his unique demand for employment. One business man wrote: "Call at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning and I may give you a chance to show how vigorously you can 'push.'"

The tone of that reply pleased the young adventurer, and at the appointed hour he presented himself at the writer's office. The result was a trial engagement, which has continued until this time. Young 'Push' is now the confidential man of the house. His salary is ample, and he lives in one of the prettiest homes in New York, where pretty homes, in a poetic sense of the word, are, as we all know, lamentably scarce. "Push" is his dominant characteristic, and his employer has had ten thousand reasons to congratulate himself on the impulse that led him to reply to that little "ad."—Detroit Free Press.

Boys.

Only a few days ago nine boys in their early teens were before the Police Court for offenses more or less heinous. Is not this a pretty large crop for one day? Why were not these boys in school or learning a trade? Where is the fault? It certainly exists somewhere. There will be more of this before there is less if radical measures are not taken to keep boys busy. Satan and idle hands make a combination as dangerous now as when Watts wrote the couplet.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, JAN. 30, 1892.

LIGHT acknowledges the courtesy of a copy of county treasurer Edward A. Brown's annual report.

Every Worcester man, woman and child should read the Rev. C. M. Lamson's article in the current New England Magazine on Worcester churches. It is right at home.

Mr. Aella Greene, the author of that pleasant novel, John Peters, has recently visited Worcester and placed his book on sale at the store of Putnam, Davis & Co. Anyone who loves his New England, her language and traditions should read John Peters. It should be in all our libraries. Mr. Green is now preparing a sequel to the story. In fact it is in press. Look in at the store and take a glance at the book.

LIGHT is under obligation to Capt. Willard Glazier for a very graphic report on the late expedition to the sources of the Mississippi and regrets its inability to reproduce it in full; but it belongs rather in the pages of a geographical magazine. However the public receives the Captain's theories, there can be no doubt as to his industry and perseverance.

The young ladies of the Old South have organized a class in physical culture in connection with the church. Miss Laughton of Miss Kimball's Home school, is the teacher and from the number who have handed in their names for membership, the class is likely to have a prosperous future. The next meeting will be held Monday evening.

Mr. E. C. A. Becker and wife are rejoicing over the prospect of the indefinite continuance of the Business College, for Master E. C. A. Becker, Jr., is just one month old today.

Mrs. S. D. Davenport gave a card party in honor of her guest, Miss Manning of Boston, Thursday evening.

Mrs. Conrad's Father.

It is a sad error that calls Dr. A. Z. Con and wife to Lerrick, Me. Last Sunday, in the midst of Mr. Conrad's sermon, Mrs. Conrad received a dispatch announcing her father, Mr. Clark's sudden death, at the age of 75 years. Mr. and Mrs. Conrad left for Maine, Monday morning.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Jan. 30, 1892.

Answers to Quotations, Jan. 16.

1. Webster, Supposed Speech of John Adams.
2. Sumner, Dying words to Judge Rockwood Hoar.
3. Pope, "Essay on Man."
4. Bryant, "The Death of the Flowers."
5. Burns, "Bannockburn."
6. Longfellow, "Psalm of Life."

Correct answers were received in the following order, Lewis T. Reed, Amherst; E. F. Woodberry, Worcester; Helen Lovell, Medfield; Charles E. Burbank, Amherst; Gertrude Gates, Worcester. On the principle of "First come, first served," the books go to the first two names.

The second social of Worcester Assembly, No. 1, Non-Secret Endowment Order, took place at Arcadium Hall, last week Thursday evening, in the form of a bon-bon party. About 50 couples were present. F. E. Williamson, E. H. Franklin and Miss Etta M. Stone were in charge of the floor. The next social will be a pink party, Friday evening, Feb. 12.

Y. M. C. A.

The second entertainment in the second series of the Association course was given by Eli Perkins (Melville D. Langdon) who, with a master's skill, lectured entertainingly on "Wit, Humor, Pathos, Ridicule and Satire." He gave clear definitions of each and then illustrated them with exceedingly amusing stories, making them still funnier by his peculiar mannerisms. The next entertainment in the course will be a concert by the Tufts College Glee and Banjo Clubs, assisted by John Burgess Weeks, reader. The date is February 11.

The Park Church Endeavor Society will observe the Christian Endeavor anniversary tomorrow evening at 5 o'clock with appropriate exercises which will take the place of both the young peoples' prayer meeting and of the evening church service. There will be addresses on temperance work, missionary work, the prayer meeting and the society itself and its relation to the church. There will be recitations, responsive readings and music, besides a brief consecration service.

The Local Union will observe the eleventh anniversary of Christian Endeavor with a special meeting at the Church of Christ next Tuesday evening. There will be an unusually interesting program, but as it has not been completed at the time of writing, no announcement can be made. There will be the usual contest for the banner. The meetings arranged for future dates are at Piedmont Church in March, at Belmont Church in May, at Lake View Church in June.

Mrs. Kinnicut.

The funeral of the wife of Dr. Leonard P. Kinnicut was held, Monday last at her late residence, 77 Elm Street at 2 p.m. The services were conducted by Dr. A. H. Vinton of All Saints and Dr. Edward H. Hall, late of the 1st Unitarian Church. The burial was in Rural Cemetery. A large number of sympathizing friends attended.

Mr. Ben T. Hammond will give his 51st and 52d vocal recitals next Thursday and Friday evenings at 8 o'clock, at his studio, 452 Main Street. Those who will take part for the first evening are Miss Kate J. Mathews, Miss Julie M. Jones, Miss Marian L. Jenkins, Miss N. L. B. McGaffey, Miss Cordelle Quessy of Fitchburg, Mr. Wm. H. Arthur, Mr. Harry C. Robinson.

Friday evening the vocalists will be Mrs. Evelyn Johnson of Webster, Miss Jessie L. Pond, Miss Agnes Mannix, Miss Genevieve Burke, Miss Bertha L. Fletcher of West Boylston, Mr. Gustav Hall, Mr. Addison McGaffey. The 53d and 54th will take place February 18 and 19.

A Veteran.

Post 10 is again in mourning. William P. Hall, a veteran of Co. E. of the 21st, has gone home. He died at his residence, 23 Prospect Street, Monday. He was buried from his late home, Wednesday at 2 p.m. So the line proceeds to the final muster out.

Encampment 83, Union Veteran Legion, will hold a bazaar in Horticultural Hall next week Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. The object is to raise money for the relief fund to assist old soldiers needing aid, or their widows or orphans. Post 10 band will play each evening and Gen. J. E. Palmer, the national commander, will be here at the opening of the fair.

An envelope social under the auspices of Ladies Benevolent Society was held at Plymouth vestry Tuesday evening. Supper was served, after which envelopes with pertinent mottoes were opened, the contents amounting to $119, netting $150 in all.

Kneisel—Nikisch.

The Woman's Club, as it always does, scored a big triumph in bringing this combination to Worcester. Association Hall was a bright scene, on Wednesday afternoon, with its array of people gathered to listen to an excellent music as ever greeted an audience in this city.

"Christian Endeavor."

The whole name of this organization is a long one, viz., Young Peoples' Society of Christian Endeavor but until its initials Y. P. S. C. E. become as easily used as Y. M. C. A. or Y. W. C. A., it is probable that most people will refer to it as this article is headed. In fact in the slack ways of every day speech, it is not unusual now to hear it called the "Christian 'deavor' Society, but whatever the name it is addressed by it has become a mighty engine for good in this country of ours.

Next Tuesday it will be just eleven years years old and already it numbers more than 1,000,000 members. An average growth of about 100,000 a year is not, probably, equalled by any other like body in the world.

The Society had its origin "Away down in Maine." The Williston Church of Portland was the parent body and the Rev. Francis E. Clark was the pastor of that parish. Today, many people love to refer to him, now the Editor of the Golden Rule, as "Father Endeavor" Clarke, claiming that his middle letter is thus significant. In no other way could so venerable a term as "father" be applied to him for he is still on the uphill side of life.

Beginning Feb. 2, 1881, in Portland the applicability of the organization was so apparent that its growth was immediate and startling, and seemed to be by Geometrical Progression. The following figures for each successive year up to the July meeting of 1891 in Minneapolis are significant.

1882, 421.
1883, 2,870.
1884, 8,905.
1885, 10,964.
1886, 50,000.
1887, 140,000.
1888, 300,000.
1889, 500,000.
1890, 660,000.
1891, 1,008,980.

So far as members go, this list leaves very little to be desired. It is a remarkable showing. Societies exist in every state and territory, including Alaska. The Canadian Provinces have nearly a thousand and in foreign lands they are found in England, Ireland, Scotland, Spain, China, Japan, Turkey, Africa, Australia, India, Samoa, Bermuda, Mexico, West Indies and the Micronesian Islands. In these foreign fields there are 284 societies.

And what is it all? Simply a massing and utilizing of youthful energy, long recognized but never before economized. Though it may be called Congregational in many respects, it is by no means, denominational. In fact, at the latest convention, the Presbyterians led with 4,019 societies. Then came the Congregationalists, with 3,545; the Baptists, 2,381; Methodists, 2,268; Christian Disciples, 801. Every evangelical church is represented. The prominence of the Methodists, here, is noteworthy, when it is remembered that they have, besides, their own Epworth League, a similar organization, with nearly half a million members.

For some time, Massachusetts led the nation in the number of societies, but she now ranks fifth, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois leading her in the order named. The Empire State has 2,354 societies and the Old Bay State 918.

Membership is of three classes, Active, Associate and Affiliated. Active members must be professed Christians, Associate must hold religion in respect and, as a rule, they are those supposed to be walking in the right way, while Affiliated members are people rather beyond the years of active participation in young people's work. "Essential features are pledged and constant attendance by the members on the weekly prayer-meetings, participation in the exercises of those meetings by every active member."

They also have "Consecration meetings" with a roll call and a response from every member. It is no association of shirks and laggards but of bright active leagues and a brave warfare they are waging. Note the following from the constitution. It is devoted to the "training of young converts for the duties of church membership; to promote an earnest Christian life among their members, to increase their mutual acquaintance, and to make them more useful in the service of God."

Each society is in a measure independent, though, as in Worcester, there are several united in a union for common good. The general convention, held annually, is scarcely more than a grand mass meeting. The Golden Rule of Boston is the accepted organ of the Society.

The Local Union.

The Christian Endeavor spirit reached Worcester within a year or two after its inception by Rev. Mr. Clark and several experimental societies were formed. The first permanent organization was that of the young people of the Old South Church in 1884. Following closely, however, came organizations in Union and Salem Street Churches, during the same year, in the Pleasant Street Baptist and Dewey Street Baptist in 1885 and in the Pilgrim and Summer Street Churches in 1886.

In September, 1887, a call was issued for a meeting of representatives of each society, to consider the advisability of forming a Local Union. The meeting was held in the old Pleasant Street Baptist Church Sept. 13 and consisted of the following delegates: Pilgrim Church, May G. Covell, B. F. Joslin, Jr., F. H. Ball; Dewey Street Church, F. G. Estabrook, C. C. Moore, Mary E. Chamberlain; Summer Street Church, C. E. L. Briggs, H. W. Clifford, John Martin; Houghton Street Church, C. E. Slocumb, Jr., H. L. White, A. D. Stone; Old South Church, C. D. Nye, Geo. K. Bliss, Miss Emma Gates; Union Church, Rev. W. V. W. Davis, Etta A. Fogg, Warren W. Greene; Pleasant Street Baptist Church, C. H. Daland, J. H. Lingley, A. D. Flinn; Salem Street Church, Dwight Goddard, Mary O. Whittemore, Charles D. Parker. The result of this and the following meetings was an organization and adoption of a constitution and at the first regular meeting, held in Association Hall, October 10, officers were elected as follows: President, Rev. W. V. W. Davis; vice-presidents, the presidents of the individual societies; recording secretary, Mrs. S. H. Moulton; corresponding secretary, Warren W. Greene; treasurer, Miss May Sleeper. The object of the Union, as stated in the constitution, "shall be to stimulate the enthusiasm of its members, to promote their efficiency in Christian life and church work and to bring them into closer relations with each other and with Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour," or in other words, the Union shall be to the societies what the societies are to their members. To accomplish the desired object, bi-monthly meetings are held at the different churches, at which methods of work are explained and discussed and devotional services and sociables are held. The Union has, however, no authority over the individual societies.

An idea of the growth of Christian Endeavor in Worcester and its neighboring towns may be gained from the following summary of each year's work.

At the end of the first year the number of societies had increased to sixteen, the new ones being in the Park, Shrewsbury Congregational, the First Baptist, the Plymouth, the Central, the Main Street Baptist and the Jeffersonville churches.

For the year ending in November, '89, the officers were: President, George F. Brooks; secretary, Miss Emily K. Mellen; corresponding secretary, Charles D. Parker; treasurer, Miss M. Sturtevant. During the year two societies, Piedmont and Church of Christ, were added and at the close the total membership of all the societies was 829 active members and 100 associate.

The officers during the year ending in November, 1890, were: President, C. L. Shaw of the Salem Street Society; recording secretary, Miss Grace R. Everett of the Pleasant Street Baptist Society; corresponding secretary, Horatio Miller of the Piedmont Society; treasurer, Miss Emma Plympton of the Pilgrim Society. Under the leadership of these officers the number of societies was increased to 21 and at the close of the year the total membership of the societies was 975 active members, 254 associate and 60 honorary.

The next year was one of great activity. Eight new societies joined the Union and the total membership was increased to 1745, a gain of 50 per cent during the year. The membership was divided as follows: Active, 1377; associate, 368. The officers for this year were Dennison B. Tucker of Pilgrim Church, president; Miss Carrie L. Thompson of the Pleasant Street Baptist, recording secretary; Charles D. Nye of the Old South, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Charles H. Burnham of the Church of Christ, treasurer.

The Union is now in its fifth year and the officers at present are D. B. Tucker, president; corresponding secretary, Charles D. Nye, to be a permanent officer; recording secretary, Mrs. F. H. Sampson; treasurer, H. H. Roach. The present standing of each society is shown by the following statistics collected January 15 by the corresponding secretary.

Old South.—Active members, 85; associate, 15; president, E. Roscoe McAlfee.

Baptist, Millbury.—Active, 37; associate, 11; president, Mrs. L. M. Waterman.

Leicester Cong.—Active, 44; associate, 22; president, Miss Claribel Moulton.

Paxton.—No report.

Summarized, the above statistics are as follows: Number of societies, 30; number of active members, about 1,350; associate members nearly 400; total membership, over 1,700.

Besides the bi-monthly meetings of the Union, there have been held two other gatherings which are especially worthy of mention, the state convention, held in Plymouth Church during Rev. Dr. W. V. W. Davis' presidency and the county convention held in the Old South and Main Street Baptist Churches April 30 and May 1, 1891. While these were not exactly Union meetings, it was the work of the Union that made them the success that they were. The latter was the largest county convention ever held in New England, there being 951 registered delegates in attendance. The best previous record was 631, made by the Middlesex County convention. This convention was one of the leading factors in bringing about the great gains of last year. It also drew the attention of the United Society to the Worcester Union and the local Endeavorers were given the honor of naming a speaker for the national convention, held in Minneapolis last July. Rev. I. J. Lansing was the choice of the Union and he very ably represented it.

Within the past year or two the Union has begun to exert an influence for good outside of strictly Endeavor work. Its representatives appeared before the board of aldermen last May, asking that the surroundings of Lake Quinsigamond might be kept free from the liquor traffic and their request was granted. Encouraged by this success, the idea was broached at one of the executive committee meetings of trying to carry the city for license in the approaching election. An organization was founded consisting of the members of the temperance committees of the Endeavor Societies and of the Epworth Leagues, which had been invited to join in the good work, and Mr. D. B. Tucker, the president of the Union, was elected president. The result, everybody knows, the city went "no."

The Union was never more alive than at the present moment and gives promise of continued and increased work "For Christ and the Church."

The Union's President.

Mr. Tucker is now serving his second term as president of the Union, being re-elected at the annual meeting held at Park Church in October. He has entered heartily into the work and, while it would be untrue to say that he is wholly responsible for the wonderful increase in numbers and in interest in the Union since he became its president, nor would he have it so said, it is certain that his energetic leadership has been a very powerful agent in bringing about the splendid results. Evidently the Union fully comprehends this for he was unanimously and enthusiastically re-elected at the expiration of his first term.

Mr. Tucker began life in Norwich, Conn., July 25, 1860, and his full name is Dennison Baldwin Tucker. He went through the grammar schools of Norwich and the four years' course of the Norwich Free Academy from which he was graduated in 1879, being valedictorian of his class at the graduation exercises. He entered Yale University the following September and graduated in June, '83. While in college he was interested in athletics, being coxswain of the Varsity crew one year and of his class crew during the entire four years. The crews which he steered were almost always winners, the record being nine victories out of eleven races.

In getting his education, Mr. Tucker's aim had been to become a physician, but he found, when he had completed his University course, that his financial resources were not sufficient to allow him to spend the necessary three years in study in the medical school, so he came to Worcester in 1883 and entered the employ of the State Mutual Life Assurance Company. Here he remained until January, 1885, when he went to Texas, where he spent the year on a sheep ranch. Returning to Worcester in December, '85, he went to work in the office of G. S. and A. J. Howe, paint and oil dealers on Foster Street. A year and a half later he went into the employ of the Hopville Manufacturing Company, of which his brother-in-law was a prominent member, where he remained a short time, when he was offered the superintendency of a mill in Sutton and accepted the offer. Business becoming dull in 1890, he returned to Worcester and to the office of the State Mutual Life Assurance Company where he is now.

Mr. Tucker is married, his wife being Mrs. Lillian Lynde, whose maiden name was Lillian Ross. Maine was her native state. Their home is at 986 Main Street.

Mr. Tucker joined the church when he was sixteen years old, but he did not become actively interested in Christian Endeavor until he joined the Pilgrim society in 1887. He served that society as president for two terms and was elected president of the Local Union in October, 1890.

Such is, briefly, the history of the part Worcester's young people are taking in this great movement. The future would be difficult to foretell, but, from the nature of the organization, there certainly will be no less work done and the results will surely not diminished.

The Price of Postage Stamps.

A man went into the post office of a neighboring town recently and told the postmaster that he desired thirteen two cent stamps for a cent and a quarter. The postmaster refused to give them to him, stating that the cost would be 26 cents. The man persisted in getting his order, claiming that he could get them at any office for that amount, and even threatened the government official if he continued to refuse him. Finally the postmaster ordered him out, but the man none daunted, took a cent and a 25 cent piece from his pocket, and laying them down on the counter he received his stamps for his cent and a quarter. The postmaster was a little discomfited for a while, but now enjoys the joke as well as anyone.—The Cause.

Pipers at Lucknow.

The discussion began many months ago in England about the Jessie Brown legend and the relief of Lucknow has not ended yet, and the defenders of the story have just scored a strong point. It was a cruel blow to them when some military man, high in authority, declared that Jessie Brown, if there ever was such a person, could not have heard the "pipes," as the Highlanders on that occasion did not have any to play, having left their instruments at Cawbore. This statement, at all events, is disproved by a letter from Pipe-Major McKellar, who led the six pipers of the Seventy-eighth Highlanders in that eventful march.

He says they played at every opportunity, "but after crossing the Char Bagh Bridge we could not play, as Deputy Inspector General Jee truly says 'owing to the fire of the enemy from loopholed houses,' field-guns all round us, roads cut up to impede our progress, and every house a fortification. Out of six pipers two were wounded that day—one died (Brown) in the residency, the other (Josh Hendry) had his leg amputated, and, when last heard of, was about Newcastle-on-Tyne. We played a few tunes to cheer our countrywomen and children the night we entered the garrison." That the pipes were played seems to be established beyond dispute. The only questions now are whether Jessie Brown ever existed, and, if so, whether she heard them.

Laughing Water Restored.

We cannot account for it. In fact, we have given up trying to account for it. Neither the dry air nor the rivalry with St. Paul is sufficient, and we know of no other explanation even worthy of consideration. We refer, of course, to the extraordinary display of genius by the people of Minneapolis, which is constantly being made. Only four short days ago we printed an account of how Mr. Thomas G. Weatherlow, the venerable capitalist and philanthropist, erected a bank building on the plan of a wire rat-trap, baited it with $300,000 in cash, and caught every burglar in town; and now comes another story, which, though it may not exhibit the real depth of genius displayed by Mr. Weatherlow, implicates more persons, and shows that the same subtlety of mind extends everywhere in the city.

As the reader may very likely know, the Falls of Minnehaha have for some years been included in the geographical limits of Minneapolis. St. Paul tried to get them, but Minneapolis was too quick for her. Of course we need not refer to the fact that Mr. Longfellow, in his staccato poem of "Hiawatha," refers frequently to Minnehaha. The noble red man had much to do with the falls in an early day, though he never used them in the way which they would have doubtless been the most beneficial to him, namely, as a shower-bath. Formerly the romantic Falls of Minnehaha consisted of a twelve inch stream of water. Later it shrank to six inches, and finally to less than two inches, the stream being little bigger than that discharged by a garden hose. This robbed Minnehaha of much of its beauty. People took visitors there to see the falls, and frequently found no water at all. It was humiliating to be obliged to explain that a cow was probably drinking somewhere upstream.

Then, perhaps, a party of small boys would scare the cow away and plunge in for a swim in some deep pool and raise the torrent going over the falls to a four inch stream. A wide-awake hotel proprietor in the neighborhood hired a man to pump water from a well into the stream a few rods above the falls whenever he saw visitors coming, but a neighboring beer saloon had potent charms for the man, and his pumping was irregular and uncertain. Besides, the pump squeaked and only discharged water while the handle was being forced down, which made the falls appear to stop over again, and so on. A Boston young lady who tried to read "Hiawatha" at the foot of the falls found it most unsatisfactory. "The action of Minnehaha," she wrote to her friends, "is peculiar. Two quarts of water come over every ten seconds. I think that Longfellow must have got the hint of his metre from the falls themselves."

Finally last week the Minneapolis city council took up the matter. It was brought forward by Alderman O'Flynn of the second ward, who spoke feelingly of the decadence of the "noble Falls of Minnehaha, discovered by the early explorer Longfellow," and moved that some action be taken to restore them to their former beauty and grandeur. Remarks were made by Aldermen Rafferty, Oleson, Murphy, Bjorkson, O'Grady and Lindquistson, and various plans will be presented. It was finally decided to turn a six inch stream from the city water mains into Minnehaha creek, one-half mile above the falls, the same to run between the hours of 8 a.m. and 9 p.m., and the city engineer was empowered to carry out the plans. The work was soon completed and there was a grand opening of Minnehaha Falls on the afternoon of the Fourth. There were two brass bands present, and Alderman Moriarty read the Declaration of Independence, after which Alderman Bogstieson recited portions of "Hiawatha" in a clear, sagalike voice.

The stream was strong and steady, and was pronounced very romantic. Visitors cannot now fail to be pleased. Tourists are requested to bear in mind that the Falls of Minnehaha are now in operation daily, and that they were not shut down for the Winter till Dec. 1. Copies of "Hiawatha" bound in birch-bark for sale on the grounds. By a skillful plan of the city engineer soap is also introduced along with the hydrant water, making the falls foam luxuriantly.

The idea that Americans are careless of natural scenery is not always justified by the facts. It is true that Niagara is defaced by hackmen, and so forth, but here is Minnehaha restored to more than its former beauty. The country owes a debt of gratitude to the intelligent city council of Minneapolis.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Poultry Show.

"'Twas not 'Chanticleer's Muffled Crow'" that saluted the ears of visitors in Mechanics' Hall, last Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, but the bird's voice in full tone and his name was legion. From the smallest Bantam to the largest Cochins their notes were loud and clear. What a sight! Every poultry fancier said repeatedly as he walked about, "This is grand." The management has every reason to congratulate itself on the character of the exhibition. There were pigeons of every color and kind; but for the genuine tumble over backward, there was nothing that approached Dr. Howland's exhibit. Only long care and culture could breed such birds as his. Then the incubators! A crowd constantly surrounded them, ever eager to witness the strange problem of the egg and the life producing. Many an Easter was witnessed and applauded.

The beautiful deers, pheasants and wonder-ful ostriches had their crowds of admirers. "What a neck for a drink" was the thought of many as they looked at the desert bird's long throat. Angora rabbits, Russian rats and Guinea pigs were seen with admiring eyes by many folks, little and big. But the chief items of the show, the fowls, were never equalled in this city. Plymouth Rocks, Wyandotts, Cochins, Bantam, Polands, Game and so on through the whole round, so well known to the initiated, the display was first class in every respect. A glorious sight!

The concert and ball of Iroquois Tribe of Red Men, in Mechanics Hall Tuesday evening, February 9, in honor of its ninth anniversary will be a big affair. Brigham's orchestra of Marlboro will furnish the music for both the concert and dance.

At the rooms of the School of Speech Thursday evening an entertainment was given for the benefit of Miss Angie Parker. The program was a long one and included readings by Miss Angie Parker, Miss Lulu Isaacs and Miss Gertrude Trinder; songs by Miss Nellie Lange and Mr. Hendrich; piano duet by Misses Sadie Parsons and Mabel Cleveland; dancing by Miss May Mellor and Miss Effie Adams; violin solo by Miss Minnie Crane; and cornet solo by Mr. McCauley.

The Emmet Guards have nearly completed all the arrangements for their ball which is to be held in Mechanics Hall, February 26. Battery B band and orchestra will supply the music, the French Syndicate will decorate the hall and W. J. Estey will serve the supper in Washburn Hall. There will be a concert from eight to nine o'clock and one half hour later the grand march will be formed. Then will follow an order of dance with 24 numbers.

Longfellow's Dream.

Considering that the whole affair was arranged in two weeks, "Longfellow's Dream," given last week Friday evening in Mechanics Hall under the auspices of the All Souls Universalist Church, was a very remarkable performance. Not the least of the difficulties to be overcome was the filling of the 175 parts, as the grip seized quite a number of those who were expecting to represent some of the characters. But the universal verdict of everybody after the production was one of praise. Nearly all the parts were satisfactorily taken and many of them were unusually good. The singing was at times very poor and on several occasions marred the effect of good tableaux.

The "Dream" is divided into four parts, in which the youth Longfellow sees pass before him his future creations. In dream one there are visions of childhood, fairies, earthly and celestial choirs, the poet being five years old. Dream two is weird, fantastic, romantic and classic, with glimpses of American brides and picturesque gypsies. The poet is ten years old. Dream three is sylvan, tragic and humorous and the poet is fifteen. Dream four is sublime, historical, allegorical, Biblical, national patriotic and the poet is twenty. Then follows an interlude, representing the visit of the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon and the grand finale in which Longfellow is surrounded by his ideal men and women.

Rev. F. A. Gray read the intervening descriptive parts, Miss Gertrude March was the pianist and Mr. C. F. Hanson, the musical director. The hall was well filled.

LIGHT announced last week that the members of the Church of the Unity would have a dance in Salisbury Hall, either Wednesday or Thursday evening and guests were the intention at the time, but later both the place and time were changed and the affair was held in Colonial Hall Tuesday evening. The patronesses were Mrs. Cyrus G. Wood, Mrs. Wm. A. Williams, Mrs. John H. Jewett, Mrs. Oscar F. Rawson, Miss L. Allen and Mrs. Friedland C. Thayer. The guests were introduced by the following gentlemen, who acted as usher: Col. Rockwood Hoar, Mr. Waldo Simpson, Capt. H. B. Fairbanks, Mr. Charles M. Thayer and Mr. George S. Taft. The arrangements were in charge of the following committee: Mr. Edward D. Stoddard, chairman; Mr. John H. Jewett, Mr. Charles M. Thayer, Col. Theodore S. Johnson and Mr. Charles A. Waite.

The Christian Man.

In writing upon the Christian man, it is my intention to speak from the true meaning of the word Christian, and not from the corrupted use of the word as it is generally taken. It is generally understood that if a man is a member of some evangelical church, that he is a Christian. This is a false idea. A man may belong to a church and not be a Christian, and I have no doubt but what there are men outside of any church who are Christians; but all Christians ought to unite with the church.

A man comes into our city, joins a church, may be regular attendant at that church, and, on Sunday, if we should see him, we should find him praising God and worshipping in his regular place. Consequently we think that he is a good and pious man. During the week, we have occasion to transact business with him, and of every opportunity that presents itself, where he can take the advantage of you, whether it be by fair or foul means, he avails himself. He argues that it makes no difference how he gains his money, because in business all things are lawful. For instance, if he buys a quantity of cotton, and, on its arrival, finds that it is damaged, he at once covers up the injured part, and sells it as the best of cotton. I could name other instances that happen every day, where men who claim to be Christians, do things that are not Christ-like. Some, who have apples to sell, put the largest and best ones on the top and bottom of the barrel, and fill up the center with poor ones, so when a customer opens the top or the bottom of the barrel, he finds nothing but good fruit, but when, in course of time, he reaches the center, he finds a different state of things. The man, who sells the fruit, little thinks that the barrel of apples represents himself as he is, appearing honest and good on the outside, while within, his heart is filled with sin. The Scriptures say, "By their fruits ye shall know them." In many parts of the United States there are men who have never seen a banana nor an orange tree, but who are very familiar with their fruits. Suppose then, that these men should be placed where they could see the banana and the orange growing on their mother trees, would they not, at once, say, "This is an orange tree; or this is a banana tree?" Certainly, for they tell the tree by its fruit.

Likewise with man, if he is doing good things, if he helps his neighbor, or in other words, if he loves the Lord with all of his heart, and his neighbor as himself, people will at once put him down as a Christian. We could not take an intelligent man into an orchard and point to a tree that was covered with apples and make him believe that it was a pear tree. He would at once argue this way, "If this were a pear tree, it would have pears upon it, and as long as apples grow upon a tree it must be an apple tree."

So again, we cannot tell the people that a certain man is a Christian, and make them believe it, unless the man bears the fruits of a Christian. What does the name Christian mean? It means, one who is Christ-like, or one who patterns after the life and teachings of Christ. Could a man be a Christian before Christ came to this earth and died for man? No more than a man could be a citizen of the United States before there was a United States. To be a member of an organization, we must have the organization and then when we have complied with its requirements for admission we become members, or if we desire to imitate a man's life, the man must first have had his existence, then we can pattern after. So Christ must first have had life, before men could become Christ-like or Christians.

If a man should come to you, and I say that he was an American, and you desired proof for his assertion, you would at once ask him, "Where were you born?" And if he said, "In England," you would then ask him, "Have you been naturalized?" If he said, "No," you would at once say that he was not an American. Why? Because he had not complied with the requirements of the law, which make him such and unless he becomes naturalized he remains a foreigner as long as he lives.

A man cannot be a Mason, an Odd Fellow, a Red Man, or a member of any secret organization until he has taken the oath of allegiance to that society, and promise to stand by it as long as life exists.

Is it then unreasonable for Christ to demand that men should go through some form to join the greatest organization on earth? Certainly not. He has laid down the conditions of admission, and if we desire to be members we must submit to his authority and obey his commandments.

If we are Americans will we not stand up for our government? If we are true to our government, will we not do all in our power to keep it pure, and do nothing to bring a reproach upon it? Certainly, unless we are faithful to our government we are not true Americans.

Likewise if a man who has stepped out on the side of Christ be not true to his government, if he does contrary to the will of Christ, if he steals, if he cheats his neighbor, if he takes undue advantage of those around him, if, to sum it all up, he does not love his neighbor as himself, and does not bear the fruits of the spirit of Christ, he is not a Christian. He is not Christ-like.

But men say "There are men who belong to churches who are servants of God one day and the servants of Satan the rest of the week." This cannot be, for a man cannot serve two masters, he must be on one side or the other; and if he is constantly serving Satan he is not a Christian, for a man to be a Christian must be a constant server of Christ. Christians may make mistakes, but not intentionally. I draw this essay to a close by making the statement that I commenced with, "By their fruits, ye shall know them." If you would be known as a Christian, let your fruits be those of a Christian.

Curious Corner.

Australian Bushrangers

The bushrangers of Australia are now extinct. They were highwaymen, whom the love of adventure, quite as much as the desire for gold, allured to the life of outlaws. A writer in the Fortnightly Review describes some of them as gifted with courage and invention worthy of a better calling.

A small and of bushrangers in Victoria manufactured for themselves out of scythes and ploughs and old iron complete suits of armor. Each suit was so heavy that Goliath himself might have fainted under its weight, but on the brilliant frame of the bushranger it seemed light, and it served its purpose. Several of these suits are in existence, bearing marks of inefficient pistol shots.

Two bushrangers once laid a whole town under contribution. They forced banks and shops to pay liberally for the privilege of resuming business. Some of them were as suspicious as Italian brigands, who kneel beside a wayside cross, and ask for much booty and little trouble.

Once a bushranger gave his victim the usual alternative of his money or his life. When the victim declined to "hand over," the robber knelt down and prayed that it might be put in the traveller's heart to give up all that he had, and to save the bushranger the necessity of shooting him.

Marvellous Gold Leaf.

The gold beaters of Berlin, at the Paris exposition, showed gold leaves so thin that it would require 282,000 to produce the thickness of a single inch, yet each leaf is so perfect and free from holes as to be impervious by the strongest electric light. If these leaves were bound in book form it would take 15,000 to fill the space of ten common book leaves.

Elephant Remains.

"There are so many strange things in Alaska," said the discoverer of the Muir glacier, in a recent interview, "that have not come to the knowledge of the public, that one who has seen them hesitates where to begin. Elephant remains are found all over the great valley of the Yukon. As a matter of fact they are found everywhere throughout the great western slope of Alaska.

Dana and Sir Charles Lyell startled the world by announcing that hairy frozen elephants were found wedged among the Siberian icebergs, but scarcely anybody knows that throughout Alaska are the remains of countless thousands of mastodons. You can dig them out and find them on the surface everywhere. So thick are the elephant remains that the native Indians, on finding them buried partially in the ground, decided they were some kind of great moat that burrows in the soil.

The collecting of elephant tusks every Summer is a regular business in Siberia just over Behring Sea. They are just as many of them on the Alaska side as there ever was in Siberia. Ages ago great herds of elephants roamed over these shores. Perhaps they existed down to a comparatively recent date, too, for the hairy bodies and well-preserved bones were evidences of that."

Vick's Floral Guide, 1892. True and tried friends are always welcome, consequently "Vick's Floral Guide" is sure of a warm reception, especially when dressed as daintily as this year. The "Nellie Lewis" Carnation on the front cover, and "Brilliant Poppies" on the back, are unusually attractive, and the numerous colored plates of flowers and vegetables are certainly works of art and merit. The first twenty-four pages, printed in violet ink, describe Novelties and Specialties. Send ten cents to James Vick's Sons, Rochester, N. Y., and procure a copy of this attractive and useful catalogue. It costs nothing, as the ten cents can be deducted from the first order.

Walford, a novel by Ellen Olney Kirk, author of "The Story of Margaret Kent," "Ciphers," etc. Riverside Paper Series. 50 cents. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

The disappearance of a child, the search for her, a labor strike, and a clearing up of the mystery give Mrs. Kirk the materials for a story of great interest. She tells it admirably well, she brings before us characters of great variety and some of exquisite beauty, and the story is one to be read eagerly and long remembered.

Lippincott's Magazine for February, contents, frontispiece, (Portrait of Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood); Roy the Royalist, by William Westall; The Managing Editor, (The Journalist Series), by Julius Chambers; February, by Louise Chandler Moulton; The Hackney-Horse, (Interview with Dr. R. S. Huidekoper), by Louis N. Megargee; Across the Sea, by Philip Bourke Marston; Secretary Rusk's Crusade, by Julian Hawthorne; Sonnet, by Elizabeth Carpenter; The Board of Trade and the Farmer, by Henry Clews; The Ambassador, by Charles Converse Tyler; Jermyn's Portrait, by Clara Lanza; Days of My Youth, by St. George Tucker; Swimming, (Athletic Series), by Hermann Oelrichs; Prince Gallitain, Priest and Pioneer, by Hester Dorsey Richardson; Since the Beginning, by Kate Putnam Osgood; Recollections, by Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood; Intangible, by Kate B. Lathrop; The English Sparrow, by Mary Isabella Forsyth; Names vs. Initials, by Jane de Forest Shelton; As it Seems; With the Wits, (illustrated by Artists.)

The complete novel in Lippincott's Magazine for February, "Roy the Royalist," is by William Westall, and is a stirring tale of adventure in the wars of Napoleon. Though its events date back nearly a century, they are presented in the brisk and business like modern manner. The hero, a dashing young officer of the British navy, prompt and capable alike in friendship, love, and war, meets Bonaparte while a prisoner in France, distinguishes himself in the defence of Acre, recovers a treasure concealed in a château of the Jura by its ci-devant owners, and finally settles in his native Virginia.

The Journalist Series is continued by Mr. Julius Chambers, of the New York World, in an interesting paper entitled "The Managing Editor." He duly magnifies the office of this potentate, discloses some of the secrets, and tells by what various means he attains his most striking and profitable successes, as in two famous cases,—the Tribune's list of the firms burned out in the great Boston fire of November 9, 1872, and the Herald's publication, in 1887, of the President's message before it reached the Senate.

Topics of national importance are handled by Julian Hawthorne, who has lately been interviewing the heads of departments at Washington, in "Secretary Rusk's Crusade," and by Henry Clews, who writes with authority of "The Board of Trade and the Farmer."

The poets are present in unusual numbers, and they are mostly women,—Louis Chandler Moulton, Elizabeth Carpenter, Kate Putnam Osgood, Kate P. Lathrop, and Mary Isabella Forsyth. Besides these there are bits of verse from Charles Converse Tyler and the late Philip Bourke Marston, and a reproduction of the true text of St. George Tucker's song, once famous and now (it was thought) in danger of being forgotten. A short and highly imaginative story, "Jermyn's Portrait," by the Marquise Clara Lanza completes the number.

New England Magazine for February, 1892. Contents: Corot—His Life and Work, Camille Thurwanger; Tomorrow, F. W. Clarke; Stories of Salem Witchcraft, Winfield S. Nevins; Some Letters of Wendell Phillips to Lydia Maria Child; The Prairies and Coteaus of Dakota, Sam T. Clover; The Tribute of Gilbert James Buchanan; The Granite Industry in New England, George A. Rich; A Witch of Shawshine, A. E. Brown; The Churches of Worcester, C. M. Lamson; John Parmer's Protégé, Walter Blackburn Hart; Sixty Years Ago, Lucy E. A. Keble; A Tale of Narransett, Caroline Hazard; Fairies, Claude Napier; A Country Boy's Recollections of the War, Albert D. Smith; In a Corner at Dodsley's, Walter Blackburn Hart; Editor's Table; Omnibus.

The initial article in the New England Magazine for February is a beautifully illustrated one, dealing with the life and work of Corot, the great French painter. It is written by his godson, Camille Thurwanger, whose family was intimate with the artist and his family for a number of years. The article contains data and anecdotes of Corot never before made public. M. Lamont Brown furnishes a fine engraving of "Corot at work" for the frontispiece and other engravings in the body of the article. "Some Letters of Wendell Phillips to Lydia Maria Child" will recall many memories of the great orator. All interested in the material development of New England will turn to George A. Rich's article on "The Granite Industry in New England," which is illustrated by Louis A. Holman and J. H. Hatfield. Walter Blackburn Hart contributes a critical estimate of Walt Whitman's work and genius, and a short story of journalistic life called "John Parmer's Protégé." It has a very unexpected denouement, and those who have found amusement in Mr. Hart's "In a Corner at Dodsley's" will read this story with some curiosity. Sam T. Clover writes a clever article on "The Prairies and Coteaus of Dakota." It is finely illustrated, and is sprinkled throughout with original verse descriptive of the prairies. Winfield S. Nevins's valuable series, "Stories of Salem Witchcraft," is continued, and the fine illustrations by Jo. H. Hatfield add greatly to its attractiveness. Caroline Hazard contributes a story, "A Tale of Narransett," which is well illustrated by H. Martin Beal, and A. E. Brown writes another worth story in which there is no witchcraft. C. M. Lamson writes on the "Churches of Worcester." Albert D. Smith gives a good idea of the war as viewed by those who stayed at home in "A Country Boy's Recollections of the War." The Omnibus department of light, humorous, and social verse is very entertaining in this number.

In the February number of Ballou's Monthly Magazine, besides its usual array of readable fiction, there are interesting accounts of the India Crew, some Texas experiences, one of M. Quid's remarkable war experiences, and a poem, "Unforgotten," written by Mrs. Cornelia Wasson Boyden of this city, well-known as a contributor to these columns. Boston, G. W. Studley. $1.50 a year.

The Atlantic monthly for February, 1892. Contents, the Pageant at Rome in the year 17 B. C., Rodolfo Lanciani; With the Night, Archibald Lampman; Don Orsino, IV, V., F. Marion Crawford; The Nearness of Animals to Men, E. M. E. Evans; A Venetian Printer-Publisher in the Sixteenth Century, Horatio F. Brown; Her Presence, Louise Chandler Moulton; The Descendant of the Doges, Harriet Lewis Bradley; What French Girls Study, Henrietta Channing Dana; Home-Trust, Charlotte Fiske Bates; An Echo of Battle, A. Professor Lanciani's paper on the "Pageant at Rome in the year 17 B. C.," has the foremost place in the Atlantic Monthly for February. It is devoted to an account of the public games held in Rome seventeen years before Christ, and instituted under the patronage of Augustus, the Senate, and the College of the Quindecimviri. Most important evidences of these games have been lately discovered in Rome; and these having come under Professor Laciani's eye, he has reconstructed an account of the games and also given a description of the important discoveries lately made, which is of the highest interest, not only to archeologists, but to the general reader. Writing of Rome reminds us of Mr. Crawford's second installment of "Don Orsino," which gives incidentally an idea of the mania for speculation and building lately rife in Rome, and contains a vivid description of the Pope assisting at a service at St. Peter's. Another subject, still Italian, is a "Venetian Printer-Publisher in the Sixteenth Century," the printer-publisher in question being Gabriele Giolito, the chief of a firm of printers and booksellers, who flourished in Venice during a large part of the sixteenth century. Venice is also the scene of a charming little sketch called "The Descendant of the Doges," by Harriet Lewis Bradley. Isabel F. Hapgood, who showed us "Count Tolstoi at Home" in a recent number of the Atlantic, has an article on "A Journey on the Volga," a graphic sketch of Russian life. Henrietta Channing Dana discusses "What French Girls Study," and gives a very sympathetic picture of the life of a French school, and the kind of training which French girls receive in it. Professor N. S. Shaler, of Harvard University, a Kentuckian by birth, writes with knowledge on "The Border State Men of the Civil War," an interesting pendant to the paper by Professor Gildersleeve in the last number of the Atlantic. Professor Gildersleeve, it will be remembered, decided for the Southern cause; Professor Shaler in this article, gives his reasons for unhesitating fidelity to the Northern side in the civil war. Professor E. P. Evans writes about "The Nearness of Animals to Men," and Mr. Albert H. Tolman devotes an able paper to "Studies in Macbeth." A discussion of "The League as a Political Instrument," and reviews of a dozen or more volumes of recent fiction, under the title of "The Short Story," complete a number well composed, and thoroughly worth reading. Miss Sadie M. Wheeler.

Her funeral was held Sunday afternoon from her late home, No. 4 Forest Street, the Rev. H. J. White of the Pleasant Street Baptist, officiating. The burial was in Hope Cemetery. Music was rendered by Fred Simister, Albert Strong, Mrs. Webster Thayer and Mrs. Fred Simister. Many and beautiful floral tributes were presented.

Annapolis.

Representative Joseph H. Walker advertises a competitive examination for admission to the Naval School, said examination to be held at the office of the Superintendent of Schools, Feb. 13. The committee will consist of Principal John G. Wight, Dr. Geo. O. Ward and Chas. M. Thayer, Esq.

Change of Business.

Major F. G. Stiles has sold his stand on Foster Street to Louis E. Divoll of this city. Major Stiles bought this stand in March, 1896, of Mr. Henry Peabody. The place has been a paint shop for more than thirty years, Mr. Bradbury I. Peabody having the site before his brother, Henry The Building, No. 8 15, 17 and 19 Foster Street belongs to the Dwight Foster heirs. The lower part is used by Mr. H. M. Corbett as a blacksmith shop. Though out of business in the shop, Major Stiles will still do light lettering and such work, failing health being the reason for disposing of the larger business in the old place.

Mrs. Nell E. Bullard of Rockville has picked 140 pansies from her garden cut of doors. This is quite remarkable, as the last one was picked on Thursday, Jan. 14. The little plants seem to enjoy the snow and go on with their blooming as if Spring had come.—Boston paper.

A sign in a store on Tremont Street reads: "Fresh Eggs, 28 cents; Strictly Fresh Eggs, 35 cents."

Mr. Hammond.

Mr. Lewis W. Hammond, after more than twenty-five years of service, resigns his position as cashier in the Citizens National Bank. The directors have adopted the following complimentary resolution:

Resolved, That as directors of the Citizens National Bank, we desire to express our appreciation of the integrity and vigilant care which Mr. Lewis Hammond, as cashier, has for nearly a quarter of a century given the affairs of this bank. We recognize the faithfulness and discretion with which he has directed the clerical labor connected with the bank and the conservative policy that he has constantly manifested in the supervision of the funds intrusted to his management merits our hearty commendation.

It is probable that the accident last Summer may have hastened this action on Mr. Hammond's part. This takes effect Feb. 1st. His successor will be George A. Smith, long connected with the bank.

The subject for discussion at the weekly meeting of the Worcester County Horticultural Society, to be held next Thursday afternoon in Horticultural Hall at 2:30 o'clock, will be "Summer Flowering Bulbs; how, when and what to plant." Mr. H. B. Watts of Leicester will read the opening paper.

"Swear Not at All"

It is an offensive habit, not to mention its wickedness. Of the Russian archduke, Alexis, it was said that he could swear in a dozen languages. If so, it is to be hoped that he made out better than some who do their best in only one. Here is an illustration from the corner of Main and Elm Streets only a few nights ago. The young men were well dressed and without doubt would object, strenuously, if not considered gentlemen, yet one of them said, "There I was in my shirt sleeves and it was colder than H—ll." Cold is not one of the popular attributes of Hades. Is it possible that the party had gained his notions of Inferno from Dante?

The Song Of Old John Brown.

Pent up heart streams of a people, when at last they overflow
 Songs are mightier than sermons for a Nation's weal or woe
 Eloquence may thrill the Forum but the song a Nation sings
 May make armories of hovels and shake down the throne of kings
 And a century of oppression, and of silent, suffering wrong
 Falls a prostrate oblation stattered at the outbreak of a song
 Did John Brown at Harper's Ferry directed by a thousand foes,
 When upon the yielding pateron fell the mad besiegers'
 blows,
 When his helpless, bleeding comrades to the future only saw
 Victims of a somber gibbet and a blood demanding law,
 Did he call, in this stern-eyed dramer, sounds from out the coming years,
 That wild war-song he inspired mingled with an army's cheers
 Did he hear that wondrous anthem from a thousand bearded throats,
 Merging with the peal of muskets and the cannon's thundered notes,
 Did he see the massed divisions rushing onward through the fight,
 With their colors, smoke-enveloped, like a meteor in the night,
 If he heard and if he saw this when in death they cut him down
 From the gallows, he had perished knowing that he wore a crown,
 Crown of glory enduring as the rhythm of that song,
 That in its inborn impetus, swept brigades of men along,
 For they sang it when the battle, scorching with his poisoned breath,
 Licked and withered writhing columns with the blasting tongue of death,
 Sang it when the plunging squadrons underneath their circling steel,
 Dashed tumultuous on the bayonets at the bugle's brazen peal,
 As the night breezes from the swamp lands kissed with pestilential damps
 All the worn and war-scar'd veterans bivouac'd in the guarded camps
 And they sang it when returning from the fields which they had won
 To exchange for desk and ploughshare sword and bayonet and gun,
 For his spirit sought not heaven when he stood upright to die,
 In his grave he heard a people from their hopeless bondage cry
 And it rose from out its sepulchre to overthrow the strong God-embodied in the music of John Brown's immortal song!

"Chilian Rabbit."

This was the wording on a card above a lately slain Canada Lynx that for a day or two lay in the show window of a City Hall (Boston) restaurant. He was a fierce looking beast and, naturally, there were many travellers in that crowded artery from School to Court Streets, who stopped to gaze on the slain animal and to remark on the label. To the most of these folks the label was a libel. Says one, "Chilian rabbit! That's a Maine bob cat and if your Uncle Dudley knows himself, he don't want anything to do with that kind of varmint." Another, after a long look, went off remarking, "That's a H—ll of a Chilian rabbit." And so it went for hours. A good advertisement.

Public School Papers.

BY FRANCIS ZURI STONE.

II.

Miss Coffee and a Political Digression.

I am a lover of books and nothing gives me greater pleasure than rummaging through rows of them with the purpose of getting at some particular volume. But like good Dominic Sampson I usually find myself buried deep in the contents of a book which I had no intention of taking up at the beginning, before searching five minutes. So when I turn to the shelves of memory at which I officiate as librarian to the reader, I mean to hand down the proper volume, but not finding it readily, substitute what I can recommend as "just as good." Hence these papers will be disconnected, but what of that? Who recalls in regular sequence the innumerable incidents that make up the past?

Miss Coffee, that was her name, perhaps a misnomer, for I'm sure that another beverage cheered her lonely board, she was such a typical old maid; such a straight-laced, sharp-featured and sharper tongued caricature of spinsterhood. Unlimited chicanery must have entered into her composition, embittering her with its dregs. She had been so cruelly ground in the mill of life that even her voice suggested the rasping sound of an old fashioned coffee mill such as still cling rusty and aromatic like excrescences to the blackened walls of New England "back rooms." Her complexion, too, was that of an unroasted berry.

She was my teacher when I entered the primary department of our school and the awe that I felt upon first beholding her continues, curiously enough, to this day. She was the personification of perpendicularity in mind and physique. Victor Hugo might have changed her sex (I doubt if he had been compelled to alter her character) and from a living prototype created Inspector Javert, the rigidly inexorable police officer of Paris, whose final suicide, by the way, always suggested to me the descent of a crow bar from a balloon into the sea. When Miss Coffee sat down she exemplified the angular outline of an Eastlake chair, without upholstery. When she stood up a stretched chalk line held at her head and heels would have left a continuous and unbroken mark equal in length to her stature.

There are, I take it, two methods of teaching boys and wild animals. The first is a reasonable method based on persuasion rather than threats. The second relies for success upon the influence of terror over the mentality of the subject. As fear often quickens the intellect and as punishment is in itself penalty and reward (since to escape it is to be rewarded) those who have adopted the second system have some strong reasons to advance in support of their choice. Miss Coffee, without, I dare say, having given much thought to Herbert Spenser's theory that education should consist mainly of a toughening process for turning out stoics, was peculiarly adapted to become an exponent of the merits of terror as an adjunct to intellectual training. The room over which she presided had the atmosphere of a cage; the boys who occupied it slunk habitually when they passed in or out. In their seats they cowered like brutes in constant dread of the lash; in front stood the keeper, who smiled sardonically whenever she swept with her eyes the rows of shrinking, subjugated and subdued cubs whose natural ferocity and inborn cunningness she had turned into the channel of unquestioning obedience.

Not that I ever saw her raise her hand to one of the lads; it must be understood that in New York no form of corporal punishment is permitted by the authorities. A very good and wise restriction it is too; any punishment which depends for its efficacy on physical suffering is degrading and savors of the whipping post, the branding iron, the stocks and the pillory, which, thank heaven, we have outgrown, as we shall outgrow the gallows and the electric chair when people are brought to a full and complete understanding of the enormity of a retributive code. If execution is justifiable as an example, why do we not haul the condemned wretch through crowded streets at the tail of a cart, and let out windows overlooking the gibbet to morbid sight-seers as they used to at Tyburn? An act which puts beyond the power of mankind the revocation of an edit wrongly issued cannot be justified on any grounds.

To resume: Miss Coffee never offered violence to any of us, but she lead us to expect it in some monstrous and unheard of form; some refinement of cruelty that would have commanded the admiration of the blacks who laid San Domingo waste about a century ago. When she spoke to a boy he started as if a powerful electric shock had gone through him, and turned so pale that the freckles on his face stood out in relief like the bosses on the shrine of St. Marichan at Boher. It was a fancy of mine that she had been disappointed in love and became a teacher that she might the more fully glut her vengeance upon the recreant sex. So plausible did this appear to me that I forgot, at length, that it was a mere surmise and came to regard it as a fact no more to be disputed than the fact of her existence. There was a little man, quite elderly and having the appearance of a supernannated bank clerk, whom I used to meet every morning on my way to school. He always had his coat collar turned up and his hat pulled down over his ears so that only a part of his face was visible, like the retiring head of a persecuted turtle. He walked with a hurried step, yet his walk was indecisive as that of a man who hurries to catch a train without having made up his mind whether to take it or not when he gets to the depot. He jerked his head negatively from side to side as though he feared that he was being pursued yet did not possess the requisite courage to look behind lest he should discover that his apprehension was well founded, as a man who develops symptoms of a dreaded disease hesitates to consult his physician, preferring suspense to the chance of learning that his suspicions are correct. From this mannerism and a certain indefinable impression I had that he was hunted, I came to associate him with Miss Coffee's apocryphal love affair, until I had thrown about him the halo of a blighted romance. I have forgotten the exact details of the story, but I was sure that Miss Coffee had entrapped him into a proposal of marriage, which was of course, accepted. He repented his rashness very soon afterward, but was so bullied and threatened by his fiancée that he was forced to submit and would have gone through the ceremony, had he not, at the last moment, while Miss Coffee waited in Ogre-like triumph at the hymeneal altar, sprung into a hack, dashed to the dock and boarded an outgoing steamer for Europe, where he remained twenty years, coming back only to live in constant terror of being seized by the jilted bride and married by main force. And I marvelled at his temerity in coming back at all.

Beyond tyrannizing over her class Miss Coffee had only one pleasure in life. But this she so ingeniously combined with the other that they might be called one, anyway. She read novels of the old fashioned kind in three volumes, and read them after school, invariably keeping from one to fifteen boys for company. That was her most dreaded punishment and when she said to a boy with her sinister smile, "I have got a very interesting book that I am going to conclude before I go home tonight and you may stay with me," that boy would become limp as a wet mop for he knew that it meant worse than solitary confinement from three o'clock until it grew too dark for the Griffin to read print.

It was religiously believed in the lower grades of our school that to detain a pupil later than half past three was an act in direct violation of the rules laid down by the city authorities. A well preserved tradition states that a particularly daring boy whose name is held in high honor there and will be as long as the school lasts, once possessed himself surreptitiously of a mysterious volume called the Teachers' Manual. Among other things, he learned from it that no boy could be legally detained longer than half an hour. The tradition says further, that this audacious seeker of hidden knowledge was discovered while penetrating more deeply into forbidden lore and would have met with some punishment dire as that meted out to those who pry'd into the secrets of the Westphalian Vehm, only, having gone thus far the authorities were afraid of him and permitted him to depart scot free.

In consequence of this article of faith, to be "kept in" for four or five hours was considered by the prisoner a flagrant usurpation of rights that caused him to froth at the mouth with impotent rage. But he never protested. I have no doubt that a large proportion of Russia's population believe the Czar's absolute power to be a stumbling block in the path of progress, but mighty few of them say so, for obvious reasons. Men are a good deal like boys in this respect. As long as some other fellow is suffering wrong they can't afford to mix themselves up in the affair, not being in immediate personal danger. They sit patiently under wrongs that afflict somebody else, but when their own turn comes there goes up a howl and a demand for justice that bursts the shirt collar on the suppliant's neck. Right here let me say that an ordinary citizen of this country is about as well protected by his passport abroad as he would be by the same document in the midst of a rabble of Soudanese. If the Czar of Russia seizes him and railroad him to Siberia (as was done in a case not long ago, the outcome of which has been carefully kept from the press) his wife may flood the diplo-

The Street Railway System of Denver.

One of the most potent factors in a city's development is its system of street car lines. These are its arteries, through which ever flows, back and forth, between heart and extremities, its life blood in the form of its citizens, active in the pursuit of their business, and adding, little by little, to the growth and wealth of the whole mass. To allow this circulation to become stagnant is to invite disease and ultimate decay. To keep it ever flowing freely, the arteries must be numerous and of sufficient capacity.

Frequent service and rapid transit for the citizens, from their homes to the business center, mean quick sales and, therefore, large profits to the merchants.

Denver has many features of which she may well be proud; palatial residences, stately public buildings, magnificent business blocks, and a superior fire department. These give a metropolitan aspect to the city.

But nothing has done more to conserve the rapid growth and business development of the "Pride of the Rockies," than her unsurpassed street railway system.

The business men of Denver do not live in the past, nor even in the present. With their backs firmly placed against the rock ribbed mountains, from whence come their sinews of war, they ever face the rising sun, looking for a new day. They have great faith in the future of their beautiful and beloved city, supported by the "Strength of the hills." Gold, silver and iron and coal strength are there; money to pay for the manufacture of machinery, iron from which to form it, and coal to set it in motion. Capital, therefore, is ever at hand, and new street car lines are springing into existence constantly. If a line will not pay today they know it will tomorrow, and it is built.

Two great companies conduct the business in Denver, The Tramway Company and the Denver City Cable Company, operating fifty-nine miles of double track cable and electric road.

In addition to this, there is one horse car line five miles in extent. This will be changed to cable or electric next Spring. Then the last, so called, horse in Denver street car service will hear his, "Well done good and faithful servant," and from present appearances, immediately become food for coyotes.

The Tramway Company uses electricity principally as a motive power. This company operates fifteen different lines of road, reaching out North, South, East and West from the heart of the city. With the 15th Street, Broadway and Colfax Avenue cable lines as a basis, electric roads extend to all the principal suburbs of Denver. While this article was in preparation, the daily papers announced that the cable, as a motive power, was to be done away with on the three lines above mentioned, and that the Spring of 1892 will see electricity in use on all lines of the Tramway system. On the Broadway line cars run every three minutes, from 6 a. m. to 12 p. m., and every one and a half minutes, from 3 to 8 p. m. The average time for running cars on twelve of this company's lines, is once in six minutes; on the other three, once in from twenty to forty minutes.

In operating this great system, the Tramway Company uses 275 cars of various kinds. Some of these, notably the open electric cars running on two of the suburban lines to the Manhattan Beach Summer Resort, are very fine. They are furnished with two trucks of four wheels each. This does away with the rocking motion of single truck cars, and makes riding on them in the beautiful evenings of Colorado's Summer an exhilarating pleasure. In many of the cars the seats are upholstered in plush and arranged across the car with an aisle running through the center, like an ordinary railway coach.

The horse power used in operating the Tramway system aggregates 3,470. Two engines of 1,250 horse power run the cable lines, while the other ten, of 2,220 horse power are placed in two electric power houses. This vast amount of mechanical energy is directed and controlled by 832 employees.

The Denver City Cable Company's system consists of six lines of double track road, including the West End Electric. This line, although operated under a different name, is in reality, a part of the Cable Company's system.

The motive power on these lines, with the exception of the West End Electric, is the cable. This company prefers to wait until the storage battery is perfected before adopting electricity as a motive power.

The whole cable system is operated from one power house, probably the largest and best equipped cable power house in the world. The machinery consists of two Wright engines of 750 horse power each, and Babcock & Wilcox boilers aggregating 1,600 horse power. The driving machinery, manufactured by Robert Poole & Sons of Baltimore, drives six steel cables 150,000 feet in length, to which will be added 30,000 feet in the Spring of 1892. In order that the City Cable Company may run its cars without crossing steam railway lines at grade, it has constructed two immense viaducts, one 3,400 and the other 3,500 feet in length. These viaducts span the railway tracks contiguous to the Union Depot and the freight depots and yards of the numerous roads running into Denver, and also the Platte River. The 16th Street viaduct furnishes a safe passage for pedestrians and wheel traffic from Denver to North Denver, and is one of the most important public improvements in the city.

The Cable Company uses, in transporting its immense number of patrons, 150 cars, and has in its employ between 400 and 500 men.

The West End Electric is one of the finest equipped roads in the country. The track, 6 miles in length, laid with T rails weighing 50 pounds to the yard, placed upon 6x8 ties, 2½ feet apart. The power is supplied by 3 Hein boilers, 125 horse power each, 3 Armstrong & Symes engines, 125 horse power each, and 3 Edison dynamos of 80,000 volts each. The elegant cars, 13 in number, were built by the Laclade Car Company of St. Louis. They are 30 feet in length and finished in hard wood, carved in ornamental designs. They run upon 2 four wheeled trucks, each supplied with an Edison motor. The cars are furnished with electric bells for summoning the conductor and with electric lamps for lighting. These magnificent cars run at great speed and with the solidity and smoothness of a railway train.

The cars used on the street railway lines of Denver, regardless of company or route, are well built, comfortable and well preserved. The service is rapid and frequent and the system of transfers excellent.

In fact, the only criticism, that in fairness can be made, is the universal use of the T rail, both in suburban and urban construction. This renders the crossing of tracks by vehicles a difficult and often dangerous operation. This is especially true where the pavement has become displaced or broken beside the rails and on streets where there is no pavement.

In addition to the two great companies operating in the city proper, three smaller ones run lines in the suburbs. These, however, make direct connection with the trunk lines, and help to make up the grand total. Undoubtedly Denver stands today without a peer in the excellence of her street railway system. Six millions of dollars are invested in her 25 lines of road, giving employment to nearly 1,300 men and requiring engines of 5,420 horse power to set in motion the 450 cars used in transporting her citizens.

Let it be borne in mind that this is not in a city of 1,000,000 inhabitants, but in one of over 150,000 including suburbs.

This magnificent system is the outgrowth, as well as the endowment of the enterprise of Denver's business men, and of Denver as a safe place for investment.

D. EDMUND MARCH.

The Worcester Oxygen Company, Dr. Gould and T. D. Bristol, M. D., proprietors, is very well pleased with the success it has met at the hands of the public. The demand for oxygen in home treatment is constantly increasing, and is at present used by several prominent physicians and at one of the leading hospitals in this city. In all cases of la grippe, rheumatism, all affections of the lungs and nervous system, the intelligent use of the treatment will surely prove beneficial. A physician who makes a thorough examination of each patient and adapts the strength of the oxygen to the requirements of the disease is always in attendance at the company's rooms, 10 and 11 Lincoln Block, No. 368½ Main Street. Physicians are invited to call and examine the preparation at the laboratory. House hours from 9 a. m. to 6 p. m.

Mr. N. T. Quevedo, formerly of this city, but now a student of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Boston, is spending a few weeks vacation at the Lincoln House, renewing old acquaintances.

Pension Deserved.

It takes a long time, occasionally, for merit to get its deserts, but it comes sooner or later. Tyler Newton has waited a long time for his pension and, sometimes, it seemed as though the department had forgotten him, but, a few days ago, there came a missive saying that Washington was not oblivious of his long and valuable services in the Maine Battery. The award carries with it a year of arrears. No end of High School pupils will rejoice at this announcement.

The Price He Paid.

BY COUSIN CONSTANCE.

Every word of this letter fell like lead on the heart of George Harding. Unlike the previous one it did not anger him so. Its solemn protest seemed to stun him. Had he indeed been blinded? he would see now. There was, to be sure, a good deal in regard to the difference between Charles's property and his solid competence. He would be careful, he would be sure of this.

"Man proposes, God disposes."

That very night while George Harding pondered his cousin's letter, Abbie's father died suddenly. A neighbor, learning it, ran over and rung Harding's bell to ask him for assistance in ministering to the Mays. Locking the letter in his desk, George hastened with him to the house of mourning, and saw that all needed preparations were made, suggested that an intimate friend of the family, with his wife, remain all night, with the desolate household.

If Abbie May, in health and high spirits, had been attractive to Harding, how much more so in grief and sorrow. The fine eyes dim with tears, the appealing attitude were irresistible to the infatuated man. Naturally tender-hearted and charitable, he could see no fault in her, could do as he had purposed, watch her motives.

Long after he came home that night he pondered the situation, and asked himself can she be won? His children's interests were forgotten for the time, or if remembered 'ere he slept it was with the thought, "they will love her, how can they help it," and so the protest of Sarah suffered the same forgetfulness.

The funeral was over. All had left the home but George and one or two near neighbors. As George rose to take his hat and gave his hand to Abbie such an expression of appealing love and helplessness came into the eyes raised to his that he could no longer fail to read aright. The other friends were also leaving and as they passed into the hall he suddenly remarked, "Oh, by the way, Miss Abbie, I had nearly forgotten a little matter of business. If you can attend to it I will mention it now as I leave in the morning for Merton to be absent a day or two."

"Certainly I will attend to it," and she placed a chair. She bade the neighbor good night, her mother had excused herself and retired and George was alone with his enchantress, and his resolve. See had seated herself near him. He leaned forward and clasping both her hands in his said, looking her full in the face, "This is the business, dear Abbie, that cannot be deferred." The soft blush, the drooping figure emboldened him. "I must tell you here, this night, when perhaps to you it seems inappropriate, how much I love you, how much I desire you for a wife." Still lower dropped the head and the yielding form was clasped closer and then did George Harding yield himself to bonds that in after years he would feel insupportable. When the good nights were said, he was no longer a free man, he was promised to Abbie May for life. The wedding was to take place within six months. Mother and daughter were to go, in a few days, to stay with a sister of Mrs. Mays' until the house was sold. Aunt Jane, as Abbie said to George, would be delighted with her choice. She would let him know by letter soon after they got there what mother and aunt said to it.

George left for Merton the next day. Abbie and her mother made hasty preparations for the sale of the cottage and were off by the end of the week. When George returned and found them gone he asked himself how he could have endured it were she not to return? How he could miss her bright presence always? He wondered how Cousin Sarah could suggest the lonely life of a widow, or expect him to do different from other men. And this sweet girl loved him. "Verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity."

From Aunt Jane Abbie wrote:

"All is as I told you. No opposition from either. We are very busy. Aunt has bought me, oh such lovely things and is having them made up and although they must be mourning, they tell me I look better in it than in colors. I hope to be able to write you soon when you can come for me. I hope you do not forget me in the bosom of your family, and that Huldah and the children are getting on well. Ah, how I do shrink from the responsibility of the children, as I told you, but as you said Ned is managed better by me than any one, I will hope at least to make them love me, so good night."

Poor vain Abbie who had sacrificed a true lover in Charlie Meyers for pride and ease and station. Long before she had written Aunt Jane, a thoroughly selfish woman who had married a wealthy widower and managed to soon rid the house of his three children, how Harding could be had if looks were anything, but then there was Charlie, he expected to marry her sometime, and Aunt Jane's reply was, "Don't be a fool, Abbie May. Charles is not worth a cent and think of your position as Mrs. Harding. Think how soon your father will go, and what is to become of you? Your mother, I will help all I can, but you must not cast away such a chance as this. And poor Abbie had yielded. Truth and love went down before ease and station. And Harding thought she loved him. She did in a measure. No true woman is insensible to the deep love of any man especially so attractive one as Harding.

He wrote every day to her. Somehow he felt uncertain of her, and now that he had committed himself the time seemed long until he could claim her as his wife. He urged her to name an early day, and loath as she was to assume the duties of a stepmother she was not averse to taking her place in society as George Harding's wife.

The day, at last, was named. He hastened away after her, not even telling little Millie a word of the facts, only gave Huldah orders to have a nice dinner prepared the next Saturday as he should bring home as a wife the pleasant Miss May.

"Oh indeed sir, and I hope she may prove a blessing to you all."

"You will say nothing to Millie if you please, Miss Dean."

"Certain not, if you wish sir."

A quiet wedding at Aunt Jane's, a pleasant ride home, the carriage drew up to the door, and George handed out tenderly the new Mama. Millie ran to kiss her father, but fell back a most in terror when he led her up to Abbie and said, "I've brought you a new mother, kiss her." Coldly, the new wife bent for Millie's kiss, finding it hard to smile, not so when boisterous laughing Ned clasped his chubby arms about her in delight and said "I glad you's my mudder."

"Good little boy," she said as she kissed him, and looked over to where Millie was in her father's arms.

Huldah showed her to the fine room (George had had fitted up for her) and soon after they gathered about the nicely appointed table.

As Millie slipped into her chair beside her father, Mrs. Harding from her place at the head of the table said sweetly,

"Ah Millie, here is your place by me."

"Do you object to her keeping her old place?" asked her husband.

"Yes, Master Ned must be there. Miss Dean will not be able to sit by him now, and he will need you, come Millie," and the child shrinkingly took the seat beside her.

Abbie Harding had seen that this child was all that stood between her and the entire love of her husband and, selfish to the last degree, she determined that this outward separation of father and daughter should be but the beginning of, as she hoped, an inward alienation. Could she have believed herself capable of this once? Ah, she had placed herself just where all the arts of the adversary of souls are brought to bear upon the inherent selfishness of poor human nature. But she was the wife, the mistress of this fine mansion, going to be as she believed a leader in society. She must have this comfort, for now that she had sacrificed Charlie, she needed something to keep her mind from him. George was kind and indulgent and Ned amusing and loving to his new mama. If only that disagreeable Millie was out of the way, it was a burden to think of her and the strong hold she had upon her father's heart. It became a constant study with Mrs. Harding how best to annoy and thwart the poor child who, not understanding the real cause of her dislike, sought in vain to please her but met no approval, none of the praise and caresses Master Ned had showered upon him. Of course it was in the father's absence, for when he was present she tried to appear impartial, although it was noticeable to Huldah that the slightest mistake or wrong in Millie was at once reported and exaggerated, while Ned's many acts of disobedience were passed over leniently. Altogether it was a muddle, as she told a friend, she could not make out, and she believed she should have to leave, for what with Mrs. Harding's parties and going out so much she was getting worn out and there's that delicate Millie, as good a child as I wish to see, pining away, going to be sick all the time I see, and to Mr. Harding's consternation, though he had feared it for sometime, Huldah gave notice that week, saying she would stay until a substitute could be found. The stepmother was nothing loth. She had seen that Millie was loved by the faithful woman and she feared her. She told George she had much rather have two young girls, one for the children and one for her maid. "You know we go a good deal and I must receive a good deal, and need a maid sadly, can I have one?" with the bright arch look of old.

"Certainly if you wish but what we shall do when Millie has her ill turns without Huldah, who understands her perfectly, I don't know." "Never fear, I know of a bright girl, French, I believe, who will attend to her. She has been used to just such a child at the place where she is now and she has a sister, an accomplished maid, just over from France whom I can have. The expense will be greater I know, but I do not see how I can get along without some one to sew as she will do. Millie's clothes require a good deal of time, she is growing so fast."

"Do you think so?" he asked rather astonished, "I fancied she was looking quite poorly lately, and shall consult a doctor if she does not improve in looks at least."

"Why George, I see nothing the matter."

But George was not in a deceivable mood that day. The extravagances of the new wife were beginning to tell in the monthly bills. Paying no attention to the help, suffering the girl in the kitchen to give tradesmen orders, entertaining large parties, visiting, calling, riding, for Abbie had learned that her home was the last place she could be happy in, unless surrounded by company; her husband had begun to be slightly disillusioned. Always of a yielding disposition, disposed to ease mainly, he shut his eyes to much that his wife did. But toward Millie his eyes were opened and he had seen that the child was changed. Though sweet and obedient as ever, the great lustrous eyes sought his face when at home with such longing to throw herself into his arms, a thing not allowed if management could interfere to prevent by the mother, she was either sent out of the room on an errand or called to her side to arrange her dress or hair, all so sweetly done too that for the life of him George could not complain or see through it, could not see that the woman he had placed between him and his dear child was determined to fill the place, and exact all the love proffered her.

Was any mischief done by Ned, it was always reported to the father as Millie's fault. Often when he inquired for her, she was represented as sullen, would not come to the table. Once when he started to bring her, a grieved appealing voice said,

"George, it will only make it harder for me to keep up any discipline," and her face forced him against his will to take his chair again, and swallow not only a hasty dinner, but sundry doubts as to the discipline poor Millie was kept under.

Years were slipping by fast. The Harding home was one scene of deception, the easy going father, trying to believe his children well-managed, while Mildred, from continual faultfinding and misrepresentation and—yes—hated was actually pining away, being, as was the poor child of Aunt Carrie, "hated to death." Ned, copying his mother's example, became utterly untruthful.

Harding tried to believe that everything was going on as well as circumstances would admit, saying to himself when dragged unwillingly from his children and home to theater, ball or party, night after night,

"It's no wonder Abbie likes these things better than caring for another's children, she's young, handsome, an idol in society, I must be patient, she tries to please me, I know."

Alas for the blindness of love for a woman that would not let him see that it too often was the desire to separate father and child, a grudging of even a single care to the daughter that led her to lure him abroad so often.

Cards had been received that week to a wedding reception. A costly robe had been prepared. Mrs. Harding, in a flutter of excitement, was being made ready by her maid, when her husband sent up word that a violent headache would compel him to stay at home, but Ames, one of his partners, and his wife would like her to go in their carriage. For a moment she was annoyed, then reflecting what good company the Ames were, and how she never lacked for attention in public, she sent back word that if he did not care she would finish dressing and look in upon him as she came down.

The last touch given the elegant costume, the lovely roses in hand, she swept into the library where he lay on a sofa and holding out her jeweled vinaigrette she said, "Too bad you have such a headache, here perhaps this will help it, does my dress suit you?"

"It always does," he wearily replied.

"Flatterer, thank you."

A sweeping courtesy, a good bye, and she went out to the carriage that waited. A heavy sigh as the door closed and pressing his hands over his eyes, as it rattled away, he lay a moment, then the door opened again and a swift soft step stopped at his side, a soft face laid to step and Millie's voice asked,

"Are you ill, papa?"

So glad, so glad was he to be once more alone with his darling, who drew a low seat by his side, wet a napkin and laid it over his brow with tenderness and loving words. He drew her down beside him, kissed her again and again, all the while saddened to see how tremblingly she clung to him, asking, "Is your head better now?"

"Oh yes dear. Where is Ned, I don't hear him?"

"Maggie has taken him over to play an hour with James. Mama said I could go too but when I heard her go away without you I came to sit with you."

"Good little girl," he said, holding her soft hand down on his eyes that she might not see the tears in them. His silence worried her and she said, "Do I trouble you, papa?"

"No indeed." So sweet was it to the world-weary, disappointed man to have near him this true, tender heart once more, so sweet was it to the defrauded daughter to be taken to his arms again that a long silence ensued, broken at last by the return of Ned, and his noisy run up stairs to bed, then Millie said, with a sigh, "I must go now, papa, I promised mama I would go to bed when Ned did. I wish I could stay with you longer."

"I wish you could too, dear, but if your mother wishes you to go with Ned, good night."

A long kiss and she was gone. Sadly was she to pay for this sweet hour. When Maggie reported that she did not go with them, but was with her father an hour, the soul of the stepmother planned revenge that was not slow in coming. How little the father could imagine that the next day when he asked her and Ned to ride with him that she was not kept at home on account of a threatened shower but because she must be punished for an hour's happiness. Millie knew all; but child as she was, she had learned what sorrow it gave her father to know any of these things. She saw how it made trouble between the parents and so kept all these things in her suffering heart and made no sign.

Soon after she left that night, he went to his own room. As he passed the door of Millie's, he softly opened the door and went in. She lay there with wide open eyes, Ned fast asleep in his bed on the other side of the hall.

"Not asleep yet Millie, I'm afraid you will not feel well tomorrow," and sitting down by the bed he took up a book of stories she was very fond of and said, "I will read you to sleep, then; close your eyes," laying a kiss upon them.

She lay still, and for an hour he read to her until sure she was asleep, then with fast falling tears he stood and noted the quick breathing, the ominous scarlet spot in the cheek, and with sad foreboding went to his own room to lie awake until the late arrival of his wife, who flushed and happy from the adulation of the crowd, never thought to even look in the children's rooms. Long after she slept, George Harding lay thinking of his child, of Cousin Sarah to whom he had not written since his marriage for very shame, sending only a wedding card. In return came a brief note from Sarah saying,

"God be better to you than my fears."

Faithfully

The Doll's Hospital.

If the children be allowed to tell the story, there never was anything so good as "The Dolls' Hospital" given in Worcester. At the same time, it must be remembered that the children's range of observation is not the widest. The little folks and their older friends comfortably filled Horticultural Hall, Monday afternoon, at 4 o'clock, where the younger members of the School of English Speech gave a play, rewritten for them by Mrs. Cutter, and put on the stage with the help of Misses Brooks and Sawyer and Master Walter Adams. The following little folks bore the parts Sadie Briggs, Harry F. Cutter, Alice Casey, May Mellor, Rosie Woodcock, Eva Mayo, Eddie Lawrence, Mammie Parsons and Zeita Parker. The dolls' entertainers were Miss Susie Sargent, Ralph Rebboli, Fannie Perkins, Annie Bigelow, Rosie Woodcock, Effie Adams, Grace Monahan, Arline Hall, Flossie Isaacs, Mammie Parsons. The whole affair was very pleasant and a source of infinite joy to the children.

Worcester Boy.

This is what a Brown University correspondent of a Boston paper says of the son of the late Judge H. B. Staples:—

"Staples, whose letters have been read with a great deal of interest, is a clever fellow. He comes from Worcester, and I believe after his graduation will enter the Harvard Law School."

Some men are born great; but the average weight is only about seven pounds.

Women's Club Life.

"What is an ideal Woman's Club? Is it a purely social organization, or is it one formed for the advancement of some special idea or reform? It is only within a comparatively short time that a club composed exclusively of women has been found practicable, but the past few years have been prolific of women's clubs of all kinds and descriptions, showing the inevitable trend of women toward club life, in one form or another. Sorosis is perhaps the oldest women's club in the country, and it is also one of the strongest and best supported. But are women content with the club of which Sorosis is an example? Is there not an unde- fined desire among women to form the purely social club,—the club of their fathers and hus- band,—and has the time come when such a club would be feasible?

"How would the domestic life be affected by it? Would it not mean the introduction of a disturbing element into the life of wife and mother wholly incompatible with our estab- lished ideas of duty, or would it tend toward a broadening of social ideas and a correspond- ing growth to meet the needs of the newer sit- uation? Are, or are not, the social conditions which hedge women about such as to obviate the necessity for the purely social club?"

"Would it find that active interest and healthy support so necessary to the moral and financial success of a club?"

"The Club earnestly solicits an expression of opinion from club women of the country on this subject, believing that a healthful agita- tion of the question would prove beneficial to all women."—From Advance Sheet of The Club. J. E. L.

Dr. George E. Francis, Mrs. Francis, Miss Elsie Francis and Miss Fanny Clarke, daughter of Josiah H. Clarke, sailed last Saturday for Havre on the French steamer La Gascogne. Their European trip is planned for about six months. Dr. Francis has not fully recovered from his severe prostration with la grippe, and the journey was prescribed as a necessary remedy.

The annual Winter meeting of the High School Alumni Association will be held at the school building Tuesday, February 9, when the members will be called upon to decide the advisability of having only one meeting a year, that to be held at graduation time.

A BILLION AND A HALF.

The above is estimated to be the amount due to heirs of unclaimed estates in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France and Germany. The heirs are supposed to be chiefly in the United States, descendants of people who crossed the ocean years ago. You who read this are earnestly requested to correspond with the undersigned, if your people came from across the sea. Remember that a letter to this country requires a five cent stamp. Be sure to write your name and address plainly. Also send 25 cents to pay for postage and correspondence. We charge nothing for investigating.—WILLIAM LORD MOORE, 5, Ingersoll Road, Shepherd's Bush, London, England.

Good to Eat.

For an invalid a delicious dish, where meat is allowed, is rabbit, stewed in milk. Take a very young rabbit, one pint of milk, a small blade of mace, salt and pepper. Mix one dessert-spoonful of flour with a little of the milk. When smooth, add the remainder. Cut the rabbit into small pieces, put into a stew-pan with the milk and other ingredients, and simmer very gently until tender. Stir occasionally to prevent it from burning, as the milk will scorch very readily.

A very delicate dish is cream of rice soup. Boil a small fowl until tender. Take about two cupsful of the broth, two tablespoonfuls of rice, a tiny sprig of parsley, celery, salt and pepper. Be careful not to use too much salt. Boil for one hour, then strain, mashing the rice through the strainer. Add one-half a cup of cream or rich milk. Serve with delicate crackers.

Half the chicken can be jellied by removing all the bones and skin, cut into small pieces, salt and pepper well, and add a little grated nutmeg. Thicken one cupful of the broth with a tablespoonful of gelatine dissolved in cold water. Place over the fire, add the chicken, give one boil, and pour into moulds. When cold, slice with a sharp knife.

Tapioca Pudding.

Four tablespoonful of tapioca, dissolved in water the night before if possible, one quart of sweet, fresh milk, flavoring to taste, four or five eggs, one cup of sugar. Put the milk on the stove in a galvanized pan. Let it come to a boil, add the tapioca, boil until it gets transparent, lift off the stove, and add the yolks of the eggs, well beaten, stirring well into the milk. Put the tapioca back on the stove. Let it boil, stirring all the time; let it cook till a custard. Remove from the stove, add the sugar and flavoring. Pour into a baking dish or pan. Whip the whites of the eggs, and drop over the tapioca custard in spoonfuls (in spots), after adding to the whites about four tablespoonfuls of sugar. Bake a light brown, cool, then chill and serve.

M. BLANCHE HARKER.

Candied rose leaves for table-decoration—A mold of snow-white blanc-mange made of whipped cream stiffened with gelatine or isinglass is very ornamental served on a low crystal platter, wreathed with whipped cream, tinted a delicate rose color with a drop or two of cochineal, and scattered with candied rose leaves. Or the blanc-mange itself may be tinted rose color and wreathed with candied rose petals. It will be none the less wholesome and delicious because it seems almost too dainty to be eaten.

The old-fashioned rule for pumpkin pie is about two cups of pumpkin to five of milk or four of milk and one of cream, but five eggs, sweetening and spices to the taste. Do not forget to add half a teaspoonful of salt to every quart of milk used in the pies.

Creamed Walnuts.

The white of one egg and an equal amount of cold water, one teaspoon of lemon or vanilla. Beat until thoroughly mixed, then beat in confectioner's sugar, sifted, until the dough is stiff enough to mold. Break off pieces the size of a nutmeg, roll them till smooth and round. Press the halved walnut meats on each side, letting the cream show slightly between the meats. One egg will require about a pound and a quarter of sugar.

Entertainments.

In Pilgrim Hall, February 16, a tennis drill will be given by sixteen young ladies in costume, under the direction of Margaret Fezandere.

The pupils of Miss Sarah E. Laughton, teacher of elocution in the Home School, gave a recital before a large audience of friends, Monday evening in Colonial Hall. They were assisted by Miss Mary E. Convery, contralto, and Mr. Walter Scott Kennedy, pianist. The pupils taking part were Miss Lena L. Mellen, Mrs. W. H. Pierce, Miss Abbie M. Bridgman, Miss Fanny W. Sweet, Miss Mary A. Daniels, Miss Emma O. Patten, Miss Ellen F. Carpenter, Miss Fanny Damon, Miss Mignonette L. Rice and Edward W. Pierce. Of the readings, the best were those of Miss Rice and Mr. Pierce, who gave excellently two scenes from "The Hunchback." Miss Abbie M. Bridgman's pantomime of "The Rose Bush," with the song by Miss Convery, was one of the best numbers of the whole program, it would be almost impossible for any one else to give it better. She is apparently approaching the mastery of gesture. "The Minuet," Miss Carpenter's piece, is generally assigned to a child, but she gave it with such bewitching grace that she was obliged to repeat the last part. Miss Mellen's "An Old Sweetheart of Mine" and Miss Damon's reading were also very good, the latter, who is a little girl, being obliged to respond to an encore. The program was finished with posings by six of the pupils. Mrs. Jennie Abbott Matton and Miss Lottie M. Tafts were announced on the program to read, but illness kept them at home.

The recital was essentially artistic in its inception and the pupils fully maintained the possibilities of expressive art under the sympathetic training of their efficient and painstaking teacher, who is also a reader of fine attainments. In point of character achievement, and the subservience of the "stagnant" to the natural, the results manifested fairly entitle the class to rank among the best.

A unique and rich musical treat is in store for the general public in the auditorium of the new All Souls Church, next Tuesday, February 20, at 8 p.m., when a varied concert program will be rendered by the Lihlatansu Ladies Quartet of Milford. Wherever they have been heard, they have given satisfaction. They were booked for the Mechanics Course this year, but were unavoidably prevented from appearing.

The Salem Street Choral Society, will give Schumann's cantata "Pilgrimage of the Rose" on Tuesday evening February 2d, in Salem Street Church. The following soloist will assist: Mrs. J. A. Rice, Mrs. J. W. Mitchell, Mrs. Lottie L. Holden, sopranos; Mrs. F. W. Ruggles, Miss Alice Hammond, altos; Mr. Thomas B. Hamilton, tenor; Mr. C. J. Marshall and Daniel C. Turner, basses. There will be a chorus of fifty voices. Miss E. G. Whittemore will be pianist; Mr. C. H. Groat, organist and Mr. E. D. Allen, director. The public is invited. There will be a final rehearsal Monday evening February 1st.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"The Fugitive," a melodrama in which there are many realistic scenes and interesting situations, has attracted large and enthusiastic audiences at both afternoon and evening performances this week. Miss Kate Glassford as Hester Mabyan, looks and acts most charmingly. J. Francis Kirke, as John Levett, the fugitive and hero of the play is in possession of a character well suited to his talents, and is always the conventional, honorable and manly man. This afternoon and evening the last two performances will be given.

"The Two Wanderers," a comedy drama, will be presented next week, with Miss Ethel Tucker and Charles Barringer in the leading characters.

Dramatic Notes.

"The County Fair," in which Neil Burgess is at present appearing in a most successful engagement at the Park Theater in Boston, is advertised to appear in the principal cities in New England this season. Mr. Burgess states positively that he will not be seen outside of Boston. The travelling company is inferior in many respects to the original, especially in the character of "Aunt Abby," which is assumed by Mr. Burgess. "The County Fair," without this clever actor is a very poor production.

The Sons and Daughters of New Hampshire have good things in store for their annual reunion, Feb. 11th. Hon. Geo. A. Marden, editor of the Lowell Courier, is the chief speaker. Ex-Governor Goodell of New Hampshire will also attend. The supper will be provided in the good old-fashioned way, by contribution. Good vocal and instrumental music are engaged and the affair promises to be most enjoyable.

Why "The Modoc."

The most noted train on the Boston & Albany R. R. is The Modoc, but why has it so queer a name? In 1873, Capt. Jack's band of Modoc Indians were driven to the Lake beds of Oregon and there General Canby and Rev. Dr. Thomas were assassinated. Since that time this train starting from the extreme west and reaching Worcester at about 9:30 a.m. has borne the Indian name. Some say, its name arose from its coming from the far west, others because it killed so many tramps who had essayed an early walk on the railroad. Either reason is sufficient.

A London hostess has set an example which might with advantage be followed by hostesses in other parts of the world. Lady Constance Leslie recently gave a large entertainment on a very cold night, and it occurred to her that the coachmen and footmen who were in attendance on that occasion would be likely to be much exposed, and not at all looked after. With admirable thoughtfulness and charity she hired a coffee-stall to dispense free tea and coffee to these attendants. It is notorious that coachmen and footmen often contract lung and chest troubles from the exposures necessary in their calling, and it is well known also that it not infrequently happens that cold and exposure lead men to drink who would be sober under any other circumstances. Even if these things had nothing to do with the matter, although they of course should in truth have a great deal to do with it, there is a certain heartlessness in allowing servants to suffer when the occasion is one of pleasure simply. It is not the wont of the fashionable world to trouble itself overmuch about the happiness of domestics, and it is a not unnatural consequence of this that they are so apt in that circle to have trouble with servants. It is pleasant to find a case in which a fashionable woman practically recognizes the fact that servants are as human as their masters.

Reasoning Power in Dogs.

Coming down the street I observed a medium-sized black dog sitting before a store door, head turned to one side, and bent down toward the ground in an unmistakable meditative position. So engrossed was he that not a muscle moved. His thoughts were so intently drawn within himself that my footsteps close to him did not disturb his meditation. Was he thinking where he could get his next bone? Or did he have some revenge to work out? It seemed to be a difficult problem from his deep study.

That dogs can and do work out a problem I have personal evidence, for I once witnessed a dog chase a cat into a barrel, and lie down at his leisure to meditate how to get her out, as he arose, evidently in fear of her paws. At last he pounced and hauled into the barrel, evidently not fearing to introduce himself that way, as he guardedly looked over his shoulder. The cat, however, was too chivalrous to strike him in the rear: she bounded over his back, and both had a race for the barn, the cat being the winner.

Another time I heard two little dogs barking viciously in the night, and next morning found a full-grown cat—a large one, too—lead in the yard. I could not believe they had killed her. A few nights afterward, at midnight, I again heard a great yelping in the yard, and got up to see what was the rumpus. It was a clear, moonlight night, and I saw at the foot of a small plum tree two quite small dogs, pets of our neighbors, watching a large cat perched in the forks of a tree, out of reach. Suddenly, she dropped, purposely, or fell. Instantly, as if by an understanding, one was at her head and the other at her tail. Keeping that position, despite her twisting and turning, the cat was killed before she could get to a fence some thirty feet off.

In these two instances we find the reasoning faculty pretty well developed. Nature.

The subject for the meeting of the Worcester Grange next Tuesday evening will be "Winter Evening Amusements." Mr. A. S. Lowell will read a paper on whist. There will also be a musical program, including a piano solo by Miss Theresa Lord and a vocal duet by Mr. Fred and Miss Sarah Midgley.

At the Lake.

To do a kindness for Robert French, his friends at Lake View have an amateur minstrel performance. Lincoln Hall was comfortably filled Wednesday evening by a responsive company while fun was made for them by J. C. Manning, (his friends call him "Jim") B. L. Long, Wm. O'Hara, C. H. Clavin, T. Long, T. H. Wilson, J. Koper, J. W. Mann, J. L. Riley, K and I. W. Dinkbrothers. 'Tis said that nothing better ever struck this part of the city.

The sacredness of all knowledge as a gift of God; the unity of all knowledge as the utterance of God; the purpose of all knowledge as the food of character in the knower and the helper of humanity through him—these are the great departments of that science. Sometimes we see a scholar who has learned them all, and what a new vision he gives us of the glory of scholarship! Men who know less than he do not begrudge or disparage his knowledge. The light that is in him is not darkness; it lightens all his world.—Bishop Brooks.

On Thursday evening, Jan. 14, President D. Delbit Hyde of Bowdoin College lectured to the Worcester academy students on "The Qualities of Leadership." He gave the following qualities: Physical development, good fellowship, education, clear vision of an ideal, sincerity, courage and faith in God. He said, combine these qualities in any man, and his power as a leader will be invincible. Let him lack one of these essentials, and though he rise ever so high he will fall at last.

The subject of better ventilation in our school-houses is to engage the attention of the Legislature this session, and it is to be hoped that the matter will be thoroughly considered. It is a well known fact, we believe, that the lack of a proper supply of pure air is the cause of the sickness of many teachers and pupils. When an attempt is made to purify the air in some of our school rooms it is done with danger to the health of those who are seated nearest the open windows. The cold air blows directly upon them, while others in more remote situations may be suffering from heat. It would seem that in this scientific age some plan might be devised which would clear the atmosphere without increasing throat and lung troubles and neuralgia among the children.—Saturday Gazette.

The annual award of the Bancroft Scholarship is pending. Any one desiring to receive its benefits should apply to Librarian S. S. Green at the Free Public Library. The income is at present enjoyed by a student in Johns Hopkins University. It is to be hoped that a Worcester representative will get it the next time.

Manual Training.

The introduction into many of our public schools of the elements of manual training, notably of joinery and plain sewing, as part of the regular course of instruction, calls for recognition on the part of this board, and raises the question whether some place ought not to be found for this branch in our system of normal training.

While it would probably be impracticable to put this work upon the normal schools, at least for the present, it is suggested that a special normal class might be established, perhaps in a building erected upon the grounds of some one of our normal schools, and provided at no great cost with the means of furnishing such instruction and practice as are necessary to fit young persons of either sex to take charge of manual training classes of the sort that are organizing in various parts of the commonwealth.—Educational Report. State of Mass.

Brown.

Last Monday evening Prof. Royce delivered his 5th lecture in Manning Hall, subject "The Romantic School of Philosophy."

The advisability of joining a foot ball league with Bowdoin and Tufts or one with M. I. T. of Boston, Trinity, Rutgers and Stevens is still being discussed.

Brown will probably compete in the Boston Athletic Association's handicap meet on Saturday Feb. 13.

At the recent athletic conference it was unanimously voted that the college take immediate steps to procure a suitable athletic field. It is to be hoped that this matter will be pushed to a successful issue.

March 16 has been decided on as the date for the indoor meet in Infantry Hall.

The winter tournament is now in full sway and the finals will probably be played before the week closes.

In accordance with the time honored custom, Thursday last was observed as the day of prayer for colleges. All college exercises were suspended and three services were held during the day. Pres. Andrews preached at the morning service.

On February 9th will occur the annual winter concert in Sayles' Hall of the Glee, Banjo and Mandolin Clubs and the Symphony Society.

The Senior Class at its regular meeting decided to wear caps and gowns on class day and commencement.

On Monday the candidates for the 'varsity nine will begin active practice.

Plans for the New Rhode Island State House have been in Sayles Hall during the past week.

Boston University.

The "Klatch," which is the social event of the year will be held Friday evening, Feb. 5th, at Jacob Sleeper Hall. This is a grand five o'clock tea given to their friends by the young women of the college. Last year about 1,500 invitations were issued, but this year the number will be much less. The committee in charge are Misses Symonds, Wendall, Childs and Hall.

Miss Elizabeth Deering Handscom, '87, read a very interesting paper on Charles Lamb before the Epsilon Chapter of the Convocation of Boston University Wednesday afternoon.

Prof. Olin A. Curtis, D. D., of the School of Theology, preached the sermon on the Day of Prayer for colleges, Thursday.

Rev. Wm. R. Alger, D. D., will deliver a lecture on the "Law of Victory in the Struggle of Men," before the students Friday afternoon.

BOSTON, Jan. 28.

Holy Cross.

The middle examinations will close tonight and the respective standing of the classes announced early next week.

Rt. Rev. Monsignor Schmitz, rector of the Scandinavian seminary at Rome, delivered a lecture in Fenwick Hall last Saturday evening on the "Catacombs."

The seniors were allowed Wednesday afternoon for a holiday and most of the class improved the opportunity to witness Mantell in "Hamlet."

The base ball team will soon commence training for the summer season under Capt. O'Neil.

The skating on the flooded campus in front of the college is grand and is thoroughly enjoyed by the students.

Preparations for St. Ann's Coffee Party to be held during the week of Washington's birthday are being rapidly completed and promise success as heretofore.

The Sacred Heart Lyceum will present "Arrab-n-Pogue," at their hall on St. Patrick's night.

Jan. 29.

Smith.

Mrs. E. Humphrey Allan, assisted by the Beethoven Club of Boston and Dr. Blodgett and Prof. Story, gave a chamber concert last Wednesday night.

Prof. Goodyear has continued his series of art lectures every Thursday and Friday night and this week will close them.

The Wallace House Dramatic Club gave a play in the old Gymnasium last night, "The portrait of a Lady."

Thursday was Day of Prayer for Colleges and there were no recitations. Chapel exercises were extended and short addresses were made by the President and some of the professors. Then the students held a general prayer-meeting directly after. In the afternoon Dr. Parkhurst of New York preached at the service.

High School.

This week finishes the 20th week of school and ends the first half of the school year. Next week commences a period of busy days for the teachers as well as for the pupils. The teachers must hand in their marks so that the reports may be handed out on time.

Then comes a change in the authors studied. The Senior class study Whittier and the second year and Junior classes study Bryant for the rest of the year.

The election of officers of the different societies occurs this week, causing more or less work and considerable talk that certain men may be unanimously elected.

It is reported too, that the athletic association will hold its first meeting early in the coming week.

The rhetorical exercises of Wednesday were a feast not soon to be forgotten by all pupils present. The declamation by Mr. Fogarty '93, upon Freedom by Lowell was the great feature of the exercises, showing signs of developing dramatic ability as well as declamation. The rest of the program was a piano solo by Miss Everett, '02 and a reading, Boat Race in Holmes, "Mortal Antipathy" by Miss Rice, '94.

It is a praiseworthy fact and one that does no little honor to Mr. Mellen that all the boys who took the examination for the Polytechnic Institute from our school, about 30 in number, were admitted forming a large proportion of the entering class.

Polytechnic.

At a meeting of the Historical Club, held Friday of last week, the following officers were elected for the next half year: President, Andrews, '93; vice-president, Eastman, '94; secretary and treasurer, Butterfield, '93. Mr. Z. W. Coombs was elected a member of the executive committee on behalf of the faculty. The club has just finished reading King John and will now take up Macbeth.

The semi-annual election of officers of the Athletic Association was held Monday noon. E. H. Fish, '92, was unanimously elected president. The other officers are, vice-president, Dyer, '93; secretary, Harris, '94; treasurer, Rawson, '93. H. M. Southgate was chosen delegate from the Institute to the New England Intercollegiate Athletic Association convention which occurs in Boston, February 13th.

The Socialists of '62 still keep the ball rolling. A short time ago a banquet was held and last Tuesday the crowd attended the "Corsican Brothers" at the theater, furnishing the applause for the entire audience.

Prof. Kimball took a portion of the Tech Elect through the electric light works last Tuesday afternoon, and next Tuesday will take the remainder.

Everyone at the Institute was shocked by the news of the sudden death of Mrs. Dr. Kinnicut, last week Friday. She was one of the best known and liked of all the wives of members of the Faculty. Hers was a familiar face at all field days and athletic games of the students, and all feel that they have lost one of their best and most interested friends. The heartfelt sympathy of the entire school is with Dr. Kinnicut in his grief. He is one of the youngest members of the Faculty, and for that reason, if for no other, he and his wife seemed nearer to the students than the rest. The class of '93 gave expression to its sorrow by a letter of condolence, and also sent flowers to the funeral. All exercises of the Institute were suspended Monday afternoon, the time of the funeral.

The new engine in the Salisbury laboratories, designed by Professor Alden, after several unsuccessful attempts, has at last made its "trial trip." The first time it was started, a piece of packing got jammed into a valve and did considerable damage. After repairs it was started again, and this time it was found that the governor had been connected wrong, and the faster it went the more steam was let on. Now, however, with the exception of considerable noise, it works in quite a satisfactory manner.

The apprentice examinations are over, and now sixty-three embryo mechanics, arrayed in brand new overalls and jumpers, each with his little rule, may be seen wielding the mallet in the domain of Mr. Badger. This is a gain of nine over last year's class. Their general appearance is about as usual, some appearing quite like veterans, and others green even to their eyes. One has a pair of red, white and blue overalls and another wore his jumper to chapel. A party of about fifteen indulged in the George Washington war dance, Thursday evening, and as a result had their first interview with President Fuller. The chapel is considerably crowded by the additional number.

The Seniors held a class meeting Thursday noon and elected officers for the last half year. F. W. Collier was chosen president, and will preside at the Class Day exercises. The other officers are, vice president, L. C. Smith; secretary, G. H. Day; treasurer, E. L. Smith (re-elected) and athletic director, J. F. Bartlett.

James H. Wall.

The death of this gentleman, last Tuesday, has removed a notable figure from our midst. Leicester born and reared, a mechanic by trade, he has been a resident of Worcester since 1837. He early embarked in real estate speculations and in this way acquired his large fortune, being esteemed one of the wealthiest citizens of Worcester at the time of his death. He was born Nov. 28, 1810, and was married in 1831 to Mary Ann Davis, who was the mother of his children. Of their seven children, four are living, viz., George F., in the employ of Macullar & Co.; Sarah Elizabeth, wife of Sumner W. Balcom of Boston; James H. Jr., of Chicago and Emma Isabella, wife of Charles S. Connell of Comfut, Conn. A grandson, James H., is employed on the Boston Record. His first wife died about two years since and in June last he was wedded to the widow of Charles P. Stevens of this city. His last appearance in public was at the Mayor's inaugural, and he was attacked by the grip immediately afterward. His brother, Caleb Wall, is well known in Worcester and his only surviving sister, Sarah Wall, lives in Providence. For some time his home has been in the Lincoln House. The funeral takes place today, Saturday, in the First Baptist Church. The Continentals will attend in a body.

About thirty members of the Tech prep, lately members of the High school, visited F. L. Mellen, teacher in the High School, Saturday evening at his residence, 119 High Street, and presented him with a handsome chair. C. A. Harrington made the presentation speech. After a social time Mr. Mellen took the party to Zahony's where refreshments were served. Mr. Mellen was the teacher of the Tech preparatory class and the boys took this way of telling of their appreciation of his instruction.

Mr. Theodore P. Brown is entitled to much sympathy in the loss of his new and pleasant house, so completely ruined by fire last Tuesday evening. Many people had said, "I hope there will be no fire alarm tonight"; but it came and at 9 o'clock, the house was a smoldering mass. Fortunately no lives were lost but the loss above the insurance seems to be heavy.

Miss M. Ethel Higgin.

Rev. H. J. White attended the funeral of this bright little girl Tuesday at 2 p.m. from her late home, 30 Chatham Street. In school, Wednesday the 20th, she came home ill with the grip and died Saturday. Many friends were present at the services and many had sent appreciative tokens in the shape of beautiful floral offerings.

REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC AUCTION. By virtue of a power of sale contained in a deed of mortgage by Philip J. Murphy, of Worcester, to the Home Co-operative Bank, a Corporation duly established in Worcester in the County of Worcester, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, dated November 16, 1886, and recorded with Worcester District Registry of Deeds, Book 1212 Page 295, and for a breach of the conditions in said deed contained, will be sold at public auction on the premises, on Tuesday, February 25, 1892, at three o'clock, in the afternoon, the premises conveyed by said deed of mortgage as follows:

A parcel of land and the buildings on the same, in the said Worcester, and bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a stone post set at the corner of land now or late of W. H. Gage, on the westerly side of Orient Street, and lying, northerly from Clarence Street, so called, thence southerly, on Orient Street sixty (60) feet, thence westerly, by Lot 25, ninety (90) feet and six (6) inches to a stake on Lot 24, thence northerly sixty (60) feet to W. H. Gage's land. Thence, easterly, ninety (90) feet, to the place of beginning. Containing about 550 square feet. This land will be sold subject to any unpaid taxes, liens, or assessments of whatever sort. Fifty (50) cents in money must be paid down at the time and place of sale, and the rest of the purchase money provided on delivery of the deed within ten (10) days.

Inflammation of the Bowels.

Take a strip of coarse cotton cloth three yards long and cut it in two lengthwise. Wet about half the length in cold water and bind about the bowels, having the wet part next to the skin. When it becomes warm repeat. This has cured chronic dysentery and cholera in infants caused by cutting teeth. Caution! It might be dangerous used in connection with some mineral medicines.

Very comfortable skirts and petticoats for the children can be made out of the father's underclothing in the following way: Take the woolen undervest, cut off the bottom, put on a waistband, and trim the edge with wool lace; the effect is quite pretty. For the shirts take the woolen drawers, and of the best pieces cut out the sleeves and body, and make up the same as the large undervests, only smaller.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

An authority counsels us to wipe our faces upward after washing them, particularly when the evil days draw nigh that bring those first indicators of age—wrinkles—on the lower part of the face. By using invariably the upward motion in drying, these wrinkles will be removed, and with it the tendency to undue fullness about the chin.

Very thick cream should be beaten with a fork. As fast as the froth is beaten skim it off. To mold whipped cream add dissolved gelatine; one-third of a box to one pint of thin cream (before whipping) is a good proportion, to which other ingredients, as sugar and flavoring, are to be added.

Long bags, the full length of dress or cloak, with hanging loops at top, save from creasing as well as from dust and moths.

When making white cakes, use one half teaspoon more of cream of tartar than soda, as this extra quantity of cream of tartar makes the egg whites stiffer.

Castor oil may be comfortably taken in hot milk, in a half-wineglass of weak punch, in hot water sweetened and highly flavored with essence of peppermint or wintergreen.

Salt mackerel should be well washed in tepid water, the thin, black skin on the inside scraped out, the head and tail cut off, and the fish soaked skin side up over night in a large pan full of cold water.—Boston Budget.

A good remedy for the toothache, is a piece of cotton saturated with strong ammonia, and placed in the cavity of the tooth.

A good liniment for strains is made of one-half ounce of wormwood, one-half ounce of oil of origanum, or majoram and one-half pint of alcohol.

For burns make a paste of lard and flour, and bind on the burn with soft linen, or stir lime water and sweet oil to a cream and apply.—Washington Home Magazine.

New York Fashions.

"Mrs. N." A handsome evening coiffure in Spanish style, showing puffs or loops of loosely twisted hair drawn high and having an ornament placed at the left. Another stylish mode of hair dressing, shows a figure 8, so placed that one half is on the top of the head and the other half at the back, where it forms a braided circlet. This is moreover, adapted to some popular shapes in hats and bonnets while at the same time, dressy for evening, in which case, ornamental pins can be added effectively.

"Laura S." Perfume sachets are in extraordinary favor, being tacked to portieres, placed inside of head rests, cushions, anywhere, indeed, that fancy may dictate and even hidden away under rugs, while closets for clothing and bureau drawers come in for special attention. Some ladies prefer atomizers, with which portieres, curtains, etc., are sprinkled and in view of free use, the perfume must be particularly pure and delicate. This doubtless accounts for the precedence given Maybells, both as a perfume proper and a toilet water suitable for atomizing or the bath.

Chrysanthemums for decorative purposes, are a rage. Pink comes first and next, yellow or white and sometimes the three colors are combined with charming result, as notably at a reception where the house was adorned in those hues. The debutante was dressed in pink, two friends in white and yellow respectively and they had bouquets of chrysanthemums to match. A pink chrysanthemum reception or party, is particularly pretty.

Silver teapots now consist of five pieces: coffee-pot, tea-pot, kettle, cream pitcher and sugar-bowl. In these, as in dishes or any other article for table use, the shapes are low and broad, and either in bright or oxidized finish, hammered and repousse work being fashionable for both styles. Butter is preferably made into little balls for which wooden spats come purposely and this mode in serving butter, has brought about the use of a butter pick instead of a knife. The caster being obsolete, fancy pitchers for oil or vinegar, with cups for mustard or other condiments, are in great vogue, to say nothing of individual pepper and salt bottles.

Gifts of a cup, saucer, and spoon to an engaged young lady, from her friends, is a fashionable idea and as may be imagined, the donations are sometimes so numerous as to require special accommodations. Antique specimens of ware with thin, battered surfaces of ante-revolutionary date, are particularly acceptable as being heirlooms and also in contrast with modern elegancies in the same line.

ROSALIND MAY.

By a very ingenious and original process, Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., of Lowell, Mass., are enabled to extract the essential properties of the materials used in the preparation of their famous "Ayer's Sarsaparilla," thus securing a purity and strength that can be obtained in no other way.

N. E. Agricultural Society.

The annual meeting of the New England Agricultural Society will be held in Poughman Hall, 178 Devonshire Street, Boston, on Tuesday, Feb. 2d. at 10 o'clock a.m. President J. Lewis Ellsworth of the Worcester Agricultural Society has perfected arrangements with the management of the Boston Albany Railroad whereby round trip tickets from Worcester to Boston can be had on the day of the meeting, for $1 35. The principal feature of the business to come before the meeting so far as local interest centers, is the location of the next exhibition of the New England Society.

It is said that Mrs. Warren, wife of the Wyoming senator, has voted for twenty years. She declares that it is no more trouble to go to the polls than to go to church, and makes the statement that women make fewer mistakes in using the Australian system in Wyoming than men do.

It matters little whether there is a rage for Silks, Satins, Velvets or anything else—

Pretty fresh Ginghams are still in your favor and as necessary as spring sunshine to you.

It seems a little odd to talk about Ginghams while snow is on the ground, and yet it is pleasant to talk about them.

The sight of them and the talking of them bring Spring-time and all its mysteries the nearer to us.

So, then, we are glad to welcome the first arrivals from the Gingham realm.

You, too, will like to see what there may be new and dainty.

You'll be busy with your fancies for spring dress and these pretty Scotch Ginghams will be woven into all your plans.

You must come and see what they are.

The Linens department is happy in receipt of 100 dozen of the Napkins you seem to admire so much.

It seems almost incredible the number of hundred dozens we have sold of these Napkins.

The cost is so little—12 1-2c each only—that it is strange that so much real goodness can be given for so very little.

Of course we need only remind you of the Printed India Silks.

They are here in all their glory,

In all their beauty,

In all their delicate loveliness.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1892.

No. 23

To Our Readers.

LIGHT is your paper; why don't you use it?

If you have visitors, send their names to LIGHT.

If you go away from the city, send word to LIGHT.

If you give a tea party or dinner, send particulars to LIGHT.

If you know of any thing, in a social way, that is pleasing to your let the public have it through LIGHT.

This paper will be your mouth-piece if you will give it an opportunity.

LIGHT does not want scandal, it will not deal in this, but it does wish all possible society data. Will you assist in furnishing? These columns are yours.

I'm no reformer, for I see more light
Than darkness in the world; mine eyes are quick
To catch the first dim radiance of the dawn,
And slow to note the cloud that threatens storm.
The fragrance and the beauty of the rose
Delight me so, slight thought I give its thorn;
And the sweet music of the lark's clear song
Stays longer with me than the night hawk's cry.
Even in this great thrope of pain called Life
I find a rapture linked with each despair,
Well worth the price of Anguish. I detect
More good than evil in humanity.
Love lights more fires than hate extinguishes,
And men grow better as the world grows old.
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Pope long since gave the world a rule as to the use of words, like this,

"Be not the first by whom the new is tried,
Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

Does not this couplet apply very well in the matter of so-called reforms? Many innovators and extremists would overthrow every theory to attain a desired end. On the other hand moss covered conservatives would molder before advancing a step.

Who shall tell as what the proper or golden mean is? To few is given the power to detect refracted truths from below our horizon, but we can at least, be awake to our situation and display a willingness to investigate.

It is no consolation to us that another thinks our fears groundless. The oft-repeated statement of the owner, that his dog will not bite, does not abate the stranger's apprehension, for he sees teeth and he hears a growl. We may chide a horse for being frightened at a bit of white paper, but the steed is scared all the same.

And this is just the situation in the diphtheria stricken neighborhood. Whether the disease emanates from the Dix Street School House or not, there are so many people who think it does that the school has been running, for some time, on almost or quite half numbers. The closing of the school and the fumigation of the premises with a proper connection of the closets with the sewers alone can restore confidence. The people in that part of Worcester are grateful to whatever agency that secured this consummation. The very least that can be done is to remove the grounds of offense. Let us hope that the diphtheria scare is effectually past.

People are not talking, now, so much as they will a few weeks hence about grade crossings. Of course, if elevated tracks must come and afford the only solution of the difficulty, the public has nothing to do but to yield as gracefully as possible. That the elevations will be a disfigurement goes without saying. In no way can they be made ornamental, but what cannot be cured must be endured. Rail roads must be had and the grades must be obtained; but the price for possession is a big one. The matter to Worcester people is much like Rapid Transit for Boston. An imperative necessity, but how? The problem before our City Government is a trying one. May it be solved for the good of all.

Causes of Crime.

If the examination of other sources of information than the census should result in showing that in some limited local area serious crime had increased out of proportion to the growth of the population, it would by no means follow that improved prison management is responsible for such increase. It is far more reasonable to attribute it to causes operating outside the prisons, to altered social conditions, to increasing wealth, the growth of great civic centers with their denser population, and the imperfect manner in which the laws assigned to suppress the causes of crime are enforced, particularly in cities. The increase of prison population, you will observe, is precisely in those prisons which prison reform has least influenced for good,—in the prisons where its precepts are most ignored, and where least effort is made to stem the rising tide of crime by the introduction of a reformatory discipline.—Rev. F. H. Winsp.

Books and Bookmen.

It is talked in Boston, among newspaper and book men that the author's corrections in the proof of General Butler's book cost more than the original composition. It looks as though the general didn't know his own mind when he was writing.

A modern Aladdin or the Wonderful Adventure of Oliver Munter. An Extravaganza in four acts by How and Pyle. Illustrated, New York, Harper and Brothers, 1892.

A dash of Arabian Nights with a suggestion of Fairy Land enable Mr. Pyle to make an absorbingly interesting volume. Any one who has read of the Alchemists and their long search after transmuting power along with the elixir of life will recognize some old acquaintances in the names given here. Mr. Pyle is ingenious and he weaves his ancient names most deftly with the woof of his fabric. Though perfectly conscious of the improbability of the whole tale we follow Oliver in his underground wanderings, his findings and his longings with as much interest as we would, were he an actual existence. Such diamonds! We have not com' so near wealth since the day that we followed Aladdin the first with his wonderful lamp into the bowels of the earth and saw the treasures by it revealed. The pictures, grim and ghostly, add not a little to the interest in the story. Happy he who can thus bring fancy into his control and, untrammelled by fact or reason, make the impossible seem actual. The time is that of Louis XIV and the scene France, of course. The writer has done far better with his ancient theme than many who have essayed to introduce the Elixir into their stories. His lively imagination and his quick wit have made every situation attractive. The reader who takes the book in hand will not care to lay it down till he has followed the boy Oliver in his adventures with the Devil leagued magician to the end of the story and the wizard's life. For sale by Sanford, Sawtelle Company.

Beautiful Snow.

Really snow fell when we expected rain. It not only fell but it staid for a few hours and Eastern Massachusetts never presented a handsomer sight than it did Wednesday morn'g. The exquisite imagery of Lowell was fully reproduced.

"Every pine and fir and hemlock,
Wore ermine tog' for an earl
And the poorest twig on the elm tree
Was ris'd i'ish deep with pearl."

It was a sight to remember. The firs were like enormous white plumes and the white birches were bent over to the ground as though they would make framework for innumerable wigwams.

Such was the country! White, white everywhere. Purity and cleanliness, the very personification of each, but Boston! Ah Boston! There's the rub! There is no beautiful snow in Boston. Snow there means slush and swear and no end of both. No one thinks of the much discussed poem there save to apply the "Trodden under foot" portion. The business portion of the city ought to have the rubber covering that Hellamy describes during the snow storm. There is, absolutely, no ray of relief in the whole business. The relief, however, comes when we turn our backs to the city, and travel homeward. The trees still retain their plumage, the fields are still white and life seems worth living. Thank God for the country and for the smaller cities where choicest blessings are not, at once, turned into curses.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, FEB. 6, 1892.

The Report of Postmaster-General Wanamaker for the year ending June 30, 1891, is a very valuable book. Not only does it contain data, bearing on the postal system, but it has numerous engravings, making clear the intricacies of one of the most important departments of the Government. It is a good volume to have handy for reference. LIGHT is under obligations for a copy.

A Hundred Years is a long time, but that is just the record behind the Greenfield Gazette and to celebrate this fact that enterprising Journal has gotten out a Centennial Edition. First there is a fac-simile of No. 1, dated Feb. 1, 1892. This it obtains through the American Antiquarian Society, that wonderful storehouse of American papers. Then there is an illustrated supplement sent to all subscribers. Besides, to be had for a small price, there is "The Centennial Gazette," an illustrated book of more than 100 pages. Only the Worcester Spy and two or three other papers in Massachusetts can lay claim to equal age. Publisher E. A. Hall is entitled to much credit for the way he has utilized his opportunity. The Gazette is one of the very best papers in the Commonwealth.

The "Home Maker" is the official organ of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and for the first three months of 1892 it will be sent to club members, only, for thirty cents. It is of exceeding interest to all those belonging to these organizations. Address (stating club) J. Martin Miller, manager, 44 East 14th Street, New York City.

J. A. McGaffey, a veteran of the Civil War, has laid on LIGHT's desk a valuable souvenir of Rebellion days in the shape of an elegantly printed congratulatory order from General Custer, bearing date of April 9, 1865. It forcibly recalls the incidents of that long chase and immortal consummation at Appomattox Court House.

In "The American Trotter" it would seem that the trade journal had reached about its acme. Forty pages, including cover, devoted to the trotting horse and his interests. The horse lover should have this paper. Published at Independence, Iowa. $2 a year.

LIGHT acknowledges from Mr. Fred

Knight, Secretary of Athelstan Lodge of A. F. and A. Masons, a roster of the lodge, prepared in most excellent shape. It contains a list of present officers, members, past masters and all necessary data as to communicant, committees, trustees and directors.

The Monthly Calendar of the Church of the Sacred Heart is at hand. It presents, as usual, the pertinent religious features of the month with a full account of the Fourth Annual Banquet of the Young Men's Lyceum, connected with the church. In addition, Fr. Conaty announces to appear Feb. 24, "The Catholic School and Home Magazine." This is to be 32 pages in extent. It will be, as its name implies, a magazine devoted to the ends and aims of the Catholic Church, with a strong local flavor. It will cost 50 cents a year. Many prizes are offered for the securing of subscriptions.

Dr. Arthur W. Eldred makes an important announcement in another column. Don't fail to read it. Dr. Eldred is prepared to do the very best of dental work.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Feb. 6, 1892.

Presented.

Life is a mixture. Lights and shades are blended. There are amenities as well as calamities, of the former there was an interesting example, Friday the 29th ult. at 1 p. m.

At Becker's Business College, for some days, there had been mysterious interviews and confabs but as the vigilant principal could find nothing to take open exceptions to he let them pass, but at the hour in question he was prevailed upon to forsake his office and to visit the upper school room and on his return he found his pupils massed. They had stolen a march on him. They held him captive. They knew the joy that for four weeks had filled his soul over the advent of his infant boy and having a fellow feeling for him, they had determined to show their sentiments by something tangible. Accordingly Harry G. Stoddard stepped forward and in behalf of his associate pupils and the teachers, in well chosen words, gave a silver cup into Mr. Becker's hand. It was engraved

The recipient was not there. His mother wouldn't allow him to go out. His tender weeks suggesting colds and other calamities; but his next of kin did the best he could for him, but 'tis said that no rule of the college could be found to apply in this case. He had to fall back on native genius and this hardly saved him. There were forty or more young people, with pencils in hand, ready to record every word that he uttered; but he had never responded for E. C. A. Becker Jr., before, it will be strange though if he doesn't have some all night sessions with him) and his feelings quite overcame him. When he did get his breath and his tongue, all thoughts of taking down his words were lost in admiration of his eloquence, for who could not talk from such a text, "Unto me, this day, a son is born." The event will not, soon, be effaced from the memories of those who bore a part in it. Would that life had more of such waves of gladness.

Capt. A. V. Newton has returned from his trip to Erie, Penn., where he conducted one of his inimitable Mock Trials.

Col. Horace B. Verry of this city, representative of the Governor's Staff at the 30th annual ball of the Washington Guards in Fitchburg, Jan. 29th.

Mr. A. W. Edson, agent of the State Board of Education, spoke in Petersham last Wednesday evening on education.

Orin H. Weston.

The city has lost another excellent citizen in the person of Mr. Weston who, after a long illness, died at his residence, 13 Harrington Avenue, Sunday the 31 ult. He was nearly 70 years old. He was a native of Connecticut, a tanner by trade. He was a prominent member of the Baptist church. He leaves a son, Walter B. and a daughter, widow of the late Andrew Hair. Mr. Weston's funeral was attended from his late residence Wednesday at 2 p.m. Many friends and relatives were present.

Charles Spurgeon.

Ever since that stroke of illness, months since, a sympathetic public has hoped that the great preacher might again stand in Tabernacle pulpit, but it was not to be. Jan. 31 he died in Menton, France. He was born in 1834, so he was far from being old as is Gladstone and others, yet active in affairs, but measured by his work he was old beyond almost all his compeers. The following, written in 1890, tells how he talked to a Worcester traveller.

"A Sunday in London. It is the 6th day of October, and I am resolved to hear Spurgeon. Fortunately for me, I am located near the Strand, so a ride of half an hour takes me across the Waterloo Bridge, and to a point near the Metropolitan Tabernacle. Already people are assembling, though it is nearly an hour before the hour of beginning, viz: 11 a.m. To insure a seat, I take an envelope, handed to me, place therein a coin and drop it into a box at hand. I am then shown to an aisle seat and there I sit till a quarter of 11. The vast room, said to be the largest Protestant auditorium in the world, fills rapidly. There are many, like myself, who are shown to seats, and there are more waiting for the tinkle of the five minutes bell, when every one may sit where he can find a place. What a letting down of seats in the aisles! There seems to be a simultaneous swoop for positions. Just at 11 o'clock Spurgeon, followed by his deacons, comes into his pulpit, a structure built well out into the body of the hall, on a level with the first gallery. There is a second one also, so that he is well above his audience on the floor and not too far away from the upper loft. This pulpit reminds me of the deck of a vessel, with a stout railing around the same. He announces the hymns and, under leadership, the audience, without any musical accompaniment, sings; and how it sings! It has been reared to do just this thing. The leader, to prevent dragging, scarcely pauses from the beginning to the end of his verse. Mr. Spurgeon's reading of the Bible is accompanied by excursions explanatory and suggestive. Unless it be Mr. Moody, he has no rival in this particular form of work. Then the sermon. He tells the story of Jacob, who becomes Israel through conversion. My neighbor, on my right, is a stranger too, and I ask him if he has ever heard the preacher? "Once, twenty-five years ago," is the reply. "When the simple, earnest story is done, I ask, 'Is he all there, is the fervent answer. And why this popular hold? There certainly are more eloquent men in London, for he clings to the back of his chair, leans upon his table, and only at the end of his sermon, does he advance to the rail of his pulpit and cease to be almost awkward. Who can tell the secret of success? He touched the popular ear long since, and constantly, in all the intervening years, he has not ceased for an instant to please the ear and to reach the hearts of his hearers."

Grace Church people have missed Miss Flora Miner for their choir for two successive Sundays. It seems that she is singing in the Unitarian Church in Uxbridge.

SAVED BY A PROOF READER.

What Might Have Appeared in a Certain Newspaper.

In a certain western newspaper office the gentleman whose business it is to record the fluctuations of the live stock market sits across from the young man to whose lot it falls to report wedding ceremonies. Both are graphic writers and enjoy that latitude of expression characteristic of western journalism. Both use the same kind of paper, and their penmanship is not unlike. Not long ago the wedding reporter was suddenly called out of the office and left in the middle of the table several sheets of paper on which was a description of a fashionable wedding. These sheets were gathered up by the live stock writer when he finished his report, and the two stories became mixed. This is what the zealous care of a proof reader, later in the evening, saved from reaching the public eye:

"The church was elaborately decorated with holly and evergreen, and the altar was hidden in a wealth of flowers. Out of the recesses rose rare tropical plants, and from the ceiling hung fifteen western veals, which at this time of the year are scarce and correspondingly dear at six to eight and a half cents a pound. There was also an active demand for choice lambs, and farmers east of the Mississippi river can profitably turn to sheep raising and take the bride, who wore a gown of white corded silk, a creation of Worth's, with pearl ornaments.

"Then came the maid of honor, the cousin of the bride, Miss Henrietta Blower, of Chicago, wearing a dress of white tulle, with diamond ornaments, and she was followed by a small bunch of Montana sheep, which bleated most piteously as they were driven on board and shipped to the Winter hotels in Bermuda. They will there be cut en train and slightly decolette, and after the rest of the party had reached the rail the minister turned and said impressively: I cannot bid more than 6½ cents for state veals, but cablegrams from London quote refrigerated beef at a price that will enable me to pay $4.90 for a car of choice Indiana beeves, and hearing this there was a rush for the young married couple, and the bride fell into the arms of her father, who is known to bear a striking resemblance to—a Connecticut ox weighing 1,875 pounds. The market here took an upward turn, and the guests, who numbered about 200, were served with a sumptuous dinner at the house of the bride.—New York Times.

Worcester Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, will hold a social in Grange Hall next Tuesday evening.

Lawless.

The adage "Give a beggar a horse and he'll ride to the D—!" never had a better illustration than on the property near Green Hill Pond. Though private, the pond was free to those who chose to skate there, but in the spirit of this "Free" country, the rowdies broke into the boat house and destroyed all that was breakable. And yet the very parties thus offending are also crying loudest for government aid and support. "Be decent first."

Brave Deeds.

BY N. A. M. ROE.

They told of their lovers, all three,
And of the brave deeds they had done,
But Jessie with tears in her eyes,
Confessed she had never had one.

Her lover? he never had come,
And Cupid—she guessed he had missed her,
So I—well I couldn't stand that,
Cupid—her lover—kissed her!

And now when the girls talk to him
Of bravery noble and bold,
My lady love smiles as she says,
"The bravest deeds never are told."

The following from the Boston Saturday Gazette would indicate that Boston library venture had not succeeded so well as Worcester's.

"From all accounts it would seem that the interior of the New Public Library is a blunder; that all the faults of the old are repeated in it, and that it is miserably adapted to the purpose for which it was intended. Considering the amount of money that has been expended on the structure, this state of affairs is of far more consequence than is the heavy, tasteless and unimpressive architectural effect of the exterior. According to present appearances, the new Bates Hall is a vast and lofty room, difficult to heat and ventilate, poorly adapted to the proper care and storage of books; a room so ill-advisedly arranged that the delivery of books to visitors cannot be accomplished without expending delays and annoyances to the public. Under present conditions at the old library, the delivery of books in Bates Hall is none too prompt; and if this evil is to be intensified in the new building, there will be something very like a revolt on the part of the public. It is bad enough for the public to have paid so much money for a pile whose exterior disfigures the spacious square in which it rears its clumsy proportions; but it is worse if the interior should prove to be the unpardonable mistake it is said to be by those experts who have examined it carefully. Space appears to have been wasted with equal ignorance and ruthlessness, and utility to have been sacrificed to show. The whole business has been bungled from the outset, and there is every indication that the new Public Library building will prove a huge and irremediable failure."

Salem Witches.

Recently LIGHT referred to the desirableness of securing data as to the descendants of those falsely accused and executed in Salem 1692. Those descended from Mrs. Nourse alone, number many hundred. Add to those descending from the other victims and we should have many thousands. A small gift from each one would erect upon Gallows Hill a suitable memorial. Is not this attainable? A card is recently received from Mr. John D. Ames of Binghamton, New York, who was once a Worcester resident and who is connected with the Nourse family, expressing his interest in this project. It need not be a monument to America's shame, but a tardy recognition of the heroism of those people who died rather than confess a lie. The scheme should be started in this bi-centennial year.

The Boston Theaters.

BOSTON, Feb. 4.

There are some very interesting attractions in this week's dramatic menu. At the Hollis, Monday evening, Julia Marlowe opened her regular season here, appearing for the first time in Boston as Beatrice, in "Much Ado About Nothing," and received, as she always does, a most cordial greeting. It is perhaps as difficult a part as any she has yet assumed, and of course she would be apt to suffer some in criticism from comparison with such a Beatrice as Ellen Terry gave us a few years ago.

Miss Marlowe's beautiful face and graceful figure made her physically almost an ideal Beatrice, and she reads Shakespeare's lines as few actresses in this country do. Her voice is particularly charming, "a beautiful thing in a woman," and she is the coming actress in her line in our country. Later on she will appear as Juliet, Rosalind and Viola, parts in which she is very much admired here at the Hub.

A new comic opera at the Globe, "The Tar and Tartar," brings as principals several favorites. Marion Manola Mason, wife of the popular J. B. Mason, formerly leading man at the Museum, is playing the first part in a very pleasing manner and received quite an ovation. Digby Bell, that very funny, clever comedian, has a most laughable part and introduces several topical songs that go with great effect, particularly one that is becoming quite ripe, "But oh what a difference in the morning." Everything he does is always very comical. His wife, Laura Joyce Bell, is in the cast and does splendidly. Hubert Wilkie, a first-rate singer, and Josephine Knapp are in it too. Rather pretty music, no plot at all to speak of, considerable fun, and that's the story.

Boucicault's favorite piece, "The Shaughraun," in which he was imitable, has been put on at the Museum, with Wilson as Conn and is quite a success. If you had never seen Boucicault in this part you would like Wilson better, though he plays it very well indeed, makes a hit in fact, as he about always does, he is such a careful, intelligent actor, and his make up is admirable, but it is not the old Conn we used to know. Miriam O'Leary plays Moya, as spiritedly and well as ever. She has recently become Mrs. Collins, her husband being a physician in the city, and this is her last season at the old Museum. She is a great favorite and will be missed exceedingly.

E. L. Davenport, their leading man, is intending to leave after this season, so you see there will quite a tossing up amongst the ranks at this old play house. He has done some first-class work this past year and will have plenty of good wishes for any new venture he may undertake.

The Boston Theater is the scene of a war drama every night called "Shiloh," a play built on the common conventional lines, that reminds one very much of the "Drummer Boy" that the Grand Army gives in your city, only it did not strike me as being so good. Perhaps I was less impressive, but a great many seemed to enjoy it, judging from the applause.

"The Lost Paradise" still holds the fort at the Tremont, to as good business as ever.

That theater has been full ever since it started, a pretty good record, even for a theater.

Robert Downing, that bright young tragedian, is playing a good engagement at the Grand Opera House and in another week the new Bowdoin Square Theater is to be christened. One would think we are getting well filled up with theaters, but they all seem to prosper and do well, so let them come, "the more the merrier," naturally, and Boston is growing fast enough to stand the expense. The Bostonians are at the Tremont, in "Robin Hood," great business and good work as usual, but you know them in your city as well and favorably as we do here.

WATSON

The thirtieth anniversary of the Roanoke Island engagement will be celebrated by the Roanoke Association at the American House, Boston, Monday, Feb. 8. Chaplain G. S. Ball of the 21st Massachusetts regiment will contribute a paper on "Gen. Burnside and the Roanoke Engagement." The business meeting will be held at 1 o'clock, and dinner will be served at 2 p.m.

Barnard, Sumner & Co.

In a paper read before the Worcester Society of Antiquity, May 4, 1880, Mr. H. H. Chamberlin read as follows:

"Henry H. Chamberlin commenced business with L. C. Clark in 1834, in Paine's Block; the next year, he opened the little old store left vacant by the death of Capt. Asa Hamilton and relinquished his business to Barnard, Sumner & Co., in 1857. This house has for many years occupied a leading position among the dry goods establishments of this city. If their courtesy will allow me the claim of having been the founder of their business, it is only as the acorn is the germ of the spreading tree, and illustrates the adage that 'all oaks from little acorns grow.'"

In 1860, the population of the city was 24,060. Thirty-two years have more than trebled, have almost quadrupled the population of our city, but the business of this firm has more than kept pace with this increase.

By limitation, the old firm ended the last day of January and a new corporation came into existence. Of this Mr. Lewis Barnard is president, Mr. George Sumner, vice-president, and Mr. Otis E. Putnam, treasurer; James C. Allen, secretary; Wm. F. Freeman, manager; Edward P. Sumner and Arthur D. Putnam, directors.

The first three names are too well known in this city to need any statement save that they represent an aggregate of 135 years in this house, since 1855 established on the very site still occupied. Mr. Allen has an experience of twenty years and Mr. Freeman of eleven, while Messrs Sumner and Putnam, sons of the vice president and treasurer, respectively, have been five years employed. There is nothing sensational in the ways of this house. The visitor, today, will find many employees who were behind the same counters ten and even fifteen years ago. Napoleon's soldiers carried marshal's batons in their knapsacks. So in this business, from youngest to oldest, every one knows what it is to serve. The capital stock of the corporation is $300,000, of which the first three names carry, by far, the greater part. The new name is, "Barnard, Sumner and Putnam Co."

Paderewski.

Next week's issue of LIGHT will contain a half-tone cut and sketch of the life of that great pianist, Paderewski, acknowledged by the critics as the musical wonder of the nineteenth century. Worcester patrons of the art should deem themselves fortunate in being favored with an opportunity to hear this great artist, when such a city as Portland, Me., offered him $1,000 for two performances and was refused. On Monday evening, February 22, Washington's birthday, he will give one recital in Association Hall. This will be no ordinary event. Great credit is due the managers of the affair for the energetic manner in which they have done everything in their power to give this artist a reception worthy the reputation of Worcester as a music loving community. Subscribers are entitled to make a selection of seats on February 13th, three days in advance of the public.

Miss Clara P. Fitzgerald, a niece of Dr. Mary V. O'Callaghan, is to take a course in medicine in one of the leading colleges in New York City.

Dr. J. M. Stevens, the genial veterinary surgeon in the Burnside Building, is out after a six-weeks' siege with pneumonia. Good nature pulled him through.

Mr. Charles A. Hoppin, Jr., manager of the advertising department of the Boston Store, has been ill during the past week with a severe cold.

The Chamberlain District Farmers' Club will meet next Thursday evening at Chamberlain Farm, on Salisbury Street, the residence of S. A. Burgess, and Caleb A. Wall will read a paper on "Life and Early Records of Chamberlain District."

Mr. Frank N. Hair, son of the late Capt. Charles N. Hair, is meeting deserved success as teacher of music in Baker University, Baldwin, Kansas. Prof. Hair was once a High School boy in this city and has many friends here.

At Mr. B. D. Allen's studio, 173 Main Street, next Tuesday evening, a musicale will be given in which Mrs. Mary L. Adams, soprano; Mr. B. D. Allen pianist and Miss Nellie L. Ingraham, accompanist, will take part. The program consists of some of the very best of music and promises a rare musical treat.

Y. M. C. A. Course.

Next Thursday evening the Tufts College Glee and Banjo Clubs and John Burgess Weeks, reader, will give the third entertainment in the second series.

Boys' Club.

Superintendent Burgess reports commendable progress in this very meritorious organization. Not to mention other very pleasant features, this item seems most worthy of notice: 1,009 boys washed in the building during the month of January. If cleanliness be next to Godliness and who could dare to contradict it, this fact has done much for the heavenly way. Boys are now taking books out for home reading. Good again, and painstaking, self-sacrificing people are teaching classes. Success to the Boys' Club.

The late John Boyle O'Reilly is commemorated by a bust in the Catholic University in Washington.

Mr. Parkhurst of Clinton wants all lobbyists in the State House confined to the basement thereof.

LEICESTER.

Again this town is connected with the world at large by electric cars. The welcome sound of the trolley was heard Monday morning after a rest of eleven days. One man was heard to say that it was the most lonesome week he had spent in Leicester, tho' an old resident, for only two or three times a day could he get to the city.

Invitations are out for a Leap Year party at Leicester Hotel next Tuesday evening.

The local Christian Endeavor Society took charge of the meeting Wednesday evening in celebration of the anniversary of the General Society.

To a New Born Son.

All hail, hale come to the Strawberrings!

Plump little cherub with the dimpled hand,

Are you, so young, one of the snow bringers?

It cannot be you come from Switzerland.

I see (in fancy) now, in infant grace

(The fairest picture limned by nature's art.)

Your warm, flushed cheek pressed to dear mamma's face,

Your rosy form against her loving heart.

Heaven smile on all, and make the mother glad

And strong, aright to lead her growing brood!

For Christ loves dearly every lass and lad

That's truthful, useful, diligent and good.

Worcester Mass. A. L.

An Evangelist at Fault.

When the American revivalists, Messrs Moody and Sankey, visited this country in 1875, special arrangements were made for holding services in the town of Derby; and accordingly a certain number of evangelists were selected to visit the various places in the district where the meetings were held.

One of those happened to arrive at an unsavory street called Walker-Jane Ward, which to him appeared not very inviting. The first house which received his evangelical attention was tenanted with a very sharp-eyed youth, who seemed to be the only occupant of the tumble-down dwelling.

This youth had attained the mature age of thirteen, and, according to his appearance, looked ready for anything in the shape of a "bit of fun," as he termed it.

The boy's mother was in gaol, but the whereabouts of the father could not be satisfactorily accounted for.

After the man of God had explained his mission, he commenced talking of heaven and hell to the bold bad boy, who grinned and showed his teeth as the evangelist proceeded.

He also told him of the great influence of Satan for evil, as well as of the omnipresence of his Satanic Majesty, and the youth stared at him as if he could hardly believe what the man of God was saying.

"Do you mean to say that the devil can enter this ere kitchen?"

"Yes!" authoritatively answered the surprised evangelist.

"Can he get into our bedroom?" was the next inquiry made by the bold bad boy.

"Yes," was again the response.

"Can he get into our back-yard?" was the next question given by the youth.

"Yes!" was once more the response of the man of God.

To this last answer the boy's eyes sparkled with delight, and, looking the minister full in the face, he said—

"That's a lie, becuz we ain't got no back-yard."

The effect can be better imagined than described.—London Paper.

Throwing Away Time.

It was on the rear platform of a street car, as a crowd was going home from the theater. "Let's see," mused a man who was jammed on the railing to the one on his left, "have we been introduced?" "I think not. My name is Taylor." "Ah! And mine is Porter. Mr. Taylor, you are throwing away time to get my watch. It is an old one, and out of repair, and won't bring you $2."—Detroit Free Press.

Only a Dog.

BY GEO. MC ALFER.

And Fido is dead! Good Fido!

He was only a dog in the humble walks of life it is true, and could boast of no patrician lineage or bench show conquests—who lived his day and is not—and why should he occasion further thought or regret?

Ah! there are dogs and dogs, some of the most worthless of whom passed a fampered existence in the homes of luxury and who when dead are accorded marble mausoleums; some that never deserved the friendship of man and who cannot be too soon forgotten, and others whose intelligence an approximates the human that it would seem as if they must have crossed the border line of instinct and entered the domain of reason, who so endear themselves by ready adaptation to and earnest endeavor in their master's service that we part with keen regret and accord them a prominent and honorable place in our memory.

Fido, the subject of this sketch, first saw light on the sea-coast of Old Virginia, and his main ancestral line was clearly that of the Irish setter, although a cross was apparent that resembled the Chesapeake Bay dog.

He came into the possession of Captain Andrews of Little Island, when quite young and he never parted ownership with him. He was intelligent, affectionate, cool and level-headed beyond that of any dog it has ever been the writer's lot to know, and he would be glad to learn of, and would go many miles to see another such, if one exists, that would compass such a range of usefulness to the sportsman and perform his part as well.

Without attempting to enumerate all of his good qualities, let the writer indicate their variety, range and trend, by relating the varied experience of a day's outing with him in Southern game regions.

It is decided before retiring that the writer with McChesney as boatman and gunner, should attempt to outwit the canvass backs in the morning.

Leaving Captain Andrew's snugery on Little Island before daybreak for Shell Point some miles distant, Fido is exultant and runs before us unbidden to the landing and is down charged on top of the decoys in the bow of the Spray before we reach the shore. We encounter adverse wind and have to tack so often that progress is slow, so that grey streaks and faint rose tints betokening dawn are perceptible in the East before we reach our destination.

Fido's head is constantly describing a tangent and his keen and watchful eye is ever on the alert at his self-imposed task of lookout. He no sooner discovers a bunch of fowl in the distance than he gives three notes of warning—im, im, im, in quick succession, and down crouching, not another sound or movement from him until they are out of sight. This he many times repeats before we land at our blind, when he takes his place in the sedge grass and cane brake and does duty as before.

When the gun is fired, if no duck falls into the water he does not leave his place, but the instant one strikes the water he is in, and, if only wounded, he sets up a yip, yip, yip, and after him with such rapidity that the duck does not dive below the surface and disappear, but half swimming, half flying, makes every effort to escape. Fido has been known to keep in pursuit and capture the fugitive after a chase of over three miles in ice-cold water.

And if so happened that some were killed outright and others only wounded, with rare discrimination he would single out and capture the wounded ones, before retrieving the others.

During the early morning hours we had very good shooting, but between nine and ten o'clock the wind died out, the day became warm and sunny, and duck shooting was over until their return to the feeding grounds toward evening. Mac proposed that we go over to Long Island and try for snipe and quail and perhaps we might get some black duck in the numerous lakelets on the Island which furnish fine feeding grounds for them, and where, being surrounded by rank growth of cane and flag which renders access to them extremely difficult, they remain in comparative security. We soon make landing near a hog wallow and are scarcely on land before we are greeted with saipe, saipe as hither and thither dart the cork-screwing snipe. We punish a number that Fido retrieves with the promptness of a master in the art, being steady at heel when not so engaged. We cross over a ridge of land that runs parallel with the island, and which is under cultivation, and no sooner do we cross a ditch on the opposite side than Fido is off into the brown grass and scrub pine.

"Oh my! but we will have some fun now," said Mac.

"Why, what's up?" said I.

"He's after a coon and—"

But before the words are ended the battle has begun. Razzle, dazzle, spit, yelp, howl, snarl, and dog and coon are whirling round and round, over and under, and finally emerging into a little open patch the coon lays firm hold of the dog's cheek and makes him howl with pain. I rush in to dispatch the animal, but am stopped by Mac, who says—

"Let them have it out! I'll bet on Fido every time."

Fido whirls round and round with such rapidity as to break the hold of the coon, landing him fully ten feet away. Before he could regain his feet Fido closed in and soon ended the contest. We continued on to the little lake at the end of the creek, and quietly and carefully making our way up to its margin, when up jumps a bunch of seven black ducks and we succeeded in dropping five of them. The lake is so boggy that we could not have recovered a single duck, but in sprung Fido and retrieved every one. We then turned our steps toward the upper end of the Island, some miles distant, where a crop of cereals had been harvested, to look for quail, or partridge as they are called in Virginia. Reaching a grove of scattering pine we sat down on a knoll to eat our lunch, Fido dropping down in front of us.

For some time we noticed that he seemed fidgety and restless, but thinking it might be owing to undue and excessive exertion during the forenoon we gave the matter little thought until he quietly got up and with cautious, stealthy step went quartering behind us a few feet and pounced upon a huge black snake fully six feet long that lay coiled up in the sunshine. He soon shook the life out of him, but was so loth to desist that Mac had to take the snake on the end of a stick and carrying him away seventy five feet, or a hundred yards hung him on a knot that projected from a pine tree some feet above the ground.

He had not covered more than half the distance on his return before a buzzard bore down and seizing his snakeship made off with him to enjoy his noon-day meal.

Soon after we are in the stubble and ragweed, and right and left quarters, Fido attending strictly to business in hand, as alert and active as though he had hunted nothing but quail all his life. He challenges, he roasts them in winding and devious pathways, and finally straightens out as rigid as a statue. We close in and flush the birds and Mac's unerring gun scores three, while the writer is content with one. At command Fido retrieves them with as much care and pride as any sportsman could wish. We follow up and secure five more before returning home. The events of the day and the performance of Fido did not impress me at the time as bordering on the marvelous, but on our trip back to Little Island he so promptly took his place in the bow to watch for fowl as usual that the writer could not forbear to speak of his varied accomplishments, when Mac said to see him at his best he must be seen after the cotton tails, and proposed that we drop down to the lower end of the Island where there was some scrub growth, and give them a run. This we did, and taking our place on some little mounds of shell and sand we soon see bunny at full speed, closely followed by the dog.

He turns him to the left and heads him around by Mac whose old reliable ends the chase. Fido at once quarters around and soon jumps another who leads him a much longer run, but he too, true to his instinct, turns to the place of departure, where he is stopped in his tracks by the leaden messenger of death.

We capture several more and return to the house, having killed a larger variety of game in a single day than it has ever been my lot to do before or since, having had the benefit and pleasure of such a dog as I never again expect to see, and which, without exaggeration I may call a marvel of his species.

He has compassed the limit of his days and is gone.

He sleeps where the woo-oo-oo-oo of the swan and the varied notes of the sea fowl blend with the ceaseless murmur of the ocean as it sings a fitting requiem; while a friendly hand places this tribute upon his humble grave.—Amateur Sportsman for January.

Worcester, Mass.

Citizens Bank.

The resignation of Cashier Hammond necessitates a moving up and last Saturday the promotion of David R. Taber to be teller and of Walter A. March to be book-keeper was announced. Congratulations are extended.

Since some of the papers are calling our war men jingoes, it is well to revive the song that gave its name to that party in English politics. It began:

"We don't want to fight, but by Jingo, if we do,
We have the ships, we have the men, we have the money too."

Beware of a man of one book.
Old Proverb.

Each of Prof. McMaster's two first volumes of his "History of the American People" has had a large sale—said to be 17,000 copies. Before finding a publisher, the author several times had his work rejected.

Lee and Shepard are about to bring out a most remarkable book under the title "Dreams of the Dead." The story is a most realistic one, yet Poe never wrote a more weird and gruesome tale. The most astonishing experiences are related in the most matter-of-fact way. The book deals with the occult, and treats of other than material things. The author holds that those whom a materialistic judgment calls dead, are only beginning to live, and in the form of these dreams, he has veiled the teaching of a great truth. The book is entirely original, and maintains a very high tone from beginning to end. No one can read it, especially if they read between the lines, without becoming a better man or woman. The author, who is well known and active in industrial reform, writes under a nom de plume, and a great deal of interest has been aroused among those who have read the advance sheets, as to his identity.

Rudyard Kipling, the story writer, was married in London Jan. 18 to Miss Balestier, sister of the young American novelist Wolcott Balestier, who died recently at Dresden from typhoid fever.

"Table Talk."

The February issue of this useful magazine is now ready for its many readers, who, doubtless, like ourselves, are quite ready to devour all the good things which Mrs. Rorer has spread out in its columns. In the contents this month, which are even more varied than usual, will be found a fresh department entitled "A New Bill of Fare," and it certainly promises to add another attractive feature to the many which the magazine already possesses. "A Plea for the Turnip," "In the Dining Room," "Fun for February Evenings," "Grapes," "Capricious Washington," and a paper on "Table Decorations," are all readable and help to bear up the reputation of Table Talk as a magazine for the home. Published by the Table Talk Publishing Company, 1,113 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. $1.00 a year.

The Ladies' Home Journal.

A most unique magazine is the February Ladies' Home Journal, entirely made up, as it is, in prose, verse and fiction by daughters of famous parentage, some of the "daughters" being famed themselves. Thirty "daughters" are represented, each by an article, story or poem, and a more curious and successful innovation in magazine literature has not been made for years. The issue is in every respect a surprise, and is a powerful argument in behalf of hereditary genius. Hawthorne's daughter, Mrs. Lathrop, for example, has an excellent story; Mildred Howells, the novelist's daughter, writes a very sweet poem; the daughters of Charles Dickens, Thackeray and Horace Greeley all write of their famous fathers; President Harrison's daughter, Mrs. McKee, surprises by writing a very strong article on "The Training of Children"; Gladstone's daughter tells "How a Woman's College Begun" of which she is Vice-Principal; General Sherman's daughter tells a clever war story; Julia Ward Howe presents three literary daughters; Ed-Senator Ingall's clever daughter, Ethel, sketches Mrs. Leland Stanford; Jefferson Davis's favorite daughter, "Winnie" portrays "The American Girl Who Studies Abroad" from her own experience; and these are followed up by the daughters of Sir Morell Mackenzie, "Mrs. Alexander" and Richard Henry Dana; Miss Brandley, writes of the "Queens of Westminster Abbey," of which her father is Dean, and as a fitting complement to the fore-part of the issue, Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher, Mrs. Admiral Dahlgren, Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney and other famous mothers tell "How to Train a Daughter." This is, indeed, a curious number, and the most novel ever issued by a magazine. None of the Journal's departments are omitted, the "famous daughters" occupying the fore-part of the magazine, while Dr. Talmage, "Bob" Burdette, Margaret Bottoime and all the other Journal editors form the rear-guard. Such an issue is worth five times its modest price of ten cents. Published, at one dollar per year, by the Curtis Publishing Company of Philadelphia.

The Postmaster-General's annual report, just made public, shows that the usual annual deficit in the finances of the Department is gradually but surely disappearing. It amounted for the last year to only a little more than $6,000,000, and that, too, in spite of the fact that the revenue suffered a loss of over $1,000,000 owing to the passage of the antilobby bill; and the estimates for 1893, which have been prepared for the information of Congress, show that the service, which, as is clearly indicated by the report, has been made to improve, even at a lower cost, will reach a self-sustaining basis about July 1, 1893. The increase of the revenue last year, in spite of the loss on the transportation of lottery mail, is over $5,000,000.

As one looks over the pages of the February St. Nicholas, at every moment the eye is attracted by some bright thought in text or drawing. At the very front door comes J. H. Dolph's clever dog and cat picture, showing a plump puppy evidently fed to repletion graciously consenting to the disposal of his dinner by his friends the kittens. Whoever gives away what he does not want may read the parable with the thought "de te fabula narratur."

Then there is the picture of Sir Jeffrey Hudson, the dwarf of eighteen inches stature, who figures so prominently in the history of the times of Henrietta Maria of England. How he was vanquished by a turkey-cock, and how in turn he overcame an opponent in a serious duel; how he was teased by the King's giant, and how he was captured by pirates—is told in the text of the first of these articles on "Historic Dwarfs" so carefully prepared by Mary Shears Roberts. Turning over more pages, we see a scientific looking diagram that seems more fitted to the columns of a grave treatise than to those of a child's magazine. But we discover that it is "A Record of Master Harry's Ups and Downs," his variations in cheerfulness during the absence of his mother from home; and then we wonder why a set of similar charts would not serve as a record of deportment, scholarship or what not, to spur to diligence or reprove from sloth a family of children. It is another idea for which we have to thank the good St. Nicholas. Our minds are diverted from these thoughts by Mr. Taber's spirited drawing showing a company of Dutch soldiers charging over the ice on skates, and we eagerly read of "The Battle on Skates," and therein learn how the Duke of Alva commanded his Spanish warriors to skate in order that they might meet the Dutch upon more equal terms. What a fortnight of bruises and of pigeon's wings that must have been for the unhappy Spaniards!

But what is this? Here is, of all things, "A Strike in the Nursery!" The children are drawn as in revolt, with banners, declaring their ultimatum. It is a procession calculated to strike terror to a home tyrant, for even the goat—and a toy goat at that—bears upon his back the legend "Brown paper for me!"

How the children of a quarter of a century ago would have reveled in such a magazine. No doubt they enjoy it today, but their palates must be somewhat cloyed, for, like the princes and princesses of the fairy-tales, children are now fed on sweet-meats daily.

The most timely article in the February Century is the one written by Mr. C. C. Buel, assistant editor of the magazine, which records the results of a personal investigation by him, in behalf of the readers of The Century, into the history, methods, and designs of a just now notorious institution. The title of the paper is "The Degradation of a State; or the Charitable Career of the Louisiana Lottery." Mr. Buel goes back to the time when the lottery interests of the country were centered in New York City, and shows that the Louisiana Lottery was established for the benefit of New York gamblers and lottery dealers. The article describes the people who have been the chief beneficiaries of this extensive gambling institution, and exposes the methods of bribery and political corruption by which the franchise was obtained, is maintained, and, as is now feared, is to be extended.

This number is also made notable by the posthumous story of Wolcott Balestier, who is the co-author with Mr. Kipling of "The Naulahka." "Rebely" is novel in plot and situation, the principal characters being a conductor on a far Western railroad, and two young women, one the manager of an eating house, and the other a telegraph operator. Mr. Balestier's friends consider this story a justification of the high hopes that were entertained for the future of this brilliant writer.

Apropos of Washington's Birthday, Mr. Charles Henry Hart, of Philadelphia, has an illustrated paper giving hitherto unpublished portraits of General and Mrs. Washington, and Nelly Custis.

A most notable paper, by Edward Atkinson, on "The Australian Registry of Land Titles," will doubtless help forward a needed reform which seems to have made a start in this country. "Recent Discoveries concerning the Gulf Stream," by J. E. Pillsbury, is a very fresh, curious, and valuable contribution to an old subject.

In a profusely illustrated article on "Pioneer Days in San Francisco," Dr. John Williamson Palmer, the well known writer, describes, from personal knowledge, the adventurous life and diverse types that lent romantic color to the origin and growth of the metropolis of the West.

Dr. Wheatley's concluding paper on "The Jews in New York" is strikingly illustrated by a group of five artists, and contains information on this very timely and interesting subject never before gathered together.

Love and Marriage in Japan.

Sir Edwin Arnold, who has been enjoying an interesting trip through the United States, has made a careful study of the conditions which govern the family in Japan and embodies his ideas in a paper called "Love and Marriage in Japan" in the February number of The Cosmopolitan. The article is illustrated by the quaintest possible Japanese sketches running down the sides and across the bottom of each page. An excellent photograph of W. D. Howells, serves as a frontispiece, and his work as a writer of fiction is reviewed in the same number by H. H. Boyesen. The President of John's Hopkins University gives a most practical paper for parents on "Boys and Boys' Schools," illustrated by cartoons of the famous Attwood. Murray Halstead turns back lovingly to his early farm days, and tells of the "Pets and Sports of a Farmer Boy." The petroleum industry fully illustrated; An Afghan Story by Archibald Forbes; The Story of the Brazilian Republic by Adams, late minister to that country; and The Leading Amateurs of the United States in photography, are other leading articles of the month.

The Salem Press Historical and Genealogical Record, for January 1892 is at hand. There is not as much as we might expect, considering the year and place, of matter pertaining to the Witchcraft Delusion. A fine portrait of Governor Bradstreet forms the frontispiece, and there is a long article by Robert Rantoul concerning his tomb. Perley Derby gives an abstract of Essex County Town Records 1636-1692. The ancestry of General Ethan Allen is set forth very clearly. Mary Lindcott's Diary is given. There is a general account of the Humphry family of Harlington, R. I. Perhaps the most notable item in the pamphlet, is the call for the formation of an American Genealogical Society. There is certainly a place for such an organization in this country.

After the April number, which rounds out vol. 11, of the Record, it will be issued as a monthly. It should meet a cordial reception. Let us have more facts and less fiction.

The Hyde Park Historical Register for January completes the first volume. A quarterly, the four numbers are highly creditable to the town and clearly indicates what other towns should do in the way of trying to preserve their local history. There are fine portraits of Gen. Franklin Radford and John Kellery Paper. "Reminiscences of Twenty Years Ago" introduces the name of H. M. Cable, who was once an active citizen, but now in Chicago. The interval is not a long one, but it has wrought great changes in Hyde Park even.

Dams Care by Hermann Sudermann. Translated from the German by Bertha Oelweck. New York Harper and Brothers, 1891.

The translator has done her work well with just two exceptions. Thus on page 3, "I should have liked to have driven, etc.," clearly, not good English and again in several places characters "give in" instead of yielding, but all this is a move aside, nothing to do with the merits of a fascinating story. There is just enough of German Fairy Lore running through the book to keep Germany in mind. The chief character is Paul Meyerhofer and obviously the writer intends to depict in him, much of the Christ-like nature, so long revered, but so little emulated. He succeeds. We have to love Paul, though we wish he would awake and pitch into some one. He does, at last, and our hearts throb exultingly at the eventual triumph which crowns all the sacrifices and trials of his life. This is a book from which the reader should arise with renewed courage and revived determination to fight the battles of life and to win if possible. For sale by Sanford, Sawtelle Company.

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. announce on February 3 in the Riverside Literature Series, as double number (No. 13), W. J. Rolfe's Edition of Scott's Lady of the Lake, the same in every respect as in the Students' Series, except that it will be bound in stiff paper covers.

This edition is very fully illustrated with sketches taken from the actual scenes of the poem; it contains an excellent map, and many critical explanatory notes by Mr. Rolfe and the whole book is printed from clear and tasteful type.

The publishers will send the book to any one, postpaid, on receipt of 75 cents, this being the lowest price at which an American edition of the "Lady of the Lake" in a complete form has ever been offered to the public.

So much of passion, so much of nothing to the purpose.

The Price He Paid.

BY COUSIN CONSTANCE.

(Concluded from last week.)

If only Sarah could have Millie with her in the nice country air. He remembered she had sent him a paper announcing the death of her mother a year ago. He had not attended the funeral. Mrs. Harding had always objected to going there if he spoke of it. But Millie, oh she must go. He asked in the morning what she thought of it, if it would not be a good thing.

"Why should she go, pray?"

"She doesn't seem well."

"Has she been complaining to you?"

"Millie never complains to me, Abbie."

"Why should she. I'm sure I do all I can for her comfort." Words that should have choked the false woman.

"How can she go? There are her music, her other lessons, and then, Ned would be such a bother. Millie grows so fast she has a great deal of sewing done for her and really I think she must begin to help sew, herself. I did, long before I was as old as she is."

"But then you, my dear woman were an unusually healthy girl, you know don't you? Not like Millie a delicate." Miserable man, he dare not plead for his child without throwing a sop to her vanity. He had seen a cloud on her face from the first. She had just heard from Maggie of the hour with her father the night before, when she thought her out of the house, and so George Harding had to be wary.

"No Abbie, I would not give Millie sewing to do, I will get another seamstress, and as to her music, I think I will have her give it up for the present at least. I shall consult the doctor in the evening and see what he thinks."

"Yes," thought Mrs. George, there goes another large bill for this child. I'll save it by letting the music go at least." She only said, "I suppose you had Millie complaining to you last night, but I do not see that she is so delicate myself," and she went out of the room in a huff.

That afternoon Harding took Millie to the doctor's for a thorough examination and told him he wished her to go into the country if he advised it.

"I do certainly and at once too," with a grave look in the child's face. Alarmed, George asked "Do you think that will help her?" "We must wait and see," was the reply. "Medicine is not needed. She wants loving care and watchfulness more."

"Alas," thought conscience smitten George, "those she has had no little of." He sadly placed her in the carriage and the doctor said to his wife, "Poor little girl."

"Doctor Gray says Millie must go at once into the country. Are you not alarmed for her?"

"Certainly not. I've watched her carefully and I'm sure I don't see anything alarming yet. She is such a strange child, so unlike all others, so reticent, I can get nothing out of her as to her ailment." "Yes and I see this reticence has gained upon her greatly. She never used to be shy, but with those she loved, always open and confiding."

"Which means, of course, you think she does not like me. She does not and so you see how hard it is for me to deal with her." George saw a storm threatening so only answered "Yes, it must of course be more difficult, cannot you win her love as you do other's?" Another sop to vanity. "I never try to win anyone's love it must be spontaneous, to gain any of mine in return." "Of course. But we must consult now about her going away. I've thought, as she is so fond of cousin Sarah, of writing to her to know if she can take her for awhile. It is a nice breezy location where she can have good air and sunshine."

"And be happy too," thought this cruel step-mother, and that was what she determined she should not be. She had long seen, as well as the father, how her malevolence was sapping the springs of this young life. "Oh, if it would only go out forever," she thought, only saying, "But why there? It is just as healthy at Aunt Jane's and nearer home too, so that if she grows worse she can be brought home sooner." He thought a moment. "Yes there is something in that to be sure," but he was reluctant to have his child with the mother and aunt of Abbie, of whom she had always seemed to be afraid and from whom she shrank, and so, saying he would ask her which place she preferred, he called Millie. She came at once and at his question as to her preference, asked which he preferred. "That is no matter, you shall go to the one you wish." "But I wish the one you and mama think best."

Little diviner, she had glanced at the cold face and at once saw that there would be trouble should she choose, as she so longed to, cousin Sarah's."

"Well then Mildred, I think it best you should go to grandma's, and as you are to go at once you must come now with me and have Maggie prepare your clothes." She would not leave her for a word with her father, and though he saw the fright, the actual terror on the child's face at the decision, his selfish love of ease and freedom from all collision with his wife's will kept him silent. Trembling, Millie was made ready. Remonstrance she had learned long ago was unavailing. A strange new dread seemed to hold the child in its grasp. Was she indeed able to read the wicked thoughts of her, who was burying her away where she hoped and knew that the life fast waning would go out the sooner, for so it was. She calculated on it. She, the Abbie May of old, so bright and smiling, who, at that time would not have believed herself capable of such terrible designs, yet had through selfishness and long harboring of evil thoughts, come to be able to put them in execution.

Here was her opportunity, the preparations were completed, the journey was to be taken on the morrow. Hardly had Harding seen Millie all that week. At meal-times she was often absent on some pretext of the mother, so he should not see the terrible state the child's nerves were in. Only the night before, a gay party of callers had detained him with her, when he longed to sit with Millie. Tonight more callers, and when he filled with a dread he could not name, begged her to excuse him to the company, he must see Millie, she frowned and said, "She was asleep long ago, do not go and wake her." So he staid, saw the last visitor off and then hurrying up stairs, stopped at her room, where the gas still burned, stooped over the bed, gave one look at his child, touched the cold hands and brow, searched the wide frightened, fixed eyes and sank beside her, calling wildly "Abbie, come." She was there at once, she had followed him closely, determined he should not be alone a moment this last night with his dear Millie. "What is it?" she asked, running to the bell that summoned the maid.

"Where is John? telephone for the doctor, she is dead, oh, she is dead?" he cried, as the alarmed servant did his bidding.

"Maggie, here, rub her, get the wine" and he vainly tried to get some between her lips, holding her in his arms, calling on her to speak once more to papa. All in vain.

The doctor at last. "What is it, doctor," said the frenzied father. A keen look in the eyes, a touch of the hand and laying it gently down he said, "The child must have died an hour ago." "No, no, my God, I cannot have it so, will you not do something?"

Nothing can be done. Some terrible fear or dread acting upon a most sensitive organization caused death. Did she seem happy in the thought of going away? he asked the father. "I have seen very little of her since it was decided where she should go, her mother thought it best she should be kept quiet in her room."

"Did she seem at all anxious when you left her that night, Mrs. Harding?"

"Not at all as I observed. I gave Maggie a charge to sit with her until she slept."

"What time was that?" he asked the girl.

"Nine o'clock, sir."

"And you found her at ten, Mr. Harding?"

"Yes."

"She must have died soon after the servant left her, then."

Faithless Maggie, she had stolen down to meet her lover soon after her mistress left, and was then out walking with him! Can we wonder at her deception, when for years she had seen it practiced by the mistress every day in the family?

The end was gained. Patient, frail Millie had died of terror at the thought of being taken to the mother of her, she had learned to fear so much and who had refused her almost agonized cry to see papa that night. Calling the maid, she bade her cease crying and go to sleep, and ran down the stairs to meet with smiles the company of callers, the maid, only waiting to know the coast clear, had left the little heart to its sorrow and terror, so eager as to send the young soul forth on the returnless journey.

Nothing of course could be proved, yet was Abbie Harding as really the murderer of that child as though she had stabbed her to the heart with a knife, instead of loveless looks and hatred. A slower, yet as sure process had rid her of the poor hated step-daughter.

Faithful cousin Sarah was summoned and she came at once, she must have one last look at her lost darling, give if possible some help and comfort to the distracted father. Mrs. Harding's grief was quite swallowed up in ordering expensive mourning. Looking on the emaciated form of the once lovely child and learning from the father the seclusion she was kept in, how the fond heart had yearned in vain for his love and caresses, scanned closely the shrinking step-mother, for somehow this strong, far-seeing cousin inspired her with a dread nothing else had been able to impart, she guessed a little of the sad truth.

The funeral was over, Mrs. Harding had answered the inquiries of friends according to rule. "Yes, she had been a strange child as you say. It has been a hard task for me, but I tried to do my duty by her," with a sigh as deep as her mourning. To another who expressed surprise at so sudden a death, she replied, "Yes and so strange a death. The doctor can give no cause for it, of course we shall never know," with another sigh.

George Harding stoned with sorrow, seemed hardly cognizant of what was transpiring, as Millie was laid beside her mother. A faithful friend assisted him into his house, stood by the chair he sank into, and mourned with him as his yearning eyes sought in vain the beloved form.

A changed man from that day was George Harding. The happy, trustful spirit was gone forever and in its stead a dark, cold suspicion took possession of his nature. Millie's death seemed to open his eyes to all he had so carelessly allowed her to suffer. Outwardly, he was the same loyal husband of Abbie Harding, but to her sorrow and at last anger, she never again could call up the trustful look of old. She had hoped that the share of love he had given to Millie would now revert to her. Bitterly was she to be disappointed. All that money could do for her happiness was hers. More than ever was she seen in public. Home became unsupportable to her. Go where she might through her elegant rooms a pair of wild, haunting eyes seemed to follow her. Did she feel remorse? No a more bitter hatred of the dead because of the change in the father, fills her fast hardening heart. She but tolerates Ned. Poor Ned, her unwise indulgence has spoiled him. He is wilful, passionate and, following her example, untruthful. Old enough now to see what he could not do when she came a pretty bride to the home. Old enough to see that she cuts short his allowance from his father, that she may lavish it upon herself, he determined to thwart her and have what he believes his dues.

To Millie, she grudged love; to Ned, she grudges money. Alas, poor human nature. They are not her own, why should she make any sacrifices for them, when their father sacrificed so much for her. He sees, too late now, the sacrifice was his children's. Sees that Ned is to be anything but what he wishes.

He takes his punishment patiently, almost hopelessly, replies to Abbie's taunt that he never cared for her with a sad smile and the answer, "Too much, Abbie, too much."

And so goes on the unhappy husband. The light of his eyes gone, confidence in his wife gone and with the continual sense that it was his own folly too that marred his home.

Ned, by the time he was eighteen, was so rebellious, so determined to have all the money he wished, as to take a large sum which his father had given to Mrs. Harding to use. A maid saw him through the nearly closed door and informed her mistress. Finding he must give up the money, he attacked the maid with fury, and had the man servant not been at hand, might have become a murderer. His father was at once summoned and succeeded in quieting him and yielded to his oft expressed wish to go to sea. There he went and was put under the severest discipline. In his library the day after, might be seen a worn, wretched man, with fast whitening hair, arranging his desk. Suddenly he comes upon a letter, Sarah Hall's in answer to the one he wrote her, asking advice as to his second marriage. Opening it the first words that met his eyes were, "the ruin of his children."

What a groan rent his heart, as the sorrowful words fell from his lips, "true, all too true. Faithful Sarah, you would have saved me this." A long time he sits there with head dropped upon the desk, thinking of his wife at the sea shore, of the beautiful, proud girl, her daughter, born the year Millie died and just "coming out," of the torture she could have inflicted with her dominant will and deception on his sensitive darling had she lived, and thanking God she lies beside her mother, he yet murmurs as he folds the letter, "Oh, the price I paid for my folly and sin."

That Mare's a Kitten.

In for a hunt one Autumn day
Myself and Billy,
We hired a horse that made us pay,
A sorrel Billy,
With chuck a start ere davigit broke,
For time was precious,
We left the town with every spoke
Though nare was fractious
At eight we reached the hunter's farm,
Our man was waiting
He put the mare away from barn
And gave her lusting
We took the cart road through the brush,
The dogs were ready,
And dropped our birds with every fluch
And kept as steady
As eve advanced we'd game enough
And left the woodward
We filled the wagon with our st. fl,
And started homeward,
Our pleasant chat the hours beguile
The mare a juggling
She kept her way, mile after mile,
Not needed logging.
At dusk a wagon came in sight
The mare tilted boiling
And from the carriage we took flight
With such a jolting
We found ourselves in mud and fright
Upon the highway
We saw the horse wheel out of sight
And through a by way
Too lone to run, afraid to ride
To our regret
We worked our way where wrens oft chide
Since morn neglected,
We met the honest stableman,
"That mare's a kitten
She'll feed the flies, when e'er she can,
Yet here's what's written
For beasts like men are easy known,
And by their capers
She'd kicked to death a woman grown
I was in the papers
Yet hear the honest stableman—
In him I glory,
"She'll feed the flies, when e'er she can,"
And let us glory.

The longest road will have its bend,
When least expected,
This mare she came to her bad end
And was respected,
He let the mare, without a care,
She cost me 'leven
She broke his rest and a lined respect
He now 's in heaven.

A Minister and His Children.

"The Rev. B. F. Bronson, a distinguished minister of the Baptist denomination for twenty-five years, who died recently, was one of the most prominent preachers and educators of Massachusetts, and was well known to hundreds of ministers and college professors of all denominations. Dr. Bronson had just reached three-score years and ten. The cause of his death was paralysis, from the effects of which he had suffered for two years. He leaves a daughter and four sons. One son is a professor of Greek at Cornell, another a professor of English Literature at De Pauw; one is a minister in Minnesota, and the other engaged in journalism in this city.

Most ministers' sons turn out well. Once in a while one turns out an infidel, or a rake, or a criminal, and such cases are published throughout the world. But for every such case there are many, like the sons of Dr. Bronson, who honor their ancestry and deserve well of their country."—Christian Advocate.

Ellery Bicknell Crane.

The President of the Worcester County Mechanics Association, at the end of its first half century, is a native of New Hampshire; Colebrook, Coos County, a country that is laden with Colonial and Revolutionary memories. He was born Nov. 12, 1836, but before he can remember his parents migrated to the West. His father, Robert Pruden Crane, was born in the Granite State; his grandfather was a pioneer from Bethlehem, Conn. His mother, Almira Paine Bicknell, was from Rhode Island and it is quite likely that this fact accounts for Mr. Crane's bearing, for his first name, that of one of Little Rhody's signers of the Declaration of Independence. Her father followed the sea for more than thirty years.

In the Winter following Mr. Crane's birth, his father went to Wisconsin and became one of the first settlers in Beloit. The mother and babe followed in the next Spring and the trip was so hard and exacting that she never recovered from its effects. It was before the days of railroads. Beloit was settled by the New England Emigrating Company and its agent was Dr. Horace White, father of the subsequently famous journalist of the same name. The elder Crane died in 1882, at his residence in Florida. Mrs. Crane died when her son was fifteen years old.

Though the early home was in the then extreme west, Mr. Crane had the advantages of good schools. One of the first public buildings of the village was a school house, these New Englanders appreciating its value and here Mr. Crane began, finishing in the Seminary which was the forerunner of Beloit College. Mr. Crane here took the preparation for college but did not enter.

In 1860, he accompanied an expedition to California. It was fitted out to take a drove of horses to El Dorado and the parties were five months in making the distance. They halted five weeks in Salt Lake City to recruit their numbers so as to better withstand the Indians who were exceedingly hostile. When the advance was made and they were some distance on their route, Mr. Crane and some others, impatient at the delay, went ahead, and, as it proved, without any harm. He spent two years on the Pacific Coast, pretty thoroughly exploring the same from Oregon southward. Very likely, at some future time, Mr. Crane will favor his friends with an account of these rambles which must have been fraught with interest.

He returned to the states by way of the Isthmus and landed in New York, January 1, 1862.

The way this New Hampshire, Wisconsin, California man came to reside in Massachusetts is as follows. Miss Salona A. Rawson, a native of Mendon, visited Beloit. She was a niece of the wife of Dr. Bicknell, Mr. Crane's mother's brother and before this trans-continental excursion, she had become Mr. Crane's wife. So when he came back to the East he visited her old home and no one can blame him for preferring The Old Bay to the Wolverine State. In 1863, he went to Boston in the employ of Wm. S. Perry and he came to Worcester, April 14, 1867 and opened a lumber yard, in company with Jonathan C. French on Madison Street. Later, he bought out his partner and continued the business alone. In 1871, he located on the corner of Madison and Southbridge Streets where now is situated the Norwich and Worcester Freight Depot, and here he remained till the taking up of the tracks across the Common compelled his removal to his present location in Washington Square, where he maintains one of the largest and best equipped lumber yards in this portion of the Commonwealth. Having tried business in the different portions of this land, Mr. Crane declares that the East is just as good a section as any for the attainment of success.

Whatever his occupation, Mr. Crane has always found time to cultivate his love for the ancient and curious. One of his first literary ventures was a preparation of the genealogy of the Rawson Family which is recognized as an authority in its special line. He is also interested in the preparation of a similar record of his mother's people, the Bicknells, and he now holds ready for the press an extensive compilation on the Crane family. Besides he has been one of the most prolific of writers in the Society of Antiquity, his annual addresses being regarded as models of research and thoroughness.

Mr. Crane has been a member of the City Government, serving in both the Common Council and Board of Aldermen. In both places, he proved himself a valuable officer.

Very soon after the organization of the Society of Antiquity, he became a member and since 1881 he has been its president. Probably no one member has attended more meetings and certainly, no one has done more for the organization. From the very inception of the idea of building a hall to the day of its opening, he was unremitting in his efforts to secure its successful completion.

He joined the Mechanics Association in 1850; was made a director in 1884 and has been in office ever since, serving as Vice President in 1887-'88 to 1889-'90 and is now serving his second term as president.

Mr. Crane is a Republican in politics and, as he attained his majority just after the formation of that party, he was never anything else. His first vote for president was cast for Abraham Lincoln. His party was descending the western slopes of the Sierra Nevada and in a place, called Strawberry Hill, they were invited to vote for president, a privilege accorded to any one on very short residence, in fact none at all.

The home life of our president is very pleasant. He has constructed at 25 Richards Street as comfortable and convenient a home as this city contains. Not to mention the living rooms, let us stand a moment at the east window of the library and look out over Crystal Street to University Park, a view that cannot be shut off and then beyond that, away over factories and houses to the hills whereon sit the Academy and the residences of the Crompions and Perrys. Should we turn our attention to the books behind the glass doors we should find one of the largest and best collections on genealogical matters to be found in the state either in private or public libraries. The bent of the owner is well illustrated in his book possessions. A day off from his business is never lost for in this workshop he finds material for infinite work and pleasure. Mr. and Mrs. Crane have but one son, Morton Rawson, just past his majority, though their home is, in her school days, a home also for a cousin, Miss Mary Bicknell of the High School, Class of '78, now married and living in the West.

THE MECHANICS ASSOCIATION.

This is another instance where the whole name is quite too long for general use if it should be prefixed by "Worcester County," but nobody uses the whole term and, comparatively, few avail themselves of the possibility of belonging. It is really a Worcester City rather than County institution. April 4, 1891, this paper had an extended history of the Association along with a sketch and picture of the architect of the Hall, Mr. Elbridge Boyden. April 11th, LIGHT had a description of the paintings in the Hall, their painters and donors. To repeat the story, now, though the 5th is the 50th anniversary of the dating of the charter would not be quite the thing for these columns. It may be stated, though, that the last day of the year 1891, saw the payment of the last dollar of debt and Association and building are free.

The body is fortunate in having as its president at this time a gentleman who has given so much time to historical matters and to whom the preparation of a history of the Association has proved more a pleasure than a labor. That it is a clear and authoritative statement of facts goes without saying.

Of those who belonged at the beginning, the following are living today,

Samuel Davis, 55 Kendall,
Warren Williams, 8 Ashland,
Nathan A. Lombard, 62 West,
Elbridge G. Partridge, 67 Chatham,
James S. Woodworth, 14 Vine,
George W. Russell, 11 Harvard,
Perrigine B. Gilbert, 45 Chatham,
Edward L. Brigham, 28 Portland,
Wm. T. Merrifield, 76 Highland,
Albert Curtis, 38 Webster,
Loring Coes, 1049 Main,
James L. Estey, 27 William.

The following list includes the presidents from the beginning,

William Wheeler, 1842, 43, 44;
Ichabod Washburn, 1845, 46;
Freeman Upham, 1847, 48;
Samuel Davis, 1849;

Robert H. Chamberlain, 1888, 89, 90;
Ellery B. Crane, 1891, 92.

These lists are worthy of more than a passing glance. Samuel Davis is one of the two surviving selectmen of the town of Worcester, Albert Curtis the other. N. A. Lombard, George W. Russell, Wm. T. Merrifield, Albert Curtis and Loring Coes are, today, as they have been for many years, prominent in Worcester industries. Elbridge G. Partridge holds some of the best real estate in the city while James L. Estey still stands at his case and sets type.

Samuel Davis is the senior ex-president living and as for the others, were the average citizen to be asked to name twenty men who in an industrial way had set their seal on the city, he would include three-fourths of those named in the list. Here are four ex-mayors, and there are ex-members of the city government in great numbers. Many have died, but the majority are still active in affairs.

Elbridge Hoyden, the architect of the Association's magnificent hall still lives and daily looks upon the product of his taste and skill. Elbridge G. Partridge, the first treasurer, is still active and able to look after funds, while several members of the building committee are yet active business men.

Our city has many and excellent institutions, some that are known further away from home than the Mechanics Association, but there is no one that has done so much to enable labor as this one whose half century we celebrate. Were Worcester to change her seal and to substitute any thing for the heart, so long emblazoned, that something should be the bared arm of the mechanic with hammer in hand. Charles Martel was the "Hammer" of France and the Arm and Hammer have made our Heart of the Commonwealth. They have beaten down poverty and want and have pounded out fortunes and fame. All else in Worcester is a result, mechanical industry is the direct and only cause. Far better than the drawn and uplifted sword of our Commonwealth are the insignia of industry that the Association and hall have dignified. When Worcester nobility in the future, seeks pedigree, let it be proud to find the names of ancestors on the rolls of the Association and machinery, emblazoned, should form as proud an escutcheon as implements of war, argent.

The Busts and Pictures.

Ye who frequently ascend the stairs and spend hours in Mechanics Hall, do you know by whose faces and figures you are surrounded?

When you push open the storm doors at the head of the first flight of stairs you see at the left the bust of Ichabod Washburn, made by Benj. H. Kinney, and at the right that of Wm. A. Wheeler, by the same artist.

Go into Secretary Smith's office and see Kinney's bust of John Goodnow and his medallion of Col. Alex. De Witt, late of Oxford, and also the excellent copy of Stuart's Washington made by Emma M. Judkins of Cambridge.

But the chief glories are in the main or upper hall. At the right of the organ is Thomas Badger's copy of Stuart's Faneuil Hall picture of Washington, presented by Ichabod Washburn and Stephen Salisbury.

At the left is Billing's life size picture of Abraham Lincoln, given by the Bay State Shoe and Leather Company.

From the east end of the hall, north side, the faces are as follows:

Ichabod Washburn, by Wight, bought by the Association, 1870.

Henry W. Miller, Billings, given by Mr. Miller in 1891.

Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Billings, Bay State Shoe and Leather Company, 1868.

Henry Wilson, Edgar Parker, presented by E. A. Goodnow.

James B. Blake, Willard, fellow citizens. Reading from the west end of the south side, we find:

Col. George H. Ward, Billings, Fifteenth Regiment.

James A. Garfield, Parker, given by E. A. Goodnow.

John A. Andrew, Billings, Bay State Shoe and Leather Company.

Benjamin Walker, Billings, presented by his daughter, Mrs. L. G. White.

Wm. A. Wheeler, Harris, ordered by the Association, 1876.

All these works of art, so pertinent to Worcester history are described, at length, in LIGHT for April 11, 1891. Copies can be had at the office.

THE LABORER.

WM. D. CALLAGHER

Stand up—erect! Thou hast the form,
And likeness of thy God—who more
A soul as dauntless 'mid the storm
Of daily life, a heart as warm!
And pure, as breast e'er wore.

What thou art—Thou art as true a man
As moves the human mass among
As such a part of the great plan
That with Creation's dawn began,
As any of the throng.

Who is thine enemy—the high
In station, or in wealth the chief?
The great, who coldly pass thee by,
With proud step and averted eye?
Nay! nurse not such belief.

If true unto thyself thou wast,
What were the proud one's scorn to thee!
A feather, which thou mightest cast
Aside, as idly as the blast
The light leaf from the tree.

No,—uncurb'd passions, low desires,
Absence of noble self-respect,
Death, in the breast's consuming fires,
To that high nature which aspires
Forever, till thus check'd.

These are thine enemies—thy worst:
Their chain thee to thy lowly lot
Thy labor and thy life accursed,
O, stand erect! and from them burst!
And longer suffer not!

Thou art thyself thine enemy!
The great?—what better thee than thou
As thine, is not thy will as free?
Has God with equal favors thee
N glected to endow?

True, wealth thou hast not 'tis but dust
Nor place—uncertain as the wind!
But that thou hast, which, with thy crust,
And water, may despite the lust
Of both, a noble mind.

With this, and passions unduly ban,
True faith, and holy trust in God,
Thou art the peer of any man
Look up, then, that thy little span (Of life may be well trod!

—Selected.

Mr. Francis B. Winter, who died recently in Boston, nearly ninety three years old, was a "Pilgrim of the Pilgrims," his grandmother being the granddaughter of John and Priscilla Alden. He was the oldest member of the Charitable Mechanic Association.

William A. Smith.

Much good comes from continued and earnest effort and this the Association has had in the person of its efficient secretary and treasurer, who rounds out twenty-one consecutive years of service in this position. Twenty-one years is a significant number among English speaking people and not a few persons remark with pleasure that Mr. Smith, as secretary and treasurer, attains his majority while the Association is half a century old. Unless prevented by illness, he is as regularly and as constantly in his place as any bank officer in the country. His care and judicious management have had no little to do with the financial success that attends the present celebration.

Mr. Smith is a native of Leicester, one of the many people who have forsaken the hills for the lower regions of the city. His father, John A. Smith, was from Rutland but early settled in Leicester where he was a card clothing maker. His mother was a Sargent, a member of that time honored family so long connected with Leicester, his great grandmother being the lady, noted by Washburn, who melted her clock weights to make bullets for the Revolutionary Army.

He fitted for college at the Leicester Academy and at Derby Academy in Hingham, though in the latter institution, he spent only a few months. He was graduated from Harvard in 1843 and, at once, began the study of law with Ex-Governor Emory Washburn and Judge Francis H. Dewey, both now deceased. Later, he was in practice with Mr. Dewey till he was made Assistant Clerk of Courts, a place which he held for eighteen years, being the first occupant of that office. Too close attention to business resulted in ill health and to improve the same he took a trip to Europe.

On his return, he became agent for the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company, a place that he held for seventeen years. He began his duties in this direction in 1869 and two years afterward added to them those of secretary of the Mechanics Association. Besides these two offices he was for five years secretary of the Masonic Mutual Relief Association, but for some time the duties of his Mechanics Association work have absorbed all his time and strength.

Mr. Smith is a member of the American Antiquarian Society and in Masonry has taken the 33d degree. He belongs to Montecute Lodge, Worcester Royal Arch Chapter, Hiram Council Royal and Select Masters, Worcester County Encampment of Knights Templar, Worcester Grand Lodge of Perfection and Lawrence Chapter of Rose Croix. He took his 33, Dec. 20, 1864.

In his church relations he is a member of Grace M. E. Church and a class leader there, in one of the most responsible and exacting positions that a layman can hold. In politics, he is a Republican and has been a very valuable member of the School Board and was the clerk of the Common Council thirteen years, being the first ward officer sworn in after the taking of a city charter.

His home is on Harvard Street, No. 5, where he passes such time as duty will permit, surrounded by books, representing many years of collecting. His collection of envelopes, bearing on the War of Rebellion, is one of the largest in the city. With his excellent wife, who was Miss Eliza H. Howe of this city, life at 5 Harvard Street is filled with pleasure. They have two sons, William S. and Charles E., both engaged in business in Worcester.

In the management of every detail of Association work, Mr. Smith is very vigilant. Works of Art, Library, Reading Room, Halls, all are special objects of care. The Library has increased largely under his direction and now numbers more than 10,000 volumes. The Reading Room, with its well supplied files is a resort for many. The hall, itself, is a mighty monument of enterprise and industry and in all the jubilation incidents thereto, LIGHT wants some recollection to be had of the work done in all these years by the secretary and treasurer.

"To Raise Ned."

Some stories are almost too good to be true but this one is both true and good for the writer has known from childhood one of its heroines, a young married lady of Lowell. The Rev. Chandler Robbins was renowned for his wit and his readiness in using it on all occasions; he also entertained pronouncedly adverse views on second marriages and therefore when a young widow in his congregation thought of trying married life a second time, she dreaded telling him. However, she sent for him, and after some preliminaries she began: "Mr. Robbins, I think of changing my condition." "H'm," grunted Mr. Robbins, "Isn't your condition good enough for you?" "Well," said the lady, "as my little Edward grows older, I feel he needs a father's hand—" "Oh," interrupted the divine, "so you're going to get married to raise Ned!" The story was widely repeated and laughed over in more towns than the little town of Framingham, where it occurred. Many years later, Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, the novelist, was a guest at a small dinner, and, apropos of something, exclaimed: "That reminds me of a story of Mr. Robbins," and she proceeded to relate the "raising Ned" story, concluding, "I don't know that there is any truth in it, but I tell it as I heard it." Her vis-a-vis at table laughed. "It's not only true Mrs. Whitney, she said," but the daughter of that very lady is before you. It was my mother who married 't to raise Ned.'"—Boston Gazette.

Arbutus.

Frederic A. Tupper, once a teacher in the High School of this city, now principal of Arms Academy, Shelburne Falls, has, in the Greenfield Gazette, for Jan. 30, a very fine metrical version of "The Origin of the Arbutus" read before the last meeting of the American Folk Lore Society by the Hon. C. E. Belknap of Michigan. It trips along, merrily, to the meter of Hiawatha. Seemingly, Mr. Tupper never did a better piece of poetic work.

Shakespeare will please excuse us if we modify him thus: "Thrice is he clad who hath his system strengthened with Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and he but naked, though arrayed in furs, whose blood is poor or with disease corrupted. An incomparable medicine!

Entertainments.

Lothrop's Opera House.

"The Two Wanderers," a stirring melodrama, has been played to large audiences at the Pleasant Street Opera House this week. Miss Ethel Tucker as Rosalie Vernon, was well received, as was also Charles Barringer in the character of Clarence Bloomfield. The last performance will be given this afternoon and evening.

The Katherine Rober Company will make its appearance next week in Duncan B. Harrison's "Paymaster," which met with an enthusiastic reception in the large cities of the country some time ago. Tickets can be obtained for any performance one week in advance.

Dramatic Notes.

Ethel Tucker will be seen in the leading character in "Leah, the Forsaken," the week commencing February 21st.

Miss Katherine Rober is still ill. She has had a protracted attack of influenza.

Leland T. Powers is having great success in impersonating the characters of Boucicault's "Shaughraun."

Richard Mansfield is credited with making the following remark recently to a prominent Chicago newspaper man: "The papers make or break a theatrical enterprise. A line of any sort in them is worth many square feet of lettering on the wall." Right you are, Richard.

So Smith Russell is coining money in "Peaceful Valley."

George Hanlon, of the famous Hanlon Brothers, has left the stage and become a member of the Presbyterian Church. He may enter the ministry.

Manager Lothrop has secured the New England rights for producing Roland Reed's "Cheek" and "Humbag." The Boston Theater successes "Mankind" and "Silver Falls," and Bobby Gaylor's comedy, "An Irish Arab," will also be seen at the Pleasant Street Opera House the coming month.

Eugenie Blair, the wife of Robert Downing, is a charming woman, and one of the most talented leading ladies on the stage. She is tall, willowy and graceful, with large, expressive eyes, a wealthy profusion of beautiful brown hair, and a manner that is delightfully engaging. She is withal a thoroughly practical woman, mapping out her husband's engagements and attending to the minor details of the business of their company with the carefulness and shrewdness of an expert manager.

A pretty face, an extremely bad divorce court record, and lack of intelligence, have placed a number of actresses in the profession during the past ten years. But it is a hard life. Mrs. Leslie Carter is at present endeavoring to pay a four months' hack bill of over $1,000 and live in style at a first-class hotel on the small salary of $50 a week.

Arthur Moulton of the "Hoss and Hoss" Company, is to star next season. "Dombey and Son" will be produced at the Boston Museum in magnificent style in the near future.

Julia Marlowe is filling a most successful engagement, both artistically and financially, in Shakespearean comedy at the Hollis Street Theater in Boston this week.

The Convalescent Gripster.

FROM THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS.

The gods let slip that fendish grip
Upon me last week Sunday—
No fiercer storm than racked my form
Ere swept the Bay of Fundy;
But, now, goodby
To drugs, say I—
Goody to gnawing sorrow;
I'm up today,
And whoop, hooray!
I'm going out tomorrow!

What aches and pain in bones and brain
I had, I need not mention;
It seemed to me a such pangs must be Old Satan's own invention;
Albeit I
Was sure I'd die,

The doctor reassured me—
And, true enough,
With his vile stuff,
He ultimately cured me.

As there I lay in bed all day,
How fair outside looked to me I
A smile so mild old Nature smiled
It seemed to warm clean through me.

In chaste-od mood
The scene I viewed,
Inventing, sadly solus,
Fantastic rhymes
Between the times
I had to take a bolus.

Of quinine slugs and other drugs

I guess I took a million—
Such drugs as seem to set each nerve
To dancing a cotillon;

The doctors say
The only way
To rout the grip-Instanter

Is to pour in
All kinds of sin—
Similibus curantur!

'Twas hard; and yet I'll soon forget
Those ills and cures distressing;
One's future lies 'neath gorgeous skies
When one is convalescing!

So, now, goodby
To drugs say I—
Goody, thou phantom Sorrow!
I'm up today,
And, whoop, hooray!
I'm going out tomorrow.

Mr. Gorman.

"Mr. Gorman of Maryland is said to be one of the most temperate of senators," notes Harper's Weekly, "as he is one of the most domestic. He finds his keenest enjoyment in his home life, and does not often leave his family circle in the evening. It is reputed to be the senator's practice to read aloud to his family, and after they have retired to bed to continue his reading into the night, for he likes the companionship of books, and felt most severely the loss he suffered by the burning of his fine library at Laurel."

Somehow or other, this description fits pretty accurately a famous Democrat of Worcester. He has filled all sorts of offices, but he loves his books best of all. Can you guess who it is?

Chili is the woman's Utopia. It is one of the few countries in the world in which women are possessed of full political rights. Every woman over twenty-one can vote on all questions. The street cars are all conducted by women, too. The native women have not good opportunities for education, but they are said to be possessed of fair mental ability and boast of one woman doctor. In manner they are modest and dignified, in person small and delicate.

A Curious Coincidence.

At the meeting of the Local Union of Christian Endeavor Societies, held at the Church of Christ Tuesday evening, in observance of the eleventh anniversary of Christian Endeavor, a pocketbook was found, having two compartments, in each of which were eleven cents.

The Legislature.

This body convened Jan. 6, but not till Feb.
4 were its numbers complete. Two memberselect, Mr. Almy of Cambridge and Ambrose of Southboro had resigned their respective positions. New elections were ordered and, Wednesday, Dr. Nichols of Westboro and Mr. Mc Lean appeared in the House and were qualified. But even now, the body is not full for several parties are absent on sick leave. However, so long as a quorum is present business will progress. Thus far there has been very little talk.

The Electric Road.

The people along this road had never known how valuable the electric connection was till it stopped one day. For more than ten days they managed to drag along in the old barges and coaches, finding fault with such ways of "getting there." Then, on Monday last, the road resumed and "Richard was himself again." If there is one prayer along the Leister and Spencer Railroad, more fervent than another, it is that there may be no more break downs.

Good to Eat.

Through the halls there walked to and fro
A jolly yeoman, marshal of the same,
Whose name was Appetite; he did bestow
Both guests and meats whenever in they came
And knew them how to order without blame,

A good consommé soup is made as follows: Take two pounds of lean beef and two pounds of veal, and cut it into pieces about an inch square. Put two tablespoonfuls of butter in the soup kettle and let it brown, then put in the meat and stir until the meat is nicely browned; next add two quarts of water, bring slowly to boiling heat, and then simmer for four hours. Now add a few such vegetables as you prefer, a piece of bay leaf, salt, and pepper, and simmer one hour longer. Strain through a sieve, let cool, remove the fat, and when wanted for the table heat it up for use.

Cocoa Cake.

One large cup of sugar, one cup of molasses, two-thirds of a cup of butter, one cup of sour milk, a spoonful of soda, two tablespoonfuls of breakfast cocoa, and one spoonful of vanilla extract; flour to make a batter as for pound cake. As this is stirred in, two cups of English currants must be added. These should be well washed and looked over. Bake in two deep tins, and cover with the following frosting: One cup of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of water, and a spoonful of butter. Boil five minutes, and pour it over a spoonful of cocoa, in a deep bowl. Stir until creamy and almost cold, and quickly cover the cake. It takes the place of fruit cake very acceptably, and is not expensive. Two eggs may be added, but are not necessary.

Cocoanut Tablets.

Crean one cup sugar and one-half of butter, add two-thirds of a cup of sweet milk, add two cups of flour sifted with two spoonfuls of baking powder. Stir until this is smooth and fine-grained. Lastly add the whites of four eggs beaten to a froth and a teaspoonful of either lemon or rose. Fill three bright, one pound, tin baking-powder cans each nearly half full of the cake mixture and bake slowly. When baked, remove the cakes carefully from the cans. Each should present a white cylindrical appearance unless the oven proved too hot. Cover each cake with frosting, either boiled or uncooked, and then roll in cocoanut. When used cut in slices or rounds one-half inch thick. MRS. CORA BLACKMAN.

Date Cake.

One and one-half cups of sugar, one-half cup of butter, the yolks of four eggs, one cup of milk, two large cups of flour, two spoonfuls of baking powder, a spoonful of almond flavoring, and one-half pound of dates, chopped fine. Bake in long sheets about two inches thick. Ice thickly, and place the dates, (with the stones removed) at equal distances upon it. Cut it in squares when ready to serve.

Fashions.

Dame Fashion, From February "Table Talk."

Fashion, like people, refuses to let well enough alone. The low table decorations were so beautiful, with their graceful baskets, swans, bowls, etc., resting upon mirrors or lovely embroidery provided for them. With their freight of blossoms, they needed no improvement. How welcome they were, leaving face as well as voice to add to the charm of conversation. But a new edict has commanded a change, and every cierge, high vase, standard, etc., has been taken from closet shelves and relieved of dust, and restored to favor for decorative purposes. Fruit and flowers will be arranged in high forms, and we shall lose the pleasant smile and changing expression of our opposite, and have only glimpses now and then through sprays of maiden-hair fern, flowers, etc., exalted in position, while they were just as sweet in a lowly one, and we are the sufferers thereby.

Various kinds of ribbon are imitated in enamel, ottoman, gros-grain, moire and even gauze, and an artistic belt buckle in shaded enamel imitates a width of surah twisted into a sailor knot. A great advantage of these enameled trinkets is that they can be procured to match the color of any costume.

The Russian boot is a veritable boon for women who suffer with chilled feet indoors. It is fashioned of red felt ther, flannel-lined and edged at the top with narrow black fur. An odd nickel chain fastens across the instep.

Hand made aprons are the fancy of the hour. Hem stitching is applied to hems and above the tucks, three tucks being usually allowed. Perpendicular tucks adorn many dainty aprons, and lace edged ruffles are favorite decorations.

Small bodice squares of silk muslin, beautifully embroidered in dainty-colored silks, will be "tucked in" at the waist fastening, and will lend a pretty dash of color to a sombre street costume.

Smocking is still a popular mode of adding style to children's dresses, but it should not be overdone. Instead of making use of this effect on waist and sleeves both, merely content yourself with four or five rows at the throat, and resort to other modes of garniture to complete the scheme of trimming.

House dresses for girls of six or eight years to wear in the morning are two and a half breadths of cashmere,—brown, violet or green, falling free in wrapper fashion from a round yoke so shallow that it is entirely concealed by a deep, round collar of white nainsook, doubled and edged with a two-inch frill. Velvet ribbon two inches wide starts in a point in the middle of the back at the end of the yoke, and comes down the sides to point in front below the waist, where a rosette is set. This confines the front, and leaves the back flowing. The full low-topped sleeves have deep white cuffs matching the collar.

At the weekly meeting of the Worcester County Horticultural Society, next Thursday afternoon at 2 30 o'clock, B. W. Potter will read a paper on "Our Dwellings and their Environs." The usual discussion will follow.

"Seeing every nation affords not experience and tradition enough for all kind of learning, therefore we are taught the languages of those people who have been the most industrious after wisdom."—Milton.

From the Report to the legislature of the Lyman School for Boys. If such work as described here be good for bad boys, why should it not be an excellent thing for good boys?

"If the reform school fail to awaken an interest in some better mode of life it can do the boy little service; but if his restless ingenuity can be engaged in legitimate work, he may be set to devising legitimate ways to achieve success such as his fascinating newspaper heroes have achieved by crooked ways, and there is some hope for a true reformation. If, for instance, instead of being punished for whittling his desk he can be taught to apply a jack-knife and then other tools to make out of a rough board a well formed and complete article, one motive for misconduct is removed; he is set to work upon what he thoroughly enjoys, and, to his surprise, he no longer feels himself an outlaw. The "Educational Sloyd," which has for two years been employed in the school, differs from the instruction that can be obtained in an ordinary carpenter's shop in providing a systematic series of lessons which require of the pupil practical exercises in multiplication, division and fractions. He must discover for himself how many inches make an inch and how many sixteenths there are in a foot; by a carefully planned progression which he is able to comprehend, he is taught a new process with each tool. Any imperfection in measurement or in execution brings its own penalty in results which he can see and which he cannot evade, and according to his faithfulness, or his heedlessness the completed work, whether a simple wedge or a dove-tail joint, becomes a source of satisfaction or of regret. He is now prepared to apply his skill to common carpentering, cabinet making or other trades.

At each step the work of the school-room is related to that of manual training. Preliminary work in clay modelling and drawing prepares the pupil to understand the principles familiarly recognized in the workshop. Besides learning what any country-bred boy would be ashamed not to know about the grain of the wood and other practical matters, his eye is trained to a nicer perception and his hand to a nicer skill. His observation lessons now become interesting as he studies the bean-plant in embryo and at various stages of growth, sketching it as well as he can, and describing it in his written exercise. The habit of thus recording what he has himself observed prepares him to reproduce what he gathers from reading upon any subject in which he is interested. The importance to this class of boys of forming a taste for good reading can hardly be overstated. Biographical sketches compiled from various sources and read at the close of the Summer term, showed that many of the Lyman School boys had been reading and studying intelligently and with a purpose."

Chicago University calls Prof. John W. White, professor of Greek in Harvard, and offers him $7,000 per year. Money will make the Professor as well as the mare go.

Amherst.

The Junior promenade, one of the pleasantest features of social life in Amherst, took place last Wednesday in the gymnasium and was preeminently successful. The gymnasium was very prettily decorated by the florists and upholsterers, and was gay with music and dancing until the early morning. Many familiar Worcester faces were seen among the dancers, both of ladies and gentlemen. The affair was a great success, socially and financially. In the afternoon preceding the promenade, an afternoon tea was given at the Alpha Delta Phi, which was attended by about one hundred people.

The dormitories at Amherst have so long been a standing joke among all acquainted with the college that it seems almost strange to think that Amherst does really have a dormitory now which can compare favorably with those of other colleges. "South College," under the direction of Mr. G. Henry Whitcomb, has been entirely remodeled in the interior: at an expense not far from $15000. During the Summer a cellar was dug beneath the building and new foundations, practically, laid. Large boilers were then put in to supply steam heat to the entire building. The interior plan of the dormitory has been extensively changed, the old single rooms now constituting suites of two and three rooms with the best conveniences in the way of closets and light. Each chamber is provided also with set bowls, and, in fact, the plumbing and heating have been done throughout with great care. New floors of birch have been laid throughout and the stairways have been rebuilt; while in each study a cheery looking fireplace makes the room seem bright and homelike. No rooms are occupied, as yet, owing to the delay in finishing the building but it is expected that next year the rooms will be taken, mostly by members of the Freshman class.

Professor Anson D. Morse, for several years professor of history, has resigned on account of ill health and his position is filled by Professor Grosvenor, for many years a teacher in Robert College, Constantinople.

Harvard.

Having met Yale in joint debate at Cambridge, and having on that occasion won an overwhelming victory on home soil, Harvard is now preparing to enter the enemy's country. The second debate will occur March 25, at New Haven, and the question will be,

"RESOLVED, That immigration to the United States should be restricted."

Yale prefers the negative and is allowed that side. The Harvard debaters fear that Yale has reserved her best speakers for the New Haven contest.

Twelve Harvard students are entered for the Worcester Athletic Club games at the Rink this evening.

C. A. Gray is singing first bass on the Freshman Glee Club.

Candidates for the base ball nine are practicing out-of-doors, when there is not too much snow on the ground.

The mid-year examinations are now in full blast.

Chicago University offers Prof. John Williams White of Harvard $7,000 annual salary if he will take charge of the Greek department in the new college.

Polytechnic.

The past week has been one of suspended animation. Boys exercising their feet with the George Washington war dance, have furnished the animation, and President Fuller the suspension. The five Preps, who in railroad parlance "walked the carpet" last week Thursday were suspended until Tuesday. It has become a regular thing for students to give the G. W. at the head of the chapel stairs, and a Senior also was suspended a day or two ago for indulging there. As usual his exile was short and the next day he triumphantly walked into the chapel amid the applause of his classmates.

Four Tech men, Smith, '92, Gallagher, Whipple and Harris '94, are entered for the bean-pot race at the rink tonight. Derby, '93, is also entered in the pole vault. It seems rather queer that despite the fact '93 won the Cross Country Run Championship last Spring, it should not have a single representative in tonight's running contests.

The Athletic Association held a meeting Tuesday noon and elected J. H. Wallace, '92, baseball manager, and F. A. Morse, '92, manager of the Institute Inter-collegiate team. A committee consisting of E. W. Marshall, '93, H. W. Bracken, '92, E. L. Burdick, '94, and G. Denny, '95, was appointed to look up and report upon the feasibility of an entertainment sometime in March, to be given by members of the Institute for the benefit of the Athletic Association. The idea is to repeat with some necessary modifications, the entertainment at ninety-three's half way supper, which made such a hit, and add to it quartet, banjo-music and other features. Perhaps follow the whole with dancing. There is no doubt the Institute has lots of good material from which to pick, and the affair if held will undoubtedly be a great success.

The class of ninety-five has elected the following officers: President, C. A. Harrington; vice-president, F. W. Parks; secretary, H. J. Fuller; treasurer, A. H. Warren; athletic director, H. S. Davis. The Preps evidently intend to stand in well with the authorities, at least the mayor's son for president and the principal's son for secretary, looks that way.

It is very likely that Dadmun, who failed to graduate last June, will return this Spring, and make up his conditions, and there is also a chance of Taylor's doing the same. If these two men do return, the Institute will have the same Inter-collegiate team as a year ago with the exception of Dunbar, '91, who did nothing, in addition to a large number of crack new men. This fact and the early enthusiasm over the sports already displayed, seem to promise Worcester a fine showing in May.

The Tech Elect has chosen the following officers for the next half year all from '93:

President, N. M. Paull; vice-president, E. W. Vaill; secretary, T. S. Perkins; member of executive committee, Nathan Rice. Dr. Kimball began last Tuesday night a series of ten minute talks upon the dynamo.

The evening of February 2d, the Amherst Glee and Banjo Clubs were given a reception by the Sophomores. The concert by the young men was not much of a variation from that given a year ago, but was a success.

Mademoiselle Vilzthum von Eckstadt will conduct a party limited to fourteen through France, Italy, Spain and Switzerland next Summer. The itinerary is an attractive one and Mademoiselle's acquaintance with Europe insures a successful and enjoyable trip.

High School.

Numerous changes have been made in the course of study for the rest of the year.

Mr. Perry has changed his astronomy classes for those in geology.

Miss Trumble has taken charge of the botany classes while Mr. Jenkins of Dix Street School is taking charge of her geometry classes for the present.

Mr. Gardner has exchanged the study of political economy for that of civil government for the rest of the year.

A class in English Literature has been formed to make an advanced study of it, proceeding in something the same manner as hitherto.

Classes assembled in the hall Monday morning as usual again this week. Owing to the temperature of the hall and to the illness of Mr. Richards, the classes had not met for three consecutive Mondays.

Wesleyan.

A committee has been appointed to arrange for a college banquet on Washington's birthday. The one held last year was a marked success and it is hoped that this one will be all that the committee expect.

A wave of religious interest has swept over the college of late and half hour meetings have been held every night for the past three weeks with good results. On Thursday, Jan. 28, Rev. Mr. Frost of Brooklyn preached in the college chapel and a meeting was held in the evening in the Y. M. C. A. room, it being the day of prayer for colleges.

Rev. Wallace MacMullen of Springfield, Mass., delivered a very able and effective address in the college chapel on Wednesday, Jan. 20. It is not often we have a visit from a man who among young men is so popular, and who is also an earnest and thoughtful speaker.

The regular Senior oratoricals were held on Tuesday last when many of the city people availed themselves of the opportunity to hear the orations.

On Monday, Jan. 18, the Gamma Phi Chapter of Delta Kappa Epsilon celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary with a banquet at the chapter house and appropriate ceremonies.

The Middletown Chapter of Alpha Delta is planning to give an afternoon tea on the Saturday before Washington's birthday.

Jeremiah D. Burns.

The class of 1882 at the High School had a large number of very bright and capable young people and among them the clear cut, earnest features of "Jerry" Burns stand out brightly. His teachers cannot forget his manly behavior nor the honest way he had with everything that pertained to his school life. Though he may not have had the robust bearing of some of his associates, certainly no one suspected that Death would claim him at so early an age. From the High School he went to Holy Cross College, whence he was graduated in 1885. He has, since, taught in the evening schools. He died Thursday at the age of 28 years, 6 mos and 20 days. A good boy gone home. His mother preceded him to the Spirit land. His father and sister survive him. The funeral takes place today, Saturday at his late residence, 91 Green, with requiem High Mass at St. John's Church at 9 a.m. A wide circle of friends lament his early death.

Mr. William Hunt.

This former Worcester resident died suddenly, Saturday, last, in Providence. Mr. Hunt was a native of Manchester, England, where he was born in December, 1823. He came to this country in 1859, settling first in Providence. He came to this city in 1866 and continued to reside here till 1872. Since then he has resided in Baltimore and Wilmington, Delaware, but for the last two years his home has been in Providence.

His business was that of a thread manufacturer though for two years past he has been connected with the Mannville Covering Company.

Seven children survive him, all of whom save James W. Hunt, Worcester's assistant postmaster, reside in Providence. Robert H., now connected with the Standard Oil Company, and Emily were formerly pupils in our High School. The church affiliations of the family were with the Baptist denomination.

Mr. Hunt had been, to some extent, a sufferer from kidney difficulties for the last two years and was just recovering from an attack of La Grippe; but he and his family had no apprehensions of danger. He awoke, Saturday and went about his usual duties, but dropped to the floor of the kitchen, dying instantly, presumably of heart disease, effected doubtless by his late ailment. The funeral was held at his late home, Wednesday at 1 p.m.

Society of Antiquity.

The regular meeting of this organization was held last Tuesday night at the new hall in Salisbury Street. Mr. F. L. Hutchins of this city furnished the principal item of the evening's entertainment in an account of the rise and growth of Volapuk. Thomas T. Kent and Herbert E. Chandler were elected to full membership. George L. Sanford and William E. Sawtelle were proposed.

Levi H. Turner of Maine addressed the Single Tax League last Thursday evening.

The fire is burning gayly,
The kettle sings its best;
All things are bright and cheerful
Here in our sweet home nest.
There's nothing now, my baby,
To do for you and me,
But just to watch for someone
Coming home to tea.

But there are those, my darling—
Aye, in this very street—
Whose ears have lost the music
Of homeward hast'ning feet,
Oh pity, and remember
How happy we should be
To have Someone to watch for,
Coming home to tea.

Lunch napkins are frequently fringed or edged with narrow drawn-work and little quotations outlined upon them which, of course, afford amusement to the guests, and call for pleasant chat. A few simple ones are these:

"Fruit, flowers and joyful welcome."
"Welcome and good appetite."
"The kettle sings, we'll all have tea."
"The cup that makes good cheer."
"Two lovely berries on one stem."

—Table Talk.

The nicest fire to broil with is made of charcoal.

Water in which rice has been boiled is a very suitable and nourishing addition to soups, gravies, or sauces in which milk is used.

As most persons enjoy a hot drink when taken from a glass rather than a cup, it is well to bear in mind that the former will not crack from heat if a spoon is placed in it before pouring in the liquid or fluid.

A nice way to take care of apples that will soon decay is the following: Prepare them as for cooking, stew until soft, and spread on plates. Put enough for a pie on each plate. Dry at once by putting in the stove oven, leaving the door ajar, or by setting on the top of the stove when there is not much fire. When dry, so that it looks shiny, slip it from the plate. Pack as you do griddle cakes, and keep in a dry place. When wanted for use, put the apple in a dish, pour on hot water sufficient to make it like the sauce it was, stir it, and soon it will be like nice, fresh apple sauce, the taste being preferred by many to apples dried the old way. Sweeten before drying or after, as you prefer.

A Sand Bag.

Cold weather is the season for earache, and mothers with young children who are subject to this affliction will find a sand bag almost invaluable, as it will hold the heat a long time, and its composition is such as to render it easily adjustable to the affected part.

Make a flannel bag ten inches square, and fill it with fine, clean sand that has been thoroughly dried in the oven.

Make a cotton bag to draw on over the flannel, as this will prevent the sand from sifting out.

This sand bag will also be found useful in cases of toothache and facial neuralgia. Place it in a hot oven on a plate when you wish to heat it.—Boston Household.

Boys—"Where is the Blame?"

Editor of Light:

DEAR SIR.—In the current number of LIGHT is the somewhat startling statement that "nine boys in their early teens were before the police court for offences more or less heinous," followed by the significant question "where is the fault?"

One answer to this question is implied in another column of the same paper, where it is said of the criminal (meaning the criminal class) "we can change his environment from one of idleness to one of industry, from ignorance to knowledge, from bad to good sanitary conditions." * * * * "The question is one of methods and of the right man behind them." Of course there at once occurs the inquiry where shall we begin and what particular method of improvement shall be introduced?"

The readers of LIGHT cannot be unmindful of the necessity of a radical change in the administration of our school system, so zealously insisted on by a large proportion of the school committee but so successfully thwarted by vigilant and persistent politics. By the hue and cry, raised in one district in consequence of the invasion of death-dealing disease, our city authorities have been compelled to order a reconstruction of the sanitary system which has been the special hobby of the superintendent of schools, and the advertising of which has been his principal literary success. Should the final effect of this outcry, wrung from the hearts of agonized parents and their friends be to place our schools in healthy conditions, a great gain will be made, however it may conflict with anybody's private greed. But the question "where is the fault?" And whose the blame for that moral miasm which fills judge Utley's court with the fetid breath of youthful crime? This question still remains unanswered; and it is perhaps not easy wholly to fix the blame for this state of affairs; but in the meantime come cheering reports of better things from all but our own schools, which see no glimmer of progress; and as well to give an instance of what is doing in places where people are alive to their duty and willing to do it without stopping to inquire "where is the fault," I copy a few lines from an article in the "Home-maker" for January, giving some account of the Kindergartens of San Francisco. I do not make any extended quotations, but give without comments, some facts of experience these, as bearing upon the statements and queries of LIGHT; these facts are given in reply to some questions addressed to Mrs. Cooper, president of "the Golden State Kindergarten Association," asking her for a brief summary of results, to which she replies:

1.—"An evident moral uplift, slow but sure in the localities where the kindergartens are located."
2.—"An increasing self-respect among parents; more affection in the household, etc."
3.—"A slow and steady growth in moral quality and the substantial virtues of practical daily living, etc., etc."

All of which claims are confirmed by the statement in the report that "during these twelve years nearly nine thousand children have received kindergarten training. Of these only one is known to have been arrested by the police! And this too in face of the fact that these children have come from the localities that make the criminal element!"

If instead of such a report Worcester has only to record juvenile crimes in the police court, "where is the blame?" H. H. C.

The closing of the building for a week or more on account of the diphtheria scare has caused the children to say all sorts of queer things.

One little girl says, "They're going to purify the school house."

"A little miss from Sycamore Street says, "I don't think its fair." One wonders what she would like. Would a few cases of disease near by please her better?

In the meantime, while sulphurous fumes are purifying the germ laden air of the school rooms, the late occupants are having the best of times skating, but occasional quails seize them as they wonder if they will have to lose the regular February vacation on account of this week off. That is the question that troubles them now.

Boys' Shirts.

There are a good many dozen less of them this morning.

There are a good many dozen yet, though, and you can have just the same chance with them today.

They are good shirts.

Linen bosoms, linen cuffs, linen neck bands, lined fronts, continuous back stays.

Yes, they are good, they are worth so.

If they were not a little soiled they would sell for 50c.

Being a little soiled,

Twenty-nine cents is the price.

Very handsome Toilet Sets have come to the Linen section.

Three pieces in the set:

Table Scarfs,

Dressing Case Scarfs,

Commode Scarfs.

The designs are wrought out in Mexican work, in diamonds, circles and cross bands.

We won't name the price for we want you to see them first.

Another lot of 12 1-c. Tray Cloths is here to help satisfy the incessant demand for them.

The Hamburg Edgings will surprise you today.

Don't think you won't have a good selection.

You will and you'll get some very pretty pieces for so low a price that the price won't count with you.

The White Skirts you must not forget. They are so well made up, and so good that it is good economy to buy them at the low price.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1892.

No. 24

St. Valentine.

February came at night,
Wrapped in cloud and drifting snow,
But her saint brought love and light,
So the days in sunshine go.

Then did Cupid deign to smile
On a February drear,
And we wish the little God
Of Love, would bless us all the year.

St. Valentine's Day tomorrow.

But today the gentle missives will go on their way and tomorrow many a heart will beat more quickly on account of tokens received.

It is a harmless, and to youth, a pleasant practice. In our hurly-burly of life, we have few enough of such diversions. Let us not frown upon them, but rather encourage as much as possible.

Many hands in this city have been employed for many a week in preparing the choicest of pictures and sentiments, calculated to please the gentle lover. Worcester furnishes the best and most artistic valentines in the market. We have then a business as well as a sentimental interest in the matter. Send valentines by all means.

LIGHT does not deal in scandal; will not refer to it, by name, but when a reputable citizen is assailed as one of our most respected dwellers was recently, all good people must rejoice at the stand that he took. Blackmailers will never make anything out of Mr. Curtis. It takes nerve to proceed as Mr. Curtis has done, but all haters of wrong doing will rejoice that he met the assault as he did.

For some time, our papers have teemed with accounts of the progress of the Anti-Lottery war in Louisiana. Before Massachusetts becomes too eloquent in the matter, had she not better stop and find out whether her skirts are entirely clear. For instance, how about church and other fairs, where the element of chance is constantly uppermost. How much better than a lottery is any scheme of guessing as to the number of peas, beans or shot in a bottle? There is not a week, in which we are not sought to take a chance in some sort of guessing scheme which differs from the Louisiana Lottery in degree, only. Should not the Anti-Lottery laws of our Commonwealth be enforced?

To the Greeks all other people were Barbarians. Today, this word is not so much employed as the term "Foreigners." Who are they? Afloat in the Bay of Biscay, Samuel Lover makes his hero proclaim himself "As good a furriner as any of them frog eating Freachmen." To the Southern people, the Northern army was wholly "Yankee" while many men in it had the most thorough indications of a birthright beyond the seas. Lately in New York city a German resident in that place for eighteen years proclaimed it impossible for herself and husband to get along on account of "The competition ob tem wretched foreigners." Only a few weeks since, a Worcester barber of German birth said in the most earnest yet broken manner, "If I had my way there should not come to this country any Chinese, Hungarians nor Russian Jews." Who is the foreigner?

Coming back to the Lottery subject, it is consoling to find that the advertisement of lottery schemes have had to come out of our theater programs. Now let the City Government go a step forward and demand that play bills and posters shall not be so glaringly immoral as many of them are. Public sentiment should be toned up, not down.

A favorite song of the Germans is "What is the German Fatherland." In this city, one might say "Who are the citizens of Worcester." Away from the city, all are Worcesterites to the fullest extent, but at home what a conglomeration exists. This is the season for reunions of all sorts of associations. Just read the names of a few of them. We have "Sons and Daughters of Maine," "Natives of New Hampshire and Vermont," "Empire State Association," "Natives of the Provinces," all sorts of Irish societies, English bodies that hold St. George sacred in some shape, Scotchmen who worship the Thistle, St. Andrew and Robert Burns, far away admirers of Gustavus Adolphus, Armenians enough to organize a church, Chinamen in such numbers that they no longer excite attention, Canadians sonnumerous that St. John's day is one of the notable occasions of the year, Germans who have a Froshinn Gesaug Verein, colored people with half a dozen churches, and so on with many other races and peoples. Wouldn't it be a good idea to have a society of the real old Simon pure Worcester people, those to the manor born, whose fathers were born here and who do not have any place nor part in any body nor organization outside of Worcester. It would be a party worth seeing. Is such a society possible? It certainly could not be a very large one.

Even Homer nods. In the Congressionalist for Feb. 4, commenting on the latest Report of the State Board of Education, the editor says, "There is no Catholic member of the Board nor has there been since E. C. Carrigan who was an appointee of Governor Butler." Mr. Carrigan was of an Irish family, but he was reared by Methodists, his affiliations were with that denomination and when he died his funeral was held in a Methodist Church and the sermon was preached by a Methodist minister. The Congressionalist lapsed badly there.

Again a recent number of the New York Christian Advocate, the leading Methodist paper in America, had a long letter from a recent visitor to London. The traveller who was from the "Boundless West" had looked up, as he thought, the burial place of John Wesley and had grown lacrymose over the low grave in Ilunhill Fields. Yet the Advocate put it all in without comment. Very likely there are twenty writers in about that paper who have seen Wesley's grave, back of City Road Chapel, which, by the way, is just over the way from Ilunhill. Possibly, the visitor in semi-darkness had found the last resting place of Susannah Wesley, the mother, and "Hine heae lacrymae."

More Fun.

"Mamma, you ought to have seen it!"

"Sassa what?"

"Why the dogs, the pug came down to visit the brown dog over the way an' when he got to the corner he was barking and his head was up, and his tail smiled right over his back, an' he was running an' when he was turning the corner he just sat right down and slid clear round an' he was so 'stonished that he forgot to bark an' the brown dog saw him disappear an' I guess he thought it was funny where he went to, an' so he went to see 'bout it an' when he got to the corner he couldn't get any nearer and he tried an' tried an' the more he tried the worse it was an' he kept going down on his knees an' then he went off a ways an' sat down an' barked at it an' then he'd try again. I tell you mamma it was fine fun!"

"An' mamma, there were ever so many High School girls tried to get 'round that corner an' Jack he said they'd be Jack Horners if they sat down on the corner, but folks that know how to skate can most always stand up. When can I have some skates mamma?"

"Oh dear, there comes the sand man, now we can't have any more fun!"

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, FEB. 13, 1892.

Readers will note with pleasure a literary letter from Boston. The writer occupies an exceptional position whence to glean the items given. Don't fail to read "Middlesex's" communication.

Another new magazine of first class character is Art Words published by A. H. Griffith, Detroit Museum and School of Art. Somewhat local in its bearings, it yet has enough on Art in general to be a very readable monthly.

The Boston Home Journal, one of the best of the papers published in Boston, holding a position peculiarly its own and, hitherto, making Saturday night something for its readers to look forward to, has recently taken upon itself a new garb and form, rendering it more attractive than ever. While the Journal is Bostonian enough to satisfy the veriest son of Harvard or a descendant of the Pilgrims, it is sufficiently general to be read with interest in New York and London. Its departments are well arranged and from first to last the paper is crisp, pointed and entertaining. There is nothing too good for the Home Journal.

Mrs. Wright E. Burnham, of Albany, N. Y., is spending a few weeks with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Cutting, on West Street.

A delightful musicale was given at Mr. B. D. Allen's studio, 173 Main Street, Tuesday evening in which the participants were Mrs. Mary L. Adams, soprano; Mr. B. D. Allen, pianist and Miss Nellie L. Inhabram, accompanist. A glance at the program will give an idea of the quality of the music rendered. Mrs. Adams sang a Recitativo e Romanza by Rossini; Rosemond by Charminade; In a Garden by Margaret Lang; Down by a Brook by Jules Jordan; At the Convent Gate by Tosti. Mr. Allen played the Cat's Fugue by Scarlatti; Gigue in G major by Mozart; Improvvisi in E flat by Schubert; three movements of Sonata in G major by Beethoven; Liebeslied, Op. 5, by Henselt; Intermezzo, Op. 27, Sigambati; Consolation, No. 5, by Liszt; Novallette by Rimsky-Korsakow and Papillons, Op. 2, (Carnival Ball) by Schumann.

Elliott H. Peabody, Esq., has opened an office for the practice of law and for special attention to cases of deeds, mortgages, wills, etc., at 37 Main street.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Feb. 13, 1892.

Sons and Daughters of New Hampshire.

Of all the State associations in this city perhaps there is no one more alive than the Sons and Daughters of New Hampshire, which held its 13th annual reunion in Horticultural Hall Thursday evening. The after-dinner speeches which followed the excellent supper served at 7:30 o'clock were particularly happy, such men as ex-Governor Goodell of New Hampshire, Mayor Harrington, Dr. Homer T. Fuller, ex-Mayor Tinker of New London and State Treasurer George A. Marden responding to toasts proposed by President J. P. Rand. Also, Rev. Charles M. Palmer read an original poem written for the occasion. Dancing, which lasted into the morning hours, concluded the evening's exercises.

English High School.

There are few people who know him who will not be ready to extend congratulations to Principal Jenkins of the Dix Street School on account of his promotion to the headship of the New English High School.

A number of young ladies living at the north end gave a very pretty leap year party at Colonial Hall last Saturday evening. The matrons were Mrs. George A. Barnard, Mrs. Charles H. Davis, Mrs. J. Edgar Davis and Mrs. J. F. Hastings. Miss Annie Davis, with Sumner Brooks of Boston, led the cotillion.

The comedy drama, "Nevada," recently successfully presented at the First Universalist Church for the benefit of the Sunday School of the XIV. club, will be repeated in Horticultural Hall, Friday evening, March 18, 1892, under the auspices of Industry council, Junior Order of American Mechanics.

Private Theatricals.

Monday and Tuesday evenings at the residence of Mrs. Charles W. Smith, 30 Elm street, two plays were given for the object of raising money to establish a fund for a district nurse at the Memorial Hospital. The two pieces given were Jerome K. Jerome's comedy, "The Way to His Pocket." The cast for the former was as follows: Barbara, Miss Sarah Hopkins; Lily, Miss Mary Eaton; Cecil, Charles Ranlet; Dr. Finnicum, Edwin Brown. For the latter: Burton, Col. W. S. B. Hopkins; Mr. Gray, Dr. George D. Kelley; Prudence, Miss Josephine Smith; Patience, Miss Elizabeth Hopkins; Addie, Miss George Stone. Col. Hopkins managed the presentation and Halleck Bartlett had charge of the stage settings. Quite a sum of money was realized.

The last of the series of socials of the Light Infantry will be held at the Armory next Friday evening.

Secretary Monroe.

One of the most interesting features of the meeting of the Worcester Co. Music Association, Thursday, was the report of the Secretary. Under numerous well-defined heads he sets forth the merits and prospects of the Association. LIGHT regrets its inability to report the same in full.

Paderewski.

The program for the concert by Paderewski, which by the way is to take place in Mechanics instead of Association Hall on account of the demand for tickets, is as follows: Sonata appassionata, Beethoven; Papillons, Schumann; Serenade, Erl-King, Schubert-Liszt; Nocturne, Etude, Berceuse, Mazurka, Valse, Chopin; Melodie, Cracovienne, Paderewski; Rhapsodie Hongroise, Liszt.

The World's Fair.

There lies on the table of the Young Mens Christian Association, at Elm Street, a petition to the legislature from Worcester, paying reference to the world's fair at Chicago. It is headed by Rev. Henry T. Cheever, Rev. W. T. Worth and the secretary of the Young Mens Christian Association, and will be forwarded to Boston when a complement of signers has been obtained. Ministers of the gospel and others interested are asked to append their names without delay. Following is a copy of the petition. To the general court of Massachusetts—

The undersigned citizens of Worcester, on behalf of the patriotic churches of Puritan Massachusetts, hereby respectfully petition the legislature of the state that their appropriation to the world's fair at Chicago be made to include a request from the legislature that the exhibition be not kept open on the national rest day of the Christian Sabbath.

This a practical matter in which thousands of Worcester people should be interested.

CHURCH NOTES.

SOUTH UNITARIAN.—Rev. G. W. Kent of Boston has accepted a call to become pastor of this church.

METHODIST.

The regular meeting of the Methodist ministers of Worcester and vicinity took place at Grace Church, Monday. There was a good attendance and an animated discussion of the subjects presented.

In the evening came the meeting of the Social Union at Trinity Church, the president, P. Foster White, in the chair. The Rev. C. D. Hills, a former pastor of Grace Church, was present as a guest and read a paper on class meetings. Many participated in the resulting discussion. Dr. Hills was accompanied by his daughter who was a very small girl when a resident of Worcester. In the absence of Secretary Chas. H. Carpenter, now in California, John Legg filled the position of scribe.

SWEDISH.—The Rev. A. G. Anderson of Brooklyn, N. Y., is aiding the Rev. Mr. Eklund in revival services at the Thomas Street Church.

Y. M. C. A. Course.

The Tufts College Glee, Mandolin and Guitar Clubs, W. S. Hawkins, leader, John Burgess Weeks, reader, Edwin J. Randall, manager, gave the third entertainment in the second series of the Young Men's Christian Association course. A very excellent program was rendered, nearly all the numbers possessing the merit of being new. Encores were very frequent and the clubs were very kind in responding. The next entertainment will be given by Mr. Iceland T. Powers, impersonator, in "The Shaugraun."

The junior department is to have a course of entertainments, and the boys are out selling tickets to win the prize of one year's free use of the gymnasium, offered to the boy selling the most tickets. The entertainments and dates are as follows: February 18, Rev. J. J. Lewis of Boston, illustrated lecture on "Through the Canadian Rockies"; 29, W. D. Leroy, illusionist; March 14, George Irving Pettigill, boy soprano, and Miss Gertrude A. Lovering of Somerville, reader; March 28, R. H. Mohr, sleight of hand; April 11, Kidder Tripp; 18, war lecture.

Don't eat candy immediately before dinner if you are hungry, or the first thing in the morning; in such cases it takes away the appetite and gives a headache.

Eli.

BY C. F. MATTHEWS.

It was an afternoon of a hot day in August, as a lonely tramp came into the village of Castleton. He was ragged and uncouth looking, and the few who saw him, took no further thought than that it was somebody who was beneath their notice. As he came he moved along with the air of one who did not know or expect the sympathy of others. Presently he entered the little store of Mr. Owen, a dusty, peniless traveller and took a seat, laying a little bundle that he carried with him on the floor at his side.

Mr. Owen took kindly to him at once, for he seemed like one who was deserving of friends and he also thought he could discover beneath this unkempt, neglected surface, a man who was truthful, one to be relied on. Mr. Owen learned from him that he was an entire stranger to the community and also that he was able to labor and much desired to obtain work of some kind, so he took him into his family for a day or two, telling him he thought he might help him to place among some of the neighboring farmers.

In a short time, Mr. Farnum, a well-to-do farmer who employed a considerable number of men, happened in, and Mr. Owen laid the case before him, telling him the circumstances as they appeared to him.

"Well Owen, I should like another man," said the farmer, "but these tramps who come along from nobody knows where, are to my mind risky men to hire. You never know what is behind them, nor what they will do." Nevertheless, influenced by the good opinion of Mr. Owen, Farnum at length consented to give the stranger a trial and he was accordingly set to work.

For a year, Eli labored faithfully for the farmer, and Mr. Farnum would have been glad to hire him for another year, but Eli, who had been very saving of his wages, and had laid by enough to buy a little place there was in the neighborhood, wished "to do for himself" as he expressed it, and so he left Mr. Farnum, much to that gentleman's dislike, for the tramp had proved himself a faithful, honest laborer. He was very reticent about himself, however. He claimed that his life had been intentionally good, but that he had been unfortunate. One day he was ploughing on his place, when a neighbor rode up, just as Eli came out with his furrow and he drew up his horse for a word.

"Good morning, Eli, ploughing a little?"

"Yes," replied the farmer absent-mindedly.

"What's the news," said the visitor, putting one foot on the wheel of his carriage.

"Nothin's I know of," replied Eli, who was never inclined to talk much. There was something about him, that kept one wondering what he was thinking about so steadily.

"I've sold the Holmes place, I suppose you know," said the other settling back.

"No I don't," replied Eli, kicking the dirt from his plough and not seeming to take much interest in the news being conveyed by the other.

"Yes, sold it to a man from Lynxville."

"Lynxville!" said Eli with a tone of surprise, "Who!"

"Hanson, I think he calls himself."

At this information, Eli turned his head and looked at the woods standing out so beautifully against the moving sun, in their new coat of green. Something attracted his attention there or else a new theme had been aroused at the news of the visitor.

After a few other remarks the neighbor passed along, leaving Eli to himself and his work.

Eli ploughed and thought. The old horse went lazily enough, more so than ever before it seemed, but his master did not appear to notice it. His mind was busy with the past. Scenes, enacted years before, passed through his memory as fresh as if they had been only yesterday. When Eli went to his dinner that noon, which by reason of his bachelor life, he was forced to prepare for himself, he had not settled in his mind what he should do in case the family of Hanson moved into the place. However, after being refreshed by the meal and looking at the matter from every side, he said at last, "Well, I am not wholly to blame for that, though I suffered the penalty alone. If they come, they will know me of course and Hanson will not be slow in speaking it as far as he can, and so the good name I have tried to establish here will be destroyed. Shall I go, or shall I stay?" he inquired mentally, as he cast his thoughts over the situation before him. After thinking it over awhile, he came to the conclusion that the best way would be to stay and live it down. He might not live many years now. There did not seem to be much use of running away from it, and he had lived so long with it, that even if the people of the village should give him up after hearing it, he would still get along in some manner. He had hoped to live somewhere, where the one mishap of his life would not face him at every turn he made.

In the course of a few days, the Hansons arrived at Castleton.

Eli knew early of their arrival, for he had kept himself informed in regard to the time that they were expected to come, and then followed a time of anxious, prolonged waiting. Many times he found himself, in the meanwhile, addressing his invocations to the One above to help him in the time of trouble, when all might stand against him. One day Eli, who had kept himself pretty closely at home since the Hansons moved into the place, was working in his garden, when he was addressed by a stranger, who said he understood he was accustomed to go out with his team to do a little work for people, and as he had just come to the neighborhood, he wished to employ a good man, and a horse to help him a day or two.

Eli turned his face to that of the visitor; he felt sure that now the dreaded moment had come and he braced himself for the conflict. Instantly, there was mutual recognition, visible on both the faces. The long lapse of time since the two had last met, was quickly gone over, until they seemed to stand in the very presence of that long ago.

"Eli Horton, is it you that I have come to see," said Hanson in deep bitterness.

"It is," replied Eli calmly.

"How came you here in this far off place, and what can you be doing," asked the other in a contemptuous voice.

"I am trying to live an upright life," said Eli trying to be composed in spite of the insulting way of Hanson.

"Don't you find it uphill business?" he interrogated in derision.

"Why should I. Does one crime, done in thoughtlessness, entirely unfit one for usefulness?" asked Eli.

"It does, when it is known. But I suppose, you crept in here in an innocent way, after you left the prison, and no doubt have kept the whole affair to yourself, so that now you may be like a saint to some of the people here."

"O Hanson!" exclaimed Eli sadly. "Must I pursue a downward course forever, simply because once I went wrong. Why will you not help me? Nothing can tempt me now to do an illegal act. Help me Hanson, I implore you."

"There you are pious now!" observed Hanson, with biting sarcasm.

"No, not that, but I mean to do right."

"If you had thought of that before."

"Yes, but will you be my friend now!" asked Eli earnestly.

"How?"

"Stand by me. I did you no wrong."

"No, its not wrong to pass counterfeit money, unless you get found out, I suppose."

"Will you help me?" asked Eli in an imploring voice.

"Yes, when we have snow in Summer," answered Hanson, with a sneer, "I'll see you put in your right position Eli Horton, good morning."

Eli had reason to believe that Hanson would do as he said. He was pained at the thoughts of again meeting the averted eye and disdainful look of the believer in his wrong doing, for he had spent so many years in prison, that he felt an earnest desire, at the expiration of his sentence, to go into some nook, where quiet might be had, and try in his best way, to live the remainder of his life as an upright citizen.

After Hanson left Eli, he was anxious to acquaint his wife with the fact of Eli's being in the neighborhood, and then, as he was a man who was inclined to be meddlesome, even with that which did not so much concern him, he intended to put his character in its right light before the people of the place. But when Mrs. Hanson heard her husband's story she said firmly:—

"No Fred, you shall do no such thing. If Eli is trying to live an upright life, you shall not hinder him."

"I don't believe in a man living like a hypocrite," answered Hanson.

"Neither do I. Nor is he, I think," she answered thoughtfully.

Although somewhat chagrined, Fred Hanson listened to the words of his wife and kept still, but it went very much against his will. He never, really, liked Horton anyway and when, years ago, at the school graduation, they spoke for the grand prize, offered to the one who should best deserve it, Hanson really thought he was going to receive it and made his brag that no one else stood any kind of a chance of getting it. However, Eli had stepped in and carried it off, almost without a struggle, and then what little regard he had for Eli turned to hate.

He despised him and he vowed he would never overlook it in him to the longest day he lived and when that false step was taken that proved so severe a matter for Eli, no person gloried in his downfall like Fred Hanson. No pains were spared by him to make the most he could out of it, against Eli.

The fact that Eli Horton lived in Castleton aroused old memories in Mrs. Hanson's thoughts. "Can it be," she said to herself, "that Alice is coming to him now." As she went about doing her work in an absent sort of a way, she would say "Here is Eli and there is dear Alice, both alone." She remembered when Eli went to prison, how her sister, Alice, had changed from a bright, laughing girl, almost in a day, to a quiet, matronly lady, with no inclinations for outside company. She had lived all these years in singleness, although more than one chance had been offered to her of a home and husband, yet she had refused them all and lived alone. As Mrs. Hanson swept and dusted and arranged the furniture of her rooms, her mind gradually sought out the action she would take for these two lonely people.

A day or two after, she arranged herself in her hat and shawl and going out walked briskly along toward Mr. Oweo's store which, on reaching, she entered. She was glad to find the merchant alone and asked to look at some particular kind of cloth. Mr. Owen handed it down from the shelf and while she was looking at it, she engaged the merchant's attention in a line of conversation, that would lead around as to what the general feeling of the people was toward Eli Horton.

"O yes, Eli is a good sort of a person as there is living," he remarked innocently. "The poor man needs some one to help him in his efforts to get along, I think, but I don't know as he thinks so."

This was enough for Mrs. Hanson and after giving the store-keeper an order for goods to be sent to her house, she started in the direction of Eli's humble abode. Arriving at the house, she rapped gently on the door. Eli opened it and with surprise pictured upon his calm face, he instantly recognized his visitor.

"Why Emma,—Ah, excuse me, I should say Mrs. Hanson," he managed to say with difficulty.

"No," she replied, pleasantly extending her hand to him, "I'm Emma just the same."

"And do you deign to call on a convict? If so, will you please to come in?" he remarked thoughtfully.

"I am pleased to call on you," she answered, entering, paying no attention to his self-applied epithet.

"Are you getting along comfortably?" she asked in a sympathetic voice.

"O yes, in a way," replied Eli with little spirit.

Mrs. Hanson took a seat and looked about upon the simple furnishings of the room. The unwashed wood-work, the cobweb mantled ceiling, in fact everything in it denoted absence of a woman's care. She looked at Eli and her thoughts wandered back more than twenty years. Was this patient, sorrowful man before her the bright, active, energetic person she knew then?

"Why didn't you come back to Lynxville, Eli, instead of coming here," she asked.

"To Lynxville?" he replied in astonishment.

"Yes."

"I could not," he answered sorrowfully, "for all my high hopes were blasted. I came here where no one knew me and where I truly hoped when I came, that no one I knew would ever find me out: to live out what portion of life I may have remaining. But my best days are gone." He bowed his head in his hands, the very picture of a discouraged man.

"And yet you would have found friends there, for many have overlooked the one offense of your life, even were it an offense."

"That might be, Emma," he replied raising his head and looking at his visitor with earnest inquiring eyes. "But to one I could ever be the same, O no, no," he said, sadly.

"To us you would, at least. I know my husband is a little against you in regard to a personal matter but I have prevailed on him to take another view of the case for your sake and ours," she replied with true and womanly grace.

"Thank you, Emma."

Eli looked anxiously at her while she was speaking, as if to read her very thoughts. There was pictured on his face an intense interest as if he dreaded yet desired to know the true intent of her remarks.

"Where is Alice," he asked at length with bated breath.

"At her old home alone," answered Mrs. Hanson.

"Alone?" replied Eli quickly. "How is that?" he asked as a strange look of expectant joy flitted across his face, but which instantly gave way to the old anxious one as if a smile of gladness was a forbidden thing for him to enjoy.

"Yes Eli, she has never married."

"And why, Emma, if you still allow a convict to address you so familiarly, why has she chosen a life of solitude?"

"You a man and yet cannot guess," she observed, seriously, "and still you know what the prospects were once."

"O Mrs. Hanson! Emma! you can't mean that she has done it out of any regard for me. No, no. It cannot be! I, a convict, a state prison bird, a law breaker! No, she is too pure to give one thought to a vagabond like me. I was right to come here at first," he said dejectedly.

"And yet, Eli, she did, for she never blamed you for that. You were young, you know, then, and was led into the crime by the thoughtlessness of yourself and companions. She wanted to tell you so but you never gave her the chance, you know."

"For the reason I did not think she would want to be considered my friend after that," he replied in a sad manner.

"Do you still desire her friendship as of old?"

"O Emma," he answered eagerly, "that is more than I ever dreamed could fall to my lot."

"Well then," said Mrs. Hanson in a business like way, "I see no reason why you should not be friends as of old. Next week I am going have her come to my house and you must come and see her. Yet you must not tell her a word I've said or a thing I've done to bring you together. I do it for I think you both will be happier, but she needn't know about my taking up the part of a self-constituted missionary."

After Mrs. Hanson went away, Eli sat down to think like one in a maze. His mind turned back more vividly than it had for a long while to the time, twenty-two years before, when he had in a joke written a man's name on a paper to carry out a little fun with his companions. At the time and to make the sport more complete the paper was allowed to go out from the group wherein it had originated and by some chance it soon turned up in the hands of the man whose name it bore.

Then what had been done in thoughtlessness by Eli, now proved to be a very serious matter for the man, enraged at the thought of his name having been illegally used, did not rest until he had brought Eli to judgment and at the conclusion of the trial he was sentenced to twenty years in the State Prison for uttering false paper.

Friends did not avail to ease the long sentence on account of Eli's former good character and so he was forced to go and serve his time in the penitentiary.

One of the chief anxieties of his mind as he went was of Alice Holton whom he had learned to love and he had reason to believe she returned it with her own, still they had not been engaged. He could not bring himself to think, after his crime done in jest, that she would care to further consider him as a suitor, so he had tried to forget her. It was not until several months had gone by of sleepless nights tossing on his bunk with fierce contending conflicts going on within his breast, between love and shame, that will had at last gained the supremacy. Yet love was not vanquished entirely, nor would it ever be, for there remained an aching void and would, to the end of life. In all these years he had never seen Alice, nor heard from her. Still she had chosen a life of singleness as her sister had told him out of her regard for him. This to Eli seemed a very great blessing indeed. He began to feel some of the old vigor he had when he knew her. He tried to think how she would look after twenty-two years separation. The fascinating eyes, the child's laugh, the pure rich hue of her complexion, how had they stood the ravages of time? No doubt but they were all greatly changed.

With these thoughts came also those of how his own person had altered in the time. He arose slowly and went to the glass. Several silver threads appeared in his hair. His form was a little stooping. There was a settled look of anxious care on his face. This was in the main the most he noted, but it was evident that he was not the same in personal appearance that he was twenty-two years ago. "Ah well," he sighed as he turned away with a strange smile, "I may be happy yet."

In a few days Mrs. Hanson sent word to Eli that Alice was at her house and invited him to call, so fixing himself up as best he could, in his rather seedy clothing he went to her house. With a tumultuous feeling within his breast that seemed to greatly disturb his usually calm thoughts he knocked timidly at the door. Mrs. Hanson ushered him in, leading him to the sitting room. As they entered, Eli saw at the opposite side of the room the figure of a neatly dressed lady, who on turning to him gave a start of recognition. He advanced eagerly and grasping her hand said, with great emotion, "Alice." "Eli, where did you come from?" "exclaimed Alice looking in amazement at her sister who stood enjoying the scene between the two glad hearts before her.

"O, I am one of the poor citizens of the place," he replied truthfully.

"And you never told me," she said, trying to look reproachfully at her sister standing meekly by.

Mrs. Hanson soon had urgent business in the kitchen and thither took her way. When her husband came in she took him to herself and gave a history of the love of Eli Horton and her sister Alice.

Mr. Hanson was surprised to learn of this and asked why she had never told him before of it.

"Because Alice did not wish to have me tell anyone," she replied.

"And yet you did, to him," said her husband.

"Yes, Fred ; to bring the two together."

"Well, all right," replied Mr. Hanson good naturedly. "I will help him as much as I've tried to abuse him. I had an equal chance with him and he beat me. I would have done the same. It's always been strange to me that Alice chose to live single, but we have the key at last."

When Eli and Alice appeared to Mr. and Mrs. Hanson, they were happy faces, and as the four embraced each other old feuds were forgotten, and good resolutions formed in their places.

Eli found his life of loneliness changed and with a true and faithful wife he prospered. They considered it best to give it out to the world the true story of his prison life and its cause. All freely forgave him and he lived an honored man among them.

The Causeway.

Why wouldn't it be a practical matter for our new Board of Trade to consider the proposed crossing of the Lake at the causeway by the Dummy Rail Road? Isn't the consideration of such questions one of the reasons for the Board's existence? Shrewsbury people say they have to cross the bridge more than Worcester folks and they are willing to run the risk of fright. Is there not a good chance for the Board to distinguish itself here and to do something towards bringing Shrewsbury, Northboro and Marlboro nearer Worcester.

The Duke of Kent.

The death of the oldest son of the Prince of Wales promotes his next son, Prince George. The latter, like his uncle, the Duke of Edinburgh, has had experience on the sea, and should he succeed to the throne may be called "The Sailor King." He resembles his father in face and form and, on being raised to the Peerage will assume the title of Duke of Kent, that of his great grandfather, that son of George the Third who never saw his daughter, now Queen Victoria. Should he become king he would be George the Fifth, a time honored Hanoverian name. His father will be Edward VII., a name not known to the throne since the days of the gentle son of Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour.

Ex-Mayor Charles B. Pratt is reported somewhat better.

Col. and Mrs. W. A. Williams have gone to Washington, D. C., for the remainder of the Winter.

Senator Pinkerton is in request in Odd Fellow circles. Wednesday night he opened a Daughters of Rebecca Fair in Abington.

Principal Jenkins of the Dix Street School lectured in Sterling Tuesday night on the physical features of the moon. This was in the Conant Course.

Miss Anna G. Brown entertained a few of her friends at her home No. 31 Harvard Street last Friday evening, it being her birthday anniversary.

Miss Alice Davis, Miss Ethel A. Tillinghast and Miss Hattie Kingsbury, all in the class of '92 at the High School, successfully passed the entrance examination to the Bridgewater State Normal School this week but will not enter until next Fall.

Worcester was well represented at the Brown University dinner in Boston Thursday night. Col. E. B. Stoddard was one of the speakers and Dr. Ray W. Green was elected secretary.

Miss Annabel C. Roe is improving the recess in the Dix Street School to visit her grandparents in Ashland.

Mr. James H. Mellen of Ward Four led the opposition to the proposed abolition of legislative passes last Wednesday. Things were lively for a little while.

Mrs. John Wheeler of Highland Street has been a sufferer from the grip, being kept closely at home for four weeks, but she is now out again.

Mrs. Frederic Smith of Middletown, Conn., has been visiting her daughter, Mrs. George Metcalf on Belmont Street. She returned to her home, last Monday.

Walter R. Forbush, formerly an architect in this city, now in Boston, was recently in Worcester, and he made a negative of the Downing Street School house of which he is the architect.

The second of the subscription assemblies was held in Colonial Hall last week Friday evening. The ushers were Colonel Rockwood Hoar, George T. Dewey, William B. Scofield and Dr. George D. Moore. The patronesses were Mrs. Halleck Bartlett, Mrs. Frank R. Macullar and Mrs. F. H. Dewey. A delegation of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished music and Rebboll was the caterer. There was a large attendance. The last of the assemblies will be held Friday evening, Feb. 26.

The first social dance of the Highland Bicycle and Athletic Club was held in Unity hall last week Friday evening. The floor was in charge of the following: Floor director, Herbert Jones; Assistants, C. G. Gilman, L. H. Fairbanks, William Carr and H. L. Lemoine; reception committee, A. H. Wainwright, M. E. Taylor and D. Roche.

HISTORY OF THE HIGH SCHOOL.

The Classical and English High School of Worcester began in 1845. At the end of the present school year, it will be divided. Having the data prepared, I purpose, if sufficient interest is shown in the project, to issue a history of the School. The book, a square octavo, nicely bound in cloth, will contain:

FIRST—An account of the beginning of the institution and a running comment on teachers and pupils to the present year.

SECOND—Statements as to the growth and progress of the school apparatus, library and other features, so essential to the success of the same.

THIRD—The names of all pupils in the school down to 1861, the first graduating exercises, and the names of all graduates since.

FOURTH—The graduating exercises in full from 1861 to the end.

FIFTH—Pictures of the school buildings and of teachers with miscellaneous matter pertinent to the subject.

The coöperation of every one ever connected with the school is besought. To show your interest in the work, please fill out and return the accompanying coupon.

February 13, 1892.

ALFRED S. ROE.

I hereby agree to purchase, when issued, a History of the Worcester High School at a price not exceeding $1.50 per copy, Art and Literature in Boston.

"A Summer in Venice" is the attractive sign which catches the eye of the wayfarer who passes Doll and Richard's this week; and to step into their little gallery is to forget for half an hour our wet sidewalks, chilly winds and crossings inches deep in slush. A beautiful little collection of water-colors is on exhibition, by Mr. Hopkinson Smith, whose delightful readings from his inimitable "Colonel Cyster" are still fresh in our minds. Most of them, as the title indicates, are Venetian, but one of the prettiest is "The Paris Flower Market," and one of "An Old Dutch Tower" is very beautiful. Better judges than I am say that the atmospheric effects are very fine; in "A Hot Afternoon" you can almost see the air vibrate over the heated pavement, and in "A Passing Storm" you can feel the hot air under the dark cloud. In the water pictures, of which there are naturally a good many, the water has a wonderful translucence, and the reflections in it seem to quiver before one's eyes. I walked over to study this more closely, and,—the picture was on blue paper, and only the reflection was painted across the blue surface. I speak as an ignorant observer, and do not know if other artists use this same device; but it seems to show great cleverness. A large share of the pictures, I am told, are sold already, though they have been exhibited but a few days. Artist, author, traveller, reader,—could any one be more versatile than Mr. Hopkinson Smith?

The annual show of the Art Club is no longer a novelty, for it has been going on some three weeks, but the gallery is still filled every afternoon. There are a great many charming things this year and, it seems to me, fewer than usual of the monstrosities that have sometimes been seen there. I notice one Worcester artist on the list,—Mr. Joseph Greenwood, whose little study of "A New England Haystack" is very attractive.

The interest in Dr. Lyman Abbott's lectures at the Lowell Institute rose higher with each week that he was here;—indeed, it was only the bitter weather of last week, which made it possible for the audience to get into Huntington Hall at all. And now from all directions come replies and criticisms. Rev. Minot J. Savage has begun a series of three sermons on Dr. Abbott's statement of Christian Evolution; others are reproaching him as too "advanced"; one Unitarian minister last Sunday, in preaching on the subject, virtually welcomed Dr. Abbott into that communion,—a welcome which Dr. Abbott would be slow to accept. One cannot help thinking that these lectures will mark what the newspapers call an epoch, and that they will be a point to reckon from in the religious history of our day,—and this whether the tide of opinion follows Dr. Abbott or not.

Speaking of sermons, what a flood of them poured out at poor "Robert Elsmere." One cannot but wonder if the new "History of David Grieve" will call out a similar outburst. I have not seen the book yet, but the Lounger of the New York Critic says "there is not a note of happiness in it, from the beginning to the end." In that case, it will not be very dangerous.

Another rather new book has given at least one Boston clergyman occasion for a sermon, and yet is one which I have hardly seen noticed in any of the reviews. I know the Worcester library is in the fore front of progress, and yet perhaps there is some reader of LIGHT who has not heard of "Cecilia de Noel." Of course everybody read "Mademoiselle Ixe," so when one has said that this is another work of the same clever pen, that is enough to recommend it. I do not see any statement which seems authoritative as to who "Lanoe Falconer" is; she is said to be Gladstone's daughter-in-law, or niece, or something; but it is quite clear that she doesn't need to depend on any great connections to float her literary bark. "Cecilia de Noel" is worthy of a finished literary workman.

It is a ghost story in which the ghost is not of the least importance. That is, it is the story of the way in which some people, having different training and habits of thought, deal with the fact that there seems to be a ghost in the house. It might just as well have been anything else which shocks people out of their comfortable ruts,—say a railway accident, or a bankruptcy; which is why I say the ghost is of no importance. It is not even explained whether there really was or was not a ghost. The satire is keen to the last degree, there is a great deal of humor all through, and anything more beautiful than the concluding chapter, in which Cecilia meets the ghost I have never read. MIDDLESEX.

The Pilgrimage of the Rose.

"The Pilgrimage of the Rose," a cantata by Robert Schumann, the words of which are founded on a poem by Moritz Horn, was given at Salem Street Church last week Tuesday evening by the special chorus of the church, assisted by outside soloists. The chorus has been studying the work for some time under the direction of Mr. B. D. Allen, and its successful presentation showed that the preparatory work had been carefully and thoroughly done. The story of the cantata is as follows: All nature is rejoicing in the return of Spring and the fairies are dancing with joy, when the festivities are interrupted by the mournful plaining of the rose, who has heard a maiden tell of the joys of true love and bewails that Spring for her no love-joy brings. The queen of the fairies endeavors to convince her of her folly, but, failing, changes her into a maiden, giving her a rose which shall keep her from harm, but with the warning that if it leaves her hand she shall become a rose again. Then the story tells of her wanderings, of her adoption by the miller and his wife, whose daughter had died a short time before, of the wooing by Max, the forester's son, of the wedding and closes when Rosa places the magic rose in the hand of her child and fades away, going back to her former state.

The characters were taken Tuesday evening as follows: The Rose, afterwards Rosa, Mrs. J. A. Rice; Fairy Queen, Martha and the miller's wife, Miss Alice Hammond; grave digger, C. J. Marshall; the miller, D. C. Turner; Max, T. B. Hamilton. The narrators were Mrs. J. W. Mitchell, first soprano; Mrs. L. G. Holden, second soprano; Mrs. F.

W. Ruggles, contralto; T. B. Hamilton, tenor. Mr. C. H. Groot was organist; Miss E. L. Whittemore, pianist and Mr. B. D. Allen, conductor. There was a large audience, which thoroughly enjoyed the performance.

Ashley Moore.

A whole section of Worcester history disappears in the death of this estimable gentleman. He died at his residence, Pleasant Street, opposite Moreland, Friday the 5th aged 84 years, or near that, since he was born February 19, 1808. He was of Tatnuck, from his birth, that taking place on the farm owned by his father and grandfather before him; yes, another generation is needed to get back to the original Moore. He was the last survivor of a family of ten children. On both sides, he was qualified to belong to a Worcester Society, did such ever exist, for his pedigree was of the most exclusive Worcester stock. He was married April 1, 1832 to Lucy Gates, of Tatnuck, daughter of Levi Gates and, thereby, a descendant of the earliest settlers. Their golden wedding was celebrated in Tatnuck Hall in 1882. The membership of the family in the Old South Church dates back to the beginning of the town and church. His wife, in feeble health, with sons J. Arthur and Charles A. and a daughter, Mrs. George A. Fuller of West Newton survive him. His health has been poor for some months. His funeral took place at Tatnuck Hall, Monday last at 2 p. m., the Rev. Mr. Conrad officiating.

For an Emergency.

After listening to Dr. Wm. T. Souther's emergency lectures 95 men of Worcester's militia took the examinations and the following passed—

Light Infantry—Capt. H. B. Fairbanks, Lieut. P. L. Rider, Lieut. W. F. Gilman, Sergt. W. E. Hassam, Corp. A. C. King, Corp. H. H. Warren, William E. Fairbanks, William S. Lincoln, Harry W. Marsh, Fred W. Wesson, Walter E. Briggs, E. E. Johnson, Frank A. Hatch, Tom Walters, Jr.

Emmet Guards—Sergt. M. E. Hines, Sergt. J. J. Monihan, Corp. J. F. Hurley, Corp. P. H. Moran, W. F. Keenan, J. J. Dolan, J. F. McGrath, F. M. Flanley, J. J. Corliss.

Battery B—Corp. W. T. Hunt, Corp. J. P. Lee, Corp. H. B. Lee, Harry Clarkson, Milton Freeman, Charles E. Chase, F. J. Clarkson, W. E. Sayles, John H. Hartwell, C. E. Gould.

City Guards—Cap. W. A. Condy, Lieut. M. H. Tisdell, Lieut. E. G. Barrett, Corp. G. F. Warren, Mus. H. R. Behrew, J. T. Cruikshank, G. W. Stebbins, E. A. Price, E. R. Reide, F. W. Lawrence, H. R. Gibbs, A. C. N. Peterson, W. J. Moore, A. C. Lary, J. A. Harriott, G. E. Allison.

Staff 2d regiment, Sergt. Lucias W. White.

Barbed Wire.

It is announced that the Barbed Wire Trust is at an end. One can't help wondering how this will affect Worcester's greatest industry.

Horticultural.

The next semi-centennial will be that of the Horticultural Society. This will come Thursday, the 3d day of March.

Books and Bookmen

Beneath the rule of men entirely great,
The pen is mightier than the sword.

Lord Lytton, Richelieu.

Jan Ingelow, who is a native of Lincolnshire, is the daughter of a banker. There were eleven children, and she was not esteemed the cleverest by any means. "My favorite retreat," said the poetess, "was a lofty room in the old house, where there was a low window which overlooked the river. The windows had the good old-fashioned shutters which folded back against the walls. I would open these shutters and write my verses and songs on them and fold them back again. My mother came in one day and discovered them; many of them were transmitted to paper and preserved."

The Story of Massachusetts. By Edward Everett Hale. 8 vo., $1.50. Boston: D. Lothrop Company.

Massachusetts has had her story told in many forms and by many pens, but never in just so unique or interesting a manner as in the volume which under the title, "The Story of Massachusetts," Dr. Edward Everett Hale has contributed to the series, the Story of the States, which D. Lothrop Company are issuing under the editorial supervision of Elbridge S. Brooks.

Dr. Hale could not write dull history if he tried; he is therefore certain to write an entertaining story. A story, he holds, is not a book of annals, but a graphic narrative based on dramatic events. He therefore selects from the three centuries of Massachusetts' history, twenty-one occasions of critical interest, crystallizing each into a chapter and showing, whenever necessary, the connection that exists between these selected events, and thus leading the reader from beginnings to results.

A prefatory chapter on "the Bay State" puts into interesting chronological order the history of the State's two hundred and seventy years, so that one may study its record in brief before turning to a perusal of the story in detail as given in the twenty-one selected epochs that follow. These epochs or "occasions," as will be seen by the Table of Contents, deal with the Pilgrims and the Puritans who at Plymouth and Boston laid the firm foundations of the old Bay Colony and the great Bay State; with the environs of Boston as the State's "hub" and center; with such disturbing and yet developing elements as Mistress Anne Hutchinson and "the people called Quakers"; with the Salem Witchcraft, the old Indian troubles, the French and Indian Wars and the tyrannical Sir Edmund Andros, whose stupidity was really Massachusetts' opportunity; with the capture of Louisiana and the fall of Canada; with the mutterings of revolution in the Boston Massacre, its outbreak at Lexington and Concord and its inherent strength as shown at Bunker's Hill; with the record of Massachusetts' old-time industries and commerce; with her record on the sea in peace and war; with the discontent that showed itself in Shay's Rebellion; with her stand in 1812 and in the Civil War, and with her steady development in material prosperity as a great producing and manufacturing State. It will thus be seen that Dr. Hale has at once recognized and seized the salient points in Massachusetts' story. That he has treated these matters well, dressed them in entertaining narrative and pressed them upon his readers with force and vigor, no one who knows and admires the graphic story of "The Man without a Country" or the noble utterances of "In His Name" needs to be assured.

The book is a gracious contribution to American history and to Massachusetts' history. It is a fitting and notable addition to the entertaining series, The Story of the States, in which it takes its place as the eighth volume, and it is one that every son and every lover of the Old Bay State may read with interest and own with pride as a most practical and withal most entertaining and picturesque presentation of the Bay State's story.

"Harry's Career at Yale," as described by John Seymour Wood in Outing for February, proves that either Harry himself, the author, or somebody the author knows right well, had a grand old time when at Alma Mater, Yale.

The continuation in Outing for February of "Saddle and Sentiment," by Wenona Gilman's great story of the American turf, presents one of the most powerful situations of a strangely forceful creation. Miss Gilman has produced something which American literature sees too seldom.

The Transactions of the Worcester County Horticultural Society for 1890-91 are out in the shape of a pamphlet of 125 pages and having considerably more than the usual Secretary's Report and the items incident thereto. Besides the address of the President Hor. Henry L. Parker, there are the ten essays given before the society by as many invited readers. While all the contents of the book are of exceptionally good character, the reader who has regularly perused the report will turn to the Secretary's words to find what he has to say. No matter what the theme, Mr. Lincoln is sure to set it forth in such a manner that, once begun, it is read to the finish without a stop. In fact, there is no stopping place. Every thought is securely dovetailed with that which precedes and follows. There is no describing Secretary's Lincoln's style. You must read it for yourself. As well might Bo-bo try to describe the taste of roast pig to his father as for any critic to seek to tell, in mere words, its charm, but as Bo-bo said to Ho-ti, "Eat, eat eat the burnt pig, father, only taste; O Lord!" so LIGHT is to Worcester people. "Read, read the Secretary's Report and get new notions of the scope of the English Language with, now and then, a Latin word thrown in." The juveniles of Worcester who steal fruit and flowers come in for a thorough scourging and they deserve it all. The deterioration in agricultural fairs is set forth in telling colors while the possibilities of such an organization as our Horticultural Society are dwelt upon. There is no file of Worcester reports of any kind more deserving of praise and reference than that of this society which is about to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary.

A National Family Paper.

The announcements of The Youth's Companion for 1892, which we have received, seem to touch about all healthy tastes. Its fiction embraces folk-lore, serial, sea, adventure and holiday stories. Frank Stockton, Clark Russell, Will Allen Dromgoole, Mary Catherine Lee are a few of the distinguished story writers.

Its general articles cover a wide range. Self Education, Business Success, College Success, Girls Who Think They Can Write, Natural History, Railway Life, Boys and Girls at the World's Fair, Glimpses of Royalty, How To See Great Cities, Practical Advice are some of the lines to be written on by eminent special-ists.

Gladstone, De Lesseps, Vasili Verestchagin, Cyrus W. Field, Andrew Carnegie, Mrs. Henry M. Stanley are among the contributors. The Companion readers thus come into personal touch with the people whose greatness makes our age famous. Its 500,000 subscribers show how it is appreciated. $1.75 a year. Address The Youth's Companion, Boston, Mass.

Uncle Tom's Cabin still retains its phenomenal popularity. Indeed it would seem to be on the eve of the most remarkable epoch in its wonderful career. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., having arranged to bring it out in what they call a Universal Edition (in paper at 25 cents, and cloth at 50), began printing 100,000 copies, but the orders for it have poured in at such a rate that they are obliged to make the first issue 160,000. As at the same time with this edition will appear another in larger type in the regular issue of the Riverside Paper Series, and a new issue of the Popular Edition with some illustrations, the public will obviously have ample opportunity to read or re-read this world famous story.

A prominent feature of Good Housekeeping is the publication of series of articles relating to diverse interests of the household, each article complete in itself, yet combined in the series to secure thoroughness of treatment. The February number gives in this department the following titles, each of which is treated by a writer thoroughly competent to deal with the subject matter: "Many Meals for Many Millions," by Miss Parloa; "The Expert Waitress," by Frances Spalding; "The Household Mending Basket," by Ada Marie Peck; "The Food of the People," "The Household Laundry," "Family Fashions and Fancies," the stories, poetry, selections and compilations of this magazine are always of a high standard, fresh and inviting. Clark W. Bryan & Co., Springfield, Mass.

Shepp's Photographs of the world. From negatives made by James W. Shepp and David B. Shepp. Sold by subscription only. Globe Bible Publishing Company. No. 705 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Penn.

In this collection are 258 photogravures of scenery from all parts of the world. It is the most valuable companion to the study of geography that ever came under our notice. Europe, Asia and Africa, are represented by characteristic objects, making a magnificent book, to whose charms the adult as well as the child yields at once. With this at hand, dry, hard names in geography lose all their terrors and the learner gets an ineffaceable picture. Books of travel have an added zest through these beautiful reproductions. Where parents care to make home attractive, this book will become an indispensable adjunct. Worcester Agent. E. H. Chamberlain, 3 Clarence St.

The Boy Travellers in Northern Europe. Adventures of Two Youths, in a journey through Holland, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, with visits to Heligoland and the Land of the Midnight Sun, by Thomas W. Knox. Illustrated, New York, Harper & Brothers, 1892, $3.00. For sale by Sanford, Sawtelle Company.

Here are more than 500 pages of text and nearly as many pictures, for its seems as though there were an illustration for every page. Profusely illustrated is, none too strong a term to indicate the wealth of pictorial representation that accompanies this beautiful book. The boys and girls of to-day, as well as older folks, have become used to Mr. Knox's "Boy Traveller" series, but no one of the number ever gave more pleasure than this one will and does afford. If, instead of furnishing free text-books to thousands of people who do not need them, the city or town could be induced to place in all school-rooms, where children have learned to read, such books as this, what an advance would be made in teaching them about the earth and its inhabitants. In the gentle guise of companions, going through the countries, described, the writer succeeds in introducing his readers to the people, shows them the habits and appearance of the inhabitants, teaches the history of the lands, and when the book is closed, the reader has gained a more accurate idea of the country and its people, than he could have obtained in any other way, save by actual visit and observation. The sections mentioned in this volume are out of the usual line of travel, but they are none the less interesting for that. The student of to-day has means of study and learning that were not dreamed of in our grandfather's days. If we and our children are not well informed as to this terra firma of ours it will not be the fault of the traveller, writer nor publisher. These have united to make this an age of knowledge. In this line Colonel Knox had performed an invaluable part. America has thousands of boys and girls who rate him far above Mungo Park, Livingstone and Stanley. Maps accompany the books, so that every step of travel is perfectly clear.

February Education is filled brim full of excellent matter. Principal Larkin Dunton discusses on School Discipline. University Extension is treated in a fair manner by President Chas. W. Super. Dr. A. D. Mayo's "The Support of the Secondary and Higher Education by the State" is the best article in the number, for Dr. Mayo brings to his words the experience and observation of many years. He never writes on such themes but to instruct. Happy he who learns. The Duty of Parents to Teachers is an article that every teacher will thank Alice Hamilton Rich for writing. There are few instructors who have not chafed at the indifference, not to say open hostility of those who should bend every energy to uphold the teacher. There are twenty pages of editorial and other miscellaneous matter that no careful reader will omit. Published in Boston, 50 Bromfield, by Frank H. Kasson at $3 a year.

The Report of the Sixth Annual Meeting of The New England Association of Colleges and Preparatory Schools is sent out to members by the Secretary, Ray Greene Huling of New Bedford. It is reprinted from the Academy and contains the addresses and proceedings at the meeting, Oct. 16-17, 1891, in Cambridge, Mass. The contents are, "The Practicability of Abridging the Course Preparatory for College" by Frank A. Hill of Cambridge. "Natural Science as a Requisite for Admission to College" by Prof. S. F. Clarke of Williams College, with "The Outlook on Higher Education" by President G. Stanley Hall of Clark University. To educators the pamphlet is of much interest and value.

The "Educational Review" for February is as usual replete with facts bearing on the problems of the day. President Gilman of Johns Hopkins gives "The Idea of Liberal Education" in a way that prompts one to wish to reproduce the entire article. Arthur M. Comey of Tuft's College, in well arranged tables, proves conclusively, that the colleges of the land are more than holding their own as compared with the growth of population. The utility of such a compilation is never exhausted. Henry S. Pancoast presents some strictures on "College Entrance Requirements in English." This is specially commended to the New England Commission of Colleges. James P. Munroe discusses "Certain Dangerous Tendencies in Education," and LIGHT for one wishes to thank him for his fearless utterances on subjects that many people have grown afraid to mention. He handles, without gloves, the idea that the state stands in loco parentis in all things. The individual should act and should pay also. Free text books are treated as they deserve. The four articles afford ample reason for the existence of the magazine, not to mention the valuable Discussions, Education in Foreign Periodicals, Reviews and Editorials. The latter are particularly lively and vigorous. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York City.

The Chautauquan.

The frontispiece of the February number is W. C. Wilkinson and those who have read his delightful books on the classics will be glad to see his portrait. Two pages give us the faces of eight contributors to the magazine. Dr. J. M. Buckley begins a series of articles on Physical Culture. Articles on German Politics, The Balkan States and Greece, Spain, Cuba and the United States, give us an idea of the doings of some of the governments of the world. English social life in the 18th century at Strawberry Hill is described by E. L. Didier. The C. L. S. C. department is arranged so as to supplement the readings in the books and by additional notes, word studies, questions on the required work and current topics, must be of great help to circles or individual readers. Dr. T. L. Flood, Meadville, Pa.

The publishers of The Century Magazine have issued a pamphlet entitled Cheap Money, containing the articles on Cheap-Money Experiments which have been appearing in "Topics of the Time" of The Century during the past year or more. Single copies cost 10 cents each, postage paid. The pamphlet will be supplied in packages by the hundred, at 5 cents each, for distribution.

In sending out this valuable matter at this nominal price the publishers have done the public a genuine service. This pamphlet would be an excellent campaign document, for no man after reading it, unless demented, could continue his belief that the country wants anything but the "best" money.

Inglis' Home and Art Magazine, published by J. F. Inglis, Lynn, Mass.

With all the notes and good reading this month there is a colored plate showing a scene in a hay field, which no doubt many of the readers of the magazine will copy. Such full directions are given for all the work in the book that any one may be sure of success in her ventures. The price is one of the good features, it being only $1 per year.

Liabylund, from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Mass.

This dainty magazine is full from cover to cover with the pictures and stories that will so delight all its baby readers. In any home where the little ones see this pretty book there will be several hours of quiet at least when little heads will be bent over its pages in deep earnest. Price 50 cents per year.

Of Carlyle's personal appearance and conversation Sir Gavan Duffy gives the following sketch—

"Carlyle was at this time past fifty years of age, had a strong, well-knit frame, a dark, ruddy complexion, piercing blue eyes, close drawn lips, and an air of silent composure and authority. He was commonly dressed in a dark suit, a black stock, and a wide-brimmed hat, sometimes changed for one of soft felt. A close observer would have recognized him as a Scotchman, and probably concluded that he was a Scotchman who had filled some important employment. There was not a shade of discontent or impatience discernible in his countenance; if these feelings arose they were kept in check by a disciplined will.

In a tit-tat-tat he did not declaim but conversed. His talk was a clear rippling stream that flowed on without interruption, except when he acted the scene he was describing, or mimicked the person he was citing. With the play of hands and head he was not a bad mimic, but his countenance and voice, which expressed wrath or authority with singular power, were clumsy instruments for badinage. But his attempts were more enjoyable than skillful acting, he entered so frankly into the farce himself, laughing cordially, and manifestly not unmindful of the contrast his levity presented to his ordinary mood. Though he commonly spoke the ordinary tongue of educated Englishmen, if he was moved, especially if he was moved by indignation or contempt, he was apt to fall into what Mrs. Carlyle calls "very decided Annandale."

He that has little is the less dirty.

treating a Yankee that I never lain eyes on before, and never expect to agin. Day was breakin' by the time I got to the St. Nicholas Hotel, and I pledge you my word I did not know my name. The man asked me the number of my room, and I told him, "Hot music on the half-shell for two!"

Amherst Alumni.

No features in the "all the year round" of our lives are more interesting than the annual gatherings of the resident graduates of the different colleges. Worcester, this year has had assemblages of "Boys" from Yale, Dartmouth and Amherst, and there are alumni enough in the city to afford enthusiastic reunions of Harvard, Williams, Brown and Wesleyan graduates. The Amherst men were out in force, Friday the 5th, at the Bay State. The meeting was early. The banquet was served in Room 3, where the following ate one of Messrs. Douglas's & Brown's best dinners:

Daniel Kent, '75, who presided; Dr. E. Hitchcock, '43, physical instructor at the college; G. Henry Whitcomb, '64, of the board of trustees; Judge W. T. Forbes of Westboro, '71; Rev. A. E. P. Perkins, D. D., '40; Rev. Calvin Stebbins, '62; Rev. W. V. W. Davis, '73; Rev. Francis G. Burgess, '78; Charles T. Haynes, '62; Profs. E. P. Smith, '68, and A. S. Kimball, '66, of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute; Dr. C. A. Peabody, '66; Dr. E. B. Flagg, '61; G. W. Foskett, '78; Frank G. Blair, '80; E. E. Aldrich, '81; O. P. Hunt, '82; A. P. Rugg, '83; Allen Hastings, St. Louis, Mo., '84; George P. Eastman of Millbury, '84; Clarence H. White, '86; George N. Goddard, '87; and G. B. Churchill, '89.

The college representative, in the absence of President Gates, was Prof. Hitchcock, the renowned director of the Gymnasium. Other speakers were G. Henry Whitcomb, Rev. Francis G. Burgess, Judge W. T. Forbes, Rev. W. V. W. Davis, Rev. Calvin Stebbins, Clarence H. White and George B. Churchill.

The officers for next year are: President, Rev. A. E. P. Perkins, D. D., '40; secretary, L. E. Enfield of Westboro, '78; treasurer, Dr. C. A. Peabody, '67; executive committee, the above and Prof. A. S. Kimball of the Worcester Polytechnic Institute, '66.

The Mechanics.

The golden anniversary of the Association, so long expected and so enthusiastically prepared for, was observed in a most successful manner on the evening of the Fifth. With debts all paid, with a magnificent property, with a just feeling that about all there is of Worcester, is owed to the mechanics, there is no wonder that the Mechanics Association is proud. The aged members were present, and their white locks silvered well the brown and black of the younger portion.

Caterer Rebboli served an excellent supper in the west ante-room. At 7.30 President Crane, gave his address in Washburn Hall. It was none too long for the subject for, really, such an account tells much of Worcester's history for fifty years. He was followed with interest from first to last. Seated with Mr. Crane upon the platform were Henry S. Washburn and Mr. Stephen Salisbury. Mr. Washburn was president in 1857. His remarks were especially happy. Mr. E. A.

Goodnow, one of the Society's honorary members, was present having with him as an invited guest, the Rev. Archibald McCullagh, of Plymouth Church. A letter of regret over necessary absence was read from the Hon. Joseph H. Walker, a former president.

Adjourning to the main hall, dancing followed till a late hour. The apprentice members of today will participate in the centennial in 1942. They are even now, beginning to look forward to it.

Mr. Gladstone's Habits.

"Directly after breakfast a selection of his letters is brought to him. The enormous mass of papers of all kinds that arrives each morning takes so much time in merely opening, and contains so large a proportion of rubbish, that the sorting and selecting is done for him by the son or daughter living most at home. Applications for signatures go remorselessly into the waste-paper basket. Autograph and birthday books, manuscripts, novels, poetry, essays on every conceivable subject, schemes for the government of the universe, inventions, medicines, testimonials, are all placed in a box for future return when demanded. About one-tenth only of the postal arrivals are laid before him, and of these he answers on the average one-half. Excepting before breakfast, he does not go out in the morning. At 2 p.m. he comes to luncheon, and at the present time he usually spends the afternoon arranging the books at his new library. To this spot he has already transported nearly 20,000 books, and every volume he puts into its place with his own hand. To him books are almost as sacred as human beings."

The Old Grenadier's Story.

WALTER THURNBURY

(The story is told on a bench outside the Invash's, Paris.)

"I was a day beside the Pyramids, It seems but an hour ago, That Kleber's Foot stood firm in squares, Returning blow for blow. The Mamelukes were tossing Their standards to the sky, When I heard a child's voice say, "My men Teach me the way to die."

There was a little drummer, with his side Tom terribly with a t, But still he feebly beat his drum, As though the sound were not And when the Mamelukes' wild hor-e burst with a scream and cry, He said, "O men of the Forty Third, Teach me the way to die."

"My mother has got other sons, With stoutest hearts than mine, But none more ready blood for France To pour out free as wine. Yet still life's sweet, the brave lad moaned, "To fair to this earth and sky, Theo, comrades of the Forty Third, Teach me the way to die."

I saw Salenche, of the granite heap, Wiping his burning eyes It was by far more pitiful Than mere loud sobbs and cries. One bit his cartridge till his lip Grew black as winter sky, But still the boy moaned, "Forty third, Teach me the way to die."

Oh, never saw I sight like that ! The sergeant flung down flag, Even the fiercest bound his brow With a wet and bloody rag. Then looked at locks, and fixed their steel, But never made reply, 'till he sobbed out once again, "Teach me the way to die."

Then, with a shout that flew to God, They strode into the fray ; I saw their red plumes join and wave, But slowly melt away. The last who went—a wounded man—Hade the poor boy good-bye, And said, "We men of the Forty-third, Teach you the way to die."

I never saw so sad a look At the poor youngster cast, When the hot smoke of cannon In cloud and whirlwind passed. Earth shook, and heaven answered I watched his eagle eye, As he faintly moaned, "The Forty-third, Teach me the way to die."

Theo, with a musket for a crutch, He limped into the fight, I, with a bullet in my hip, Had neither strength nor might But, proudly beating on his drum, A fever in his eye, I heard him moan, "The Forty-third Taught me the way to die."

They found him on the morrow, Stretched on a heap of dead, His hand was in the grenadier's Who at his bidding led. They hung a medal round his neck, And closed his dauntless eye. In the stone they cry out, "The Forty-third Taught him the way to die."

"Tis forty years from then till now— The grave gaze at my feet— Yet when I think of such a boy, I feel my old heart beat. And from my sleep I sometimes wake, Hearing a feeble cry, And at a voice that say, "Now, Forty-third, Teach me the way to die."

—Argonaut.

Dix Street and its School-house.

Some men and neighborhoods have greatness and notoriety thrust upon them and that is just the case with this, one of the most quiet portions of Worcester. The prevalence, during the last few months of cases of diphtheria in this section has turned the eyes and thoughts of our citizens in this direction as never before. For obvious reasons, that part of Worcester which lies west of Harvard Street, north of Bowdoin and as far out as the Agricultural Grounds comes into the classification. The school house on Dix Street is the largest and the most important edifice in the neighborhood. Thousands of children, first and last, have been gathered there for instruction. As is natural in English speaking lands, the school house dominates and, in this case, has given a name to the section.

Since the excitement concerning the disease has arisen, we have heard all sorts of stories as to the peculiar character of the soil, but the soil is not sufficiently variant from other portions of Worcester to account for the present situation. As a rule, there is, probably, as good a health average from the Dix Street vicinity as from any other equal area in Worcester. Just at present there is an epidemic and reasons are sought.

The whole section was pasture ground and meadow land in summer and coasting slopes in winter, within the memory of men and women who are, by no means, the oldest in our city. It is not so long since the boys played ball where Harvard Street is and when Elm Street terminated where West Street is, then Governor Lincoln's meadow. Then came Chestnut Street, terminating as it does now, and its real continuation, Harvard, came much later. Sudbury Street was only a lane for cattle leading back to the pastures from the Flagg barns, near Main Street. It is only a trifle better than a lane now, but its crookedness, like that of some of Boston thoroughfares, is accounted for through its bovine origin. Between the Lincoln possessions on the south and those of Mr. Salisbury on the north, much of the land was owned by the late Dr. John Green. In time, came the streets that we now know, one of them, Dix, named for Dr. Elijah Dix of Revolutionary memory and who was, in those days an owner in this part of Worcester.

It was not till 1867 that a school house was demanded in these parts and when the foundations were laid in the Summer of that year, they were actually lonesome, having a very scattering constituency. In March, 1868, the new building was ready for occupancy, it having cost $32,564.22 a very moderate outlay when compared with later structures, especially considering the amount of land purchased the size of the building and the then war prices of labor and building material. Our Dix Street house is just two months older than that on Lamartine Street, which it resembles, though its cost is somewhat greater. Even then the Superintendent of Schools complained of the want of architectural effect in these structures. The Dix Street house was made to accommodate 375 pupils.

The first principal of this school was Samuel E. Fitz beginning in May, 1868, and he continued to hold this position till 1871 when he was transferred to Woodland Street. It should be stated that in this edifice was located the Teachers' Training School which preceded our present State Normal School.

Principal Fitz's successor was Addison A. Hunt, so long at the head of the Sycamore Street School and whose recent decease in Barre has called up many memories of long ago. He remained to the end of the school year of 1874 when Joseph W. Fairbanks came to the place from Connecticut, though he was a native of Worcester County and a graduate of Amherst. He continued in the school only one year, going thence to the principalship of the High School. Then came for a single year Mr. George R. Chase, now living in Medfield. He bore away with him, as his wife, one of his teachers.

In 1876, Mr. Wm. H. Bartlett came hither from Weymouth, and his stay in the school was prolonged till the completion of the new Chandler Street edifice in 1885 when he was transferred to that post and the present principal, James Jenkins, took his place, and has held it to date.

As at first constructed, the necessary closets for the school were wholly disconnected from the main building, but in 1887 a large outlay of something like $7,500 was made to put in a new system of heating, ventilating and "other repairs." Instead of putting in a system of water closets such as people generally use, where it is possible, a plan was substituted whereby heat and a drying current of air were to effectually do away with all possible odors and to thoroughly ventilate the building. Like many other plans, it may work very well while it does work, but when it takes a rest, what then? Of course, there is a possibility of a set back and just that back draft happens when the heat is low and it is against this possible infliction of closet filth laden air that the patrons of this school protest. With an abundance of water at our command, as yet, the citizens of this part of Worcester have a right to ask for what they get in their own homes. The question of diphtheria is not in this for the moment. It is purely one of sanitation, and if water cannot be had, let us return to the out of doors privy with covered ways leading thereto. Nor is this an unreasonable request. The people of the Dix Street School vicinity ask for their children the same safety that was accorded, after much protesting, to the Belmont Street pupils. At present the building and its neighborhood are under a cloud.

Raising Ned.

"The writer of the story about 'Raising Ned,' in last week's Gazette, wishes to correct a slip of the pen which made the hero of the story the Rev. Chandler Robbins, when it should have been his brother, the Rev. Samuel Robbins. There is another story of Mr. Robbins current. He had officiated several times at funerals in a certain family, but at a wedding in the same family an Episcopal clergyman was requested to read the service. Some one mentioned the wedding to Mr. Robbins, adding, "I suppose you officiated, of course?" "Oh, no," said the minister dryly, "I'm reserved for funerals!"—Boston Gazette.

A Big Story.

A century plant in the garden of the Earl of Rene, England, blossomed a few weeks ago. The flower spike was twenty-three feet high. As usual with this species of aloe, as soon as the flowers faded the entire plant died, young offshoots taking their place.

Worcester and Oakdale.

The Committee on Education from the Legislature visited Worcester and Oakdale last Monday. Leaving Boston at 9 a.m., the committee reached Worcester at 10 a.m., where it was met by Col. E. B. Stoddard of the State Board and under his escort the gentlemen proceeded at once to Normal Hill. The visitors, in the care of Messenger Brown of Fall River, included Senators Stevens, Chairman, of Worcester County and Nutter of Plymouth. The Representatives were Messrs. Gardner of Nantucket, Roe of Worcester, Howard of West Bridgewater and Bourne of Savoy. Accompanying them was Secretary John W. Dickinson of the State Board of Education. The visit to the Normal School was confined to inspecting the new principal's residence and the dormitory. As these have been constructed largely under Colonel Stoddard's direction he was able to set forth very nicely their many admirable points. A small appropriation is needed to complete the dormitory and to furnish it. Obviously, the committee were very favorably impressed by all that they saw. Refreshments were served at 11 o'clock in Principal Russell's dining room.

Again taking takes, the gentlemen proceeded to Lincoln Square Station where Messrs. Rice, Taft and Stone, County Commissioners, were met and, at 11:30 cars were taken for Oakdale. In addition to the gentlemen, already named, there went Messrs. Armstrong of Boston, Hammond and Major Harlow of Worcester. At Oakdale, Superintendent Johnson of the Truant School was in waiting and here another member of the committee, Mr. Parkhurst of Clinton, appeared. A large barge was ready and soon the eighteen visitors were transported to the new and elegant structure provided for Worcester County boys. Unfortunately the dense haze prevented a sight of the glorious prospect that the hill usually affords. Indoors, however, the excellent provisions for making bad boys good became apparent. All over the large and commodious edifice the visitors went and, finally, sat down to an excellent repast, served in the large dining room. Following this, there were remarks by Secretary Dickinson, Col. Stoddard and Messrs. Stevens and Roe. Commissioner Rice was anxious that the visitors should remain till 4 o'clock but previous arrangements seemed to demand their going at 1:44 p.m., so speech making ended then. Pending the decision as to the removal of the boys from our City Farm, the Truant School is not over crowded. In fact, there is now only one boy there and he is from Worcester. There was only one opinion expressed by each and every visitor and that was of unqualified approval of the building, and the provisions that the Commissioners and Superintendent have made for the good of erring boyhood. It seems as though a long step were being taken in advance. The committee returned to Boston from Worcester at 2:20 p.m.

About Folks.

Miss Mary Connell returns from the employ of Dunton & Winter, Millbury, to become the book-keeper for C. Baker & Co. One of Mr. Becker's pupils, Miss Doscher, from Jamesville, takes the vacated place.

Worcester looked lovingly at the two planets, Venus and Jupiter as they neared each other, last Friday night. "So near and yet so far." Apparently without speaking distance, yet millions of miles away from each other. If modest, they must have grown tired of being looked at. Yet who could gaze at the spectacle without feelings of awe and veneration. Truly, "the undevout astronomer is mad."

Dr. D. O. Mears is to conduct a union class of Bible students at the Y. M. C. A. building. His first class was the 5th inst.

At a recent social at Coral Street Church, the entertainment consisted of singing by Miss Mabel Lawton, piano music by Misses Chloë Batchelder, Amy Fuller,—Emerson, readings by Mrs. H. C. Graton and remarks by the pastor, Dr. J. O. Knowles.

Mr. Thomas J. Hastings has again been elected president of the Single Tax League. The other officers are: Vice-president, Rev. John Gregson; treasurer, H. L. Dunnell; financial secretary, J. H. Cooney; recording secretary, E. K. Paige; executive committee, Thomas J. Hastings, Dr. Eugene Ellinwood, Thomas Roach, E. K. Paige, John H. Cooney.

Those who remember the immense audience which gathered to hear Major McKimley on the tariff will hope that the Governor will accept the invitation to be present at the October Epworth League Convention in this city.

Miss Maud Sherwood, who has been visiting for the past six weeks at the home of her friend, Miss Mary A. Greene, on May Street, has returned to her home in Englewood, New Jersey.

The love of a miser for his gold is secret, mean, selfish and unholly. The love of a collector of paintings or works of art, his treasures, is exactly reverse; it is broad, reverential, sympathetic and expansive. He sincerely desires to share with others the enjoyment of his pictures. And this is perhaps the one way in which 'tis hard to tell who receives the most pleasure from wealth, the owner or his friends.—Art Words.

Mrs. Langtry, the "Jersey Lily," is said to own the largest collection of fans in the world. If all that is said about her be true, she needs them.

Hiram Powers, the sculptor, whose famous "Greek Slave" is one of the attractions of the Corcoran Art Gallery, has left a son worthy to wear the father's mantle; he is the director of the Denver Art School.

Messrs. E. D. and Ernest L. Thayer, father and son, have gone to California, via Hot Springs.

A. R. Barrett of this city has been appointed superintendent of motive power B. & M. R. R., in place of Mr. Smith, deceased.

Mrs. A. J. Harrington, late of Pilgrim choir, will sing next year in the Central Church.

Robert S. Baldwin has reached home from his European trip.

Many people must remember with pleasure Dr. Gottfried Lundberg, who was quite a lion in local society, some years since, especially in musical circles. A highly educated Swede with a remarkable tenor voice, his popularity was not, at all, strange. He is now reported dangerously ill at Mott Haven, New York.

Sergeant Wm. Hickey, of Worcester Police Force, was laid up for a while last week. He was soon out again, however.

The Continentals will keep open house Monday, Feb. 22, from 7 to 10 p.m.

Prof. Walter S. Perry, so long the efficient teacher of drawing in our public schools, but now of the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, was in the city last week.

Fitchburg receives Iver Johnson and his workmen with open arms. Thursday the 4th, inst., the Y. M. C. A. gave them a big reception. Apparently these Fitchburgers know a good thing when they see it. "May all concerned live long and prosper."

E. B. Clapp is a Raymond excursionist to Washington and Old Point Comfort.

E. M. Low has resigned the presidency of the Low & Barber Envelope Manufacturing Company. He still retains his stock however.

Mr. A. W. Fdson of the State Board of Education spoke at Barre last Thursday night.

Senator Hoar and Representative Rice were recently elected vice presidents of the Massachusetts Society in Boston.

Dr. D. O. Mears of Piedmont Church preached last Wednesday night in Newington, Conn., at the installation of Rev. Herbert Macy, once in our local Y. M. C. A.

Principal James Jenkins of the Dix Street School is the principal pro tem of the new Downing Street School. It is to be hoped that his stay there will be short, for Dix Street needs him.

Alderman Chas. H. Pinkham has had to yield to illness for a few days.

Rev. Alonzo Sanderson, the indefatigable pastor of Laurel Street M. E. Church has had a touch of the grip.

Roger T. Upham and George C. Whitney of Worcester spoke at the meeting of the Baptist Social Union last Monday.

In Becker's Business College, Miss Ella E. Roche has won a silver medal in a penmanship contest.

Mr. H. Harvey B. Wilder, Register of Deeds, has, recently, entertained a distinguished guest in the person of Carlton A. Rice, of Peterboro, New York. He had not seen this city for fifty years. The changes that he noted were many. He was the life long friend of Garrett Smith, the noted philanthropist

Mr. R. C. Taylor, who recently purchased the Hotel Warwick in Springfield, proposes to close the hotel and turn the building into an office block.

The members of the Pilgrim Y. P. S. C. E. are actively preparing for the "Tennis Drill," an interesting novelty by Margaret Fezandie, consisting of military marches, tennis ball and racquet exercises in tennis courts, animated wind mills, double arch formations, etc. The author designs this attraction to occupy the room of the worn out fan drills, dumb drills, etc., considering it quite as effective and much more graceful. It will be executed by sixteen young ladies in costume to the music of an inspiring march, a waltz and a La Varsovinne. It will be presented for the first time in this city, Tuesday evening, Feb. 16th, in Pilgrim Hall.

People who use arsenical preparations for their complexion, do so at the risk of their lives. Ayer's Sarsaparilla is guaranteed free from any injurious drug, and is, therefore, the safest as well as the most powerful blood medicine in the world.

Invitations have been sent out for a leap year dance which will be held in Colonial Hall, on the evening of February 29. The patrons are Col. W. S. B. Hopkins, Col. A. G. Bullock, Charles H. Davis and Charles H. Doe. Miss Elizabeth Hopkins will lead the cotillon.

Rev. J. R. Pendell of Western New York is helping the Rev. Alonzo Sanderson in extra meetings at Leicester, Lake View and the West Side.

The Natural History Society is keeping up its interest and excellent work at its rooms, corner of Harvard and State Streets.

At the weekly meeting of the Worcester County Horticultural Society in Horticultural Hall next Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock, J. Chauncey Lyford, principal of the Winslow Street grammar school will read a paper on "The Flora of Worcester County." The usual discussion will follow.

The Worcester Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, will discuss, at its meeting in Grange Hall next Tuesday evening, the question "Bringing up the farm." George L. Clemence, master of the Southbridge Grange, will open the discussion with a paper on the subject. There will also be an entertainment including readings by Mrs. D. L. Fiske of Grafton and a violin solo by W. I. Allen. February 23d, the Grange will have a leap year party.

M. D. Gilman has had enough of sweets and so disposes of his candy business to F. E. Young of Boston.

The Swelles of the city are looking forward with interest to a concert to be held in Horticultural hall in March. Sorlin & Johnson orchestra will have charge, aided by the Swedish quartet. Mrs. H. W. Eklund is the soprano.

About Folks.

The third of the series of smoke talks on whist at the Commonwealth Club, will be held next Wednesday evening.

Miss Louisa S. Cheever, youngest daughter of the Rev. Henry T. Cheever, is teaching in the Brierly School, New York City. Her special work is in Latin and Greek. Miss Cheever was graduated in '86 at the High School and in '90 from Smith College.

A recital was given by the pupils of the School of English Speech in the school hall, Monday evening. The pupils taking part were Miss Lulu Isaacs, Miss Nellie York, Miss Nellie Delaney, Miss Sadie Parsons, Miss Gerry, Miss Eva Townsend, Miss Mc Tieran, Miss Mabelle King, Miss Bessie Lawrence, Miss Sybil Flagg and Miss Ella Johnson. Also Miss Inez Buss sang two selections.

For the restoration of faded and gray hair to its original color and freshness, Ayer's Hair Vigor remains unrivaled. This is the most popular and valuable toilet preparation in the world; all who use it are perfectly satisfied that it is the best.

Athletics.

Worcester hopes to get the meeting of the Intercollegiate Association in this city. The matter is to be decided in Boston to-day.

It Didn't Pay!

The Luray Inn, Luray, Va., which was recently destroyed by fire, will not be rebuilt. It is strange what accidents befall non-paying buildings.

President Hayes.

The bare announcement that this distinguished American will be present at the next Lake View Assembly should be sufficient to crowd the grounds to their utmost.

Worcester and Boston.

Miss Christine Rice, of Worcester, has taken apartments at the Vendome for February and March.

Mrs. Lincoln, of Worcester, has taken apartments at the Huntington for the season.

Arundel Plates.

The valuable plates, 175 in number, belonging to the Free Public Library, will be exhibited to the public in the Art rooms, beginning today, Saturday. An excellent opportunity to see these works, many of them representing some of the best of the Italian masters.

City Guards.

The City Guards are arranging to give a three nights' production of "Held by the Enemy" at the Worcester Theater on the nights of April 11, 12 and 13. The piece is to be produced by professionals, the company taking no part except perhaps as soldiers.

Lincoln's Birthday.

A general order from the headquarters of the commander-in-chief, Sons of Veterans, U. S. A., has been issued, calling all camps to observe Feb. 12 with appropriate ceremonies, it being the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln and "Union Defenders' Day."

Alexandria.

The old tavern called the Braddock House, in which Gen. Braddock was quartered before setting out on his ill fated expedition to Fort Duquesne, against Major George Washington's advice, still stands in Alexandria, Va., though in a state of decay. The old Marshall House, in which Col. Ellsworth was killed early in the Rebellion, still stands, but is no longer used as a hotel.

A Medallion.

One of the finest pieces of work from the hand of Worcester's local artist, Mr. Andrew O'Connor, is his medallion of Mrs. Helen C. Knowles which was placed Saturday last, in the City Hospital, of which Mrs. Knowles had been a very generous benefactor. This piece of work is a deserved tribute to one of the City's honored dead and an excellent instance of what home talent is capable of.

The Historian Corrected.

In his very interesting remarks at the Mechaos Association semi-centennial, Mr. Henry S. Washburn said he had often heard the bell in the cupola of the first station. It appears that there was no cupola on the first station and that the bell was hung on a tree. The building that was taken away in the "Seventies" had a cupola and, very likely, Mr. Washburn got the two confounded. It is said that a part of the old first station is now the paint store of Geo. L. Clark, on Norwich Street.

For Writers.

Writers who use fountain or stylographic pens are occasionally troubled by the slæath's becoming so loose that it will not stay on the pen. It is, however, very easy to remedy the trouble. Hold the open end of the sheath for a few seconds near a gas light or any other warmth-giving source, then, when warm, roll between the thumb and fingers until the diameter is so diminished that it fits the pen closely. Care should be taken not to get the sheath too near the light, as the rubber will melt easily, and to not overdo it and make the sheath too small for the pen.

An Egyptian Curiosity.

In July, 1881, there were discovered in the ancient city of Thebes, the mummies of Egypt's mightiest Pharaoh's, among them that of Ramese the Great. There were also found seals, coins, statuettes, preserved food, and a few rolls of papyrus, some of the latter being of great value, curiously bound together, and, notwithstanding the mould and mildew of ages upon them, as easily read as if written yesterday. A queer little book entitled, "A Night with Ramese II.," has been executed so cleverly, that the oxidized seal, suggestion of mould, antique coloring, and partially decayed and ragged edged papyrus carry at once to the mind the possession of a veritable relic from the dawn of civilization. Mailed to any address on receipt of 6 cents in stamps, by J. C. Ayer Co., Lowell, Mass.

His Hair.

"Paderewski's hair can never be done justice to by picture or pen, says a correspondent. It is long and as soft as silk and never a comb goes through it. When he awakes from sleep (and he awakes seldom, for he seldom or never sleeps) he runs his hands three or four times through the mass of indescribable hue and lo! the colors scintillate brightly and that part of his toilet is perfected. His favorite flower is the violet and he greatly admires the American roses. Among his favorite dishes is omelette with fresh mushrooms and lobster, but he does not care for olives. When he is going to play in the afternoon, he takes some tea and lemon in the morning and when he is to play in the evening he likes an egg. This simple repast is his main diet, with the exception of a dainty little collation after the concert. It is twenty years since he left his native town in Poland. Since then he has lived most of the time in Paris. He has not consented to any photographs being taken in this country, and all those that are seen here have been imported. He dreads being lionized, but submits to it with very good grace, and, far from being eccentric, he is extremely natural and pleasing. He practices all hours of the day and night. Dining and sleeping are secondary considerations. He is music—all music—and one having seen him can readily understand the mainspring of that singing touch of his: he has a soul!"—Sunday Courier.

Historic Scrap.

Anent the recent formation of a new business house, under the name of Barnard, Sumner & Co., it is not amiss to recite the following account of the edifice in which the firm is domiciled. "Formerly known as the Union Building it was built in 1854, unitedly by Chamberlain, Barnard & Co. C. W. Freeland, and L. D. Goddard & Co., and was occupied by the owners for business purposes for several years. Worcester Illustrated, 1881. It is owned now by Lewis Barnard, and two-thirds of the building is occupied by the extensive Dry Goods and Carpet Establishment of Barnard, Sumner & Company. A passenger elevator connects the different stories. As a business house it stands deservedly high, and is the largest of the kind in Massachusetts, outside of Boston. On pleasant days their store is thronged with customers from all parts of the county. On the site of the Union Building was originally a wooden dwelling, built by Stephen Goddard about 1806, and occupied by him until 1810, when he sold the property to Deacon James Wilson. Deacon Wilson was Postmaster from 1801 to 1833, and the post-office was located in a small building adjoining his house on the south side. Previous to the erection of the Union Building the Wilson residence was removed to the north side of Mechanic Street, where it has been known for several years as the Farmers' Hotel. The old post-office building was moved to the corner of Madison and Portland Streets."

Mendicant: "Please help a poor blind man!" Kind old lady: "Blind? Why, bless me, there's a dime for you." Mendicant: "I thank ye heartily ma'am. I knowed the minit I see you comin' you was a kind hearted old woman."

The Green Bequest.

James Green, Esq., nephew of the testator and since 1867, trustee of a certain fund, left by the late Dr. John Green has, during the last week, made over to the city, for Library purposes, in accordance with the terms of the will thirty shares of Central Bank stock. The income thereof, after the fund has reached $20, 000, will be devoted to defraying in part the salary of the librarian.

The students in the north and south wings and cottage at the Worcester Academy gave a reception last Saturday evening to the students in the main building and to the young ladies of the Home School and Miss Williams' School. The reception was held in the chapel, which was very tastily decorated for the occasion. After a social good time there was a musical program by the members of the Accademy. To close the evening's pleasures a collation was served.

A BILLION AND A HALF.

The above is estimated to be the amount due to heirs of unclaimed estates in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France and Germany. The heirs are supposed to be chiefly in the United States. Descendants of people who crossed the ocean years ago. You who read this are earnestly requested to correspond with the undersigned, if your people came from across the sea. Remember that a letter to this country requires a five cent stamp. Be sure to write your name and address plainly. Also send 25 cents to pay for postage and correspondence. We charge nothing for investigating.—WILLIAM LORD MOORE, 5, Ingersoll Road, Shepherd's Bush, London, England.

Good to Eat.

"We may live without love—that is passion but pluing. But where is the man who can live without dining."

Date Jam—Take two pounds of dates, removing the stones, and put over the fire with two cupsful of water; add one pound of sugar, a grated nutmeg, and a small piece of butter. Cook and stir until thick, and place in deep glasses, covering with buttered paper.

Custard—One-half cup rich milk, yolk of one egg, three teaspoons sugar. Heat until it thickens, and put between the cakes as soon as baked. Then use the white of the egg for soft frosting, flavored with lemon or vanilla. Sometimes I put in the oven until the frosting is delicately browned, and then place drops of jelly in any fanciful design over it.

Ann's Cookies—Two cups sugar, one cup butter, two eggs, four tablespoons sour milk, or one-half cup sweet milk, two teaspoons dried caraway-seeds, season with nutmeg. Make as soft as they will roll out, sprinkle with sugar on top when they are done. If sweet milk is used, two teaspoons cream of tartar and one of soda are needed; if sour milk, one teaspoon soda, only. These cookies are a little hard to make, but when just right are the best we ever ate anywhere.

KLARA KOOKE.

Cream Pie—One pint milk, one egg, two tablespoons cornstarch, one-half cup sugar, a little salt, flavor with lemon, vanilla, orange or bitter almond. Stir the yolk of the egg, flour and sugar together and add to the milk when it is near boiling. Bake the crust and pour the cream into it. Beat the white of the egg to stiff froth, put it on the top of the pie and set into the oven to brown very delicately.

The greatest glutton of antiquity was Albinus the Roman, who at one breakfast ate 500 figs, 100 peaches, ten melons, 100 small birds and 400 oysters.

Snaw Balls—Cook rice the usual way, taking care to have it very white and well done; season with a little cream, butter, and salt, keeping it, however, thick and dry as possible. Cool some tea-cups, all of the same size, leaving them damp inside. Pour the rice in them and allow it to cool. Turn it out then, on a fruit dish or meat dish, heaping on the top of each mould a teaspoonful of sparkling jelly. Serve with rich cream, or use sauce of sugar and butter.

Suet Fruit Pudding—One cup each of molasses, sweet milk, suet (chopped fine) raisins, one-half cup each of chopped figs and currants, two and one-half cups of flour with which sift one-half teaspoonful saleratus. Mix well, spice and salt to taste. Steam two hours. Serve hot, with whipped cream flavored with lemon or rose.

Potato Salad—Small potatoes not suitable to cook with larger ones should be laid aside and used for salads. Boil them and while warm peel and slice thin; chop some parsley, an onion, and add to the sliced potatoes; sprinkle with salt and pepper, and pour over two or three dessertspoonsful of oil, or melted butter can be used, and moisten the whole with vinegar. Sliced beet and cucumber can be added to the salad, but it must be done before the oil and vinegar are mixed with the potatoes.

REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC AUCTION.

By virtue of a power of sale contained in a deed of mortgage by Philip J. Murphy, of Worcester, to the Home Co-operative Bank, a Corporation duly established in Worcester in the County of Worcester, and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, dated November 15, 1889, and recorded with Worcester District Registry of Deeds, Book 1312 Page 296, and for a breach of the conditions in said deed contained, will be sold at public auction on the premises, on Tuesday, February 25, 1892, at three o'clock, in the afternoon, the prty conveyed by said deed of mortgage as follows:

"A parcel of land and the buildings on the same, in the said Worcester, and bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a stone post set at the corner of land now or late of W. B. Gage, on the westerly side of Orient Street, and lying northerly from Clemece Street, so called; Thence southerly, on Orient Street sixty (60) feet; Thence westerly, by Lot 25, ninety (90) feet and six (6) inches to a stake, on Lot 24, Thence northerly, sixty (60) feet, to W. B. Gage's land; Thence easterly, ninety (90) feet, to the place of beginning. Containing about 500 square feet." This land will be sold subject to any unpaid taxes, liens or assessments of whatever sort. Fifty dollars in money must be paid down at the time and place of sale, and the rest of the purchase money provided on delivery of the deed within ten (10) days.

Fashions.

The wearing of flowers has never been more fashionable than it is during the present season. Immense corsage bouquets worn at the waist and wreaths draped about the neck are considered good form for evening receptions. It is predicted that the wearing of flowers with street costumes will also be considered allowable, this pretty fashion having fallen into disfavor during the last few years.

There is a great preponderance of divers shades of brown in this season's materials,—tan, russet, coffee, almond, chocolate, bronze, terra-cotta, maroon, copper, mordore, and tabac all being greatly used, as are also a series of browns with a dash of crimson, such as boire de rose girofle. Light and dull shades of green are in favor for smarter gowns, while maize and various shades of yellow are very popular.—Housekeeper's Weekly.

In the matter of evening coiffure there are three distinct styles—one for the debutante, another for the young married lady, and the third for the matron. The first coils her tresses low and loose in the nape of her slender neck, and waves her bangs lightly over her forehead; the second braids her hair in the popular form of the figure eight, and holds it in position with unique tortoise-shell or gold pins; and the last follows the Josephine coiffure, which is a coil wound high on the crown over which stray lightly curled locks. —Table Talk.

Henrietta cloth continues to be chosen for the deepest mourning; it wears so well, and can be gotten in such a perfect black, that it has ousted every other material. It is usually trimmed with crape, for which it affords a good background. Next to Henrietta cloth, the chosen material for street wear is dead-black camel's hair; then, of course, there is the large array of plain wool suitings, such as cashmere, broadcloth, tamise and the many black stuffs that have special names given to them by the manufacturers, but are all called suitings. Heavily-corded materials are not mourning; and she who chooses a ribbed fabric, and trims it with crape, simply announces her ignorance of the proper combinations. The very materials themselves show that they are not in harmony.

Neither velvet nor plush are mourning.

A white handkerchief without a border is counted in rather better taste than those having the black outline; but when a border is used it should not be over half an inch wide, and no embroidery is allowable on the linen square.

The gloves should be black undressed kid ones, the glacé kid not harmonizing with crape.

Buttons should be of the simplest, the dull black silk ones, flat, being given the preference. Where a garment can be closed without the buttons being visible it is deemed most desirable.

No jewelry should be worn, even that of jet being counted rather bad form. A widow continues to wear her wedding ring, but this is the only glint of gold about her.

The mourning fur is really the black Persian lamb, but custom seems to have permitted the use of black bear and black fox, and of seal that is dyed very black.—Ladies' Home Journal.

"Knowledge for its own pure sake. God for His own sake. Truth for the sake of truth. This was the reason for which, in earliest days, men read the aspect of the heavens."—F. W. Robertson.

Samuel Colgate has presented to Colgate University a collection of 32,000 pamphlets, documents and books relating to the history of the Baptist Church.

The law students in Michigan University, 600 in number, are in rebellion because the faculty forbade the presence of one who was taking shorthand reports of the lectures and distributing copies among his classmates, who are required to take their own notes.

Concerning the foregoing or a similar habit in the East, Dean Bennett of the Boston University Law School has the following:

"The practice, then, of taking notes in the way named is unwise for the student who takes them. It is harmful to the student who uses them instead of making his own. It is unfair treatment of the lecturer, and an injury for which he has a remedy at law. Such practices may exist in leading institutions of learning in the East, but it may be doubted whether they exist with the knowledge and approval of the lecturers."

It is said that President Low, of Columbia College, has already received subscriptions amounting to $315,000 for the removal of the college to the proposed site at Bloomingdale. Three separate pledges of $100,000 have been received, and there is a man who promises to give $5,000 for every $100,000 subscribed. These gifts were made known last week, and it is confidently expected that the necessary sum will be raised in a short time. About a million and a quarter will be needed before the college can take the important step. These gifts are noteworthy as the largest amounts that have ever been made to Columbia College.

Dedham, Feb. 3.—The will of Mrs. Sarah W. Glover of Boston was filed this noon for probate. She left an estate valued at 1,000,000, and bequeaths all the rest and residue, after certain private bequests, for the erection, equipment and care of a substantial building to be known as the White gymnasium, for the use and benefit of students of both sexes at Thayer Academy, Braintree. The surplus left after the bequest is fulfilled is left for the establishment of a permanent fund for the care and support of a laboratory to be known as Glover Laboratory at said academy.

The Boston school teachers are after President Eliot for his strictures on American schools. The following is from the Advertiser of Thursday, Feb. 4.

"President Eliot of Harvard may not be aware that the schoolmasters of the state are rather laughing at him for his recent speech on grammar school reform.

"The Schoolmasters' Club at their regular meeting Tuesday night discussed briefly his address at Winchester last Friday, when he directed much of his talk against the methods pursued in the Boston public schools. The masters of the schools in this city propose to take this matter up and show how far Mr. Eliot is away from the truth of the matter, and this they will do later on when they have fully perfected their plans and arranged the material. Meanwhile the Advertiser proposes to throw a little light on the same topic by showing the work of the typical grammar school of the city."

The paper proceeds to describe a visit to the Prince School and claims to find the President "way off" and that the school is fully up to any reasonable standard.

Already college boys are wondering what effect on college life and college athletics the removal of Columbia College to Morning-side Park will have. If the only good ground out of the removal is to boom athletics and to give the young men a taste of dormitory life, the college had better stay where it is.

Of the twenty-eight pupils admitted to the Normal School at the recent examinations, eighteen, all girls, were from this city. Very few boys undertake the course here. It is not so at Westfield, Salem and Bridgewater.

Miss Teresa Brosnahan is rapidly recovering from a very severe attack of that disease which has had such a "grip" on humanity this Winter.

Miss Nellie Mack is visiting friends in Providence.

Mart Howard leaves the store after several years service, to go with Mark Cosgrove in the shoe business on Front Street.

E. F. Blake leaves the first of March to accept a position in Bridgeport, Conn., his former home.

Miss Flossie Cushing has returned from a week's visit to Boston.

Billy Latz writes from his new home, Minneapolis, Minn., that he is getting along finely.

S. K. Akamatsu, the genial Japanese who has had charge of the Japanese department for the past six months, has left for Atlantic City, N. J., where in connection with another gentleman, he will conduct a store devoted to Japanese ware.

Brown.

On Tuesday evening occurred the annual Winter concert of the musical organizations. The brass band, Symphony Society, mandolin club, glee and banjo clubs and their quartettes all did excellent work and gave substantial evidence of their ability. The band was especially worthy of mention as it has come up from a mere name to a creditable organization. Its numbers were exceedingly well rendered and appreciated by the large audience which filled Sayles' Memorial. The concert was a success in every way. The proceeds are to be used in fitting up the music room in the Lyman gymnasium. The following are the leaders of the several organizations: E. B. Munger, '92, Symphony Society; E. N. Corliss, '95, banjo club; B. S. Webb, '92, glee club; G. N. Norton, '92, mandolin club; A. B. Johnson, '92, brass band.

A comic opera has been written by Langdon, '92, which is to be presented about the middle of the Spring term. Rehearsals are to be given within a week.

The third lecture by Prof. Smith on the Njal Saga was delivered in Manning Hall, Monday night.

Pres. Andrews will address the members of the Drexel Institute on Washington's birth day and also be present at the Philadelphia Brown University Club's dinner on the following day.

At a recent faculty meeting it was voted that attendance upon recitations for the Seniors be voluntary for the remainder of the year. So far the plan has worked very successfully. No marks are used and the standing is determined by frequent written exercises.

The engagement is announced of C. E. Ide, '93, and Miss Edith White of Providence.

Today Prof. Bailey begins a course of lectures on "Botany" which will be open to all in any way interested.

F. W. Taft, '94, recently gave a small supper to a very select circle of friends. The occasion was the 21st birthday of the host. "SMILAX."

Mt. Holyoke.

When faculty and students alike pronounce an entertainment "a complete success," '92 may well feel proud of itself. Nothing like a Circulating Library has been given at the college before. When the doors were opened the Seniors, each dressed to represent the title of some book, and conspicuously numbered, stood with their backs towards the spectators. The public was presented with library cards, and upon drawing the works began to guess their names. The "works" circulated freely. Here a group of Freshmen looked in despair—as well they might—upon Locke's "S. A. upon the Human Understanding" or the "Descent of Man," but their little faces brightened as "Mother Goose" hobbled up to them. Miss Berry's Representation of "Views Afoot," and Miss Von Schrader's "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," created much laughter, as did also "Fisher's Outlines." "I've an hoe" was one of the many bright ideas. "Old Fashioned Girl" and "From Jest to Earnest" acted their parts very well. "Vanity Fair" with her countless mirrors, "Red Gauntlet," "Over the Teacups," and its relative "Songs in Many Keys" were all very good. "White Wings," in spite of her remarks upon her "never growing weary," was often taken for "Guardian Angel." Black's Novels seemed to be favorites here as well as in the world outside, for "Three Feathers" danced on the top of one maiden's little head, and "Madcap Violet" laughed at the wrong guesses of her would-be readers. Our valedictorian had a characteristic title, "Among My Books." The "Egyptian Princess" was one of the very pretty costumes. "Monroe's Sixth Reader," "Snow Bound" and "Twice Told Tales" remained sealed volumes to the greater number. A dainty "Bow of Orange Ribbon" assisted Miss Cowles and Miss Beckie in receiving. When the "works" were called in and explained, it was found Miss Ella L. Osborne had guessed thirty correctly and she was awarded the prize. There was only one drawback to the evening's pleasure and that was that our President, Mrs. Mead, was unable to be present.

Boston University.

Gamma Delta, the open society which includes all the young women of the College of Liberal Arts gave its annual high tea last Friday evening, in Jacob Sleeper Hall from six to nine o'clock. This was the social event of the year and is known as the "Klatsch Collegium." Music was furnished during the evening by a ladies orchestra. Fully 1200 people were present, including students from Harvard, Tech, Tufts, The Annex and Wellesley. Conspicuous among the guest were, President and Mrs. Wm. F. Warren, of Boston University, President E. H. Capen of Tufts, President Helen A. Shafer of Wellesley, Prof. E. F. Bradbury of Cambridge, Prof. Moses True Brown of Boston School of Oratory, Prof. B. G. Brown of Tufts, Miss Annie Hayden Webster and all the college faculty. It was a grand success which was largely due to the efficient management of Miss A. Louise Symonds, the chairman of the committee of arrangements.

There is to be an intercollegiate tennis tournament between Boston, Amherst, and Williams in Williamstown next May. E. R. Speare, the tennis champion of the college, will represent Boston University.

At the last meeting of the Faculty of the College of Liberal Arts, it was voted that the present course in the curriculum for the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy be abolished, and that no students be allowed to matriculate except for the degree of Bachelor of Arts or as a special student. This rule will not go into effect until next September, and will in no way affect those who are at present taking this course, as they will be given their degree when the required studies are completed.

Polytechnic.

The Juniors and Preps have been amusing themselves the last few days by an interchange of courtesies through the medium of snow-ball fights. The first time the Preps won, but Wednesday night the entire Junior class fell upon them and they were driven off the field. It is said that the Dean of the Faculty attempted to remonstrate, but the Dean himself became a target and rapidly retreated. The victorious Juniors hired expensive wagons and paraded the streets in celebration.

J. A. Derby, '93, vaulted 9 feet 8 inches last Saturday night at the Worcester Athletic Club games. This is 2 inches higher than the inter-collegiate record up to last year, and but 1.35 behind last year's. Unfortunately he sprained his right wrist; if this gets well in time it probably means a first prize for Worcester in the spring field-day. The new class is also said to contain some promising athletes. One man, six feet three inches in height weighs two hundred and ten—material for the rush line. Another man has run his hundred yards in 10½. The class also contains a crack pitcher from the Boston Tech.

The Annual Convention of the New England Inter-collegiate Athletic Association occurs this morning at the Quincy House, Boston. The Worcester Athletic Club will send two or three representatives to try and persuade the delegates to hold the annual field sports at Worcester instead of Springfield. They will make the same offer as a year ago, the free use of the grounds, the full care of the advertising and arrangements, and two thirds of the receipts. The chance of their success seems very good this year.

President Fuller holds a reception for the Junior class at his house, Boynton street, next Tuesday evening.

The proposed changes in the mechanical and electrical courses have caused much discussion on the part of the middle-ers. A great many evidently intend to take both, being allowed to graduate however from but one. This means about six weeks extra practice test hours a day during the summer vacation.

A recent letter from ex-Professor Eaton now at Redlands, Cal., says, "I am happy to say that I am much better than when I left Worcester, having gained 20 lbs. in weight. I am working very hard on my new house and have bought four ranches since coming here and sold three, so you see that when LIGHT said that I was going to live a lazy life, it was a little off."

The High School Alumni.

About two hundred people attended the sixth annual meeting of the Worcester High School Association, held Tuesday evening in High School hall, but very little interest was shown in the proceedings. The business meeting was called to order at 8.15 o'clock by President Francis I. McKeon. The minutes of the June meeting were read by Secretary John G. Wight and Maj. F. G. Stiles moved that the constitution be so amended that hereafter there be only one meeting each year, that at graduation time in June. The amendment was adopted. A committee consisting of Edmund M. Bartoo, Dr. Edward D. Fitch and Miss Annie Morse were appointed to nominate officers for the ensuing year and reported the following who were elected: President, Frederick G. Stiles; vice-presidents, Stephen Salisbury, Charles M. Thayer, Mrs. J. Russell Marble and Mrs. Kate G. Taft; secretary, J. G. Wight; Assistant secretary, Miss Mary Jilison; treasurer, Joseph H. Perry; board of directors, Edmund M. Bartoo, Miss Alice G. Arnold and George B. Churchill. A motion by Mr. Bartoo that hereafter all the money received for life membership fees be funded was carried. This has always been done save during the past two years.

Following the business meeting was a miscellaneous program as follows: Overture, orchestra; song, "The New Kingdom," by Tolors, Miss Alice B. Hammond, '86; violin solo, "Lantasia," by Singlee, Miss Lucy M. Day, '93; recitation, "The wonderful one-hoss shay," by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Miss Alice L. Gates, '92; piano solo, "Etude in D flat," by Liszt, Arthur J. Bassett, '87; music, orchestra. Miss Fannie L. Day, '91, and Arthur J. Bassett, '87, were accompanists. Mr. Bassett bore off the greatest honors, being very heartily applauded.

KEM-KOM

One 25-cent package of Kem-Kom—your grocer has it—a few gallons of water—an old tub or barrel (it won't hurt a new one)—a stick or a poker—a minute's stirring—a water pot—three minutes of sprinkling—your ton of coal is worth a ton and a quarter.

In large quantities for railroads, manufacturing and homes. For sale by the Standard Coal and Fuel Co., Equitable Building, Boston.

There were three class reunions, '91 in room 6; '90 in room 21; '84 in room 22. There was dancing in the lower corridor until after eleven o'clock, which was thoroughly enjoyed by the younger graduates present. The collation which was one of the features of the past reunions, was dispensed with this year on account of lack of funds.

In Memoriam.

Grace Church will miss another of its former members in the death of Mrs. Laroey A. Daniels, formerly Miss Mattie S. Coller. Until her marriage, less than three years ago, she was for several years a member of the choir at this church. Acute Bright's disease gave no hope that she could recover.

Her last conscious hours gave abundant testimony to the apostle's words that "His death shall be glorious." Out of the fullness of her heart she asked the watchers to sing, but they were utterly unable to command their voices. Then she began herself the sweet lines, "Jesus, lover of my soul," and sustained it through two stanzas.

Mrs. Daniels was the only child of Mr. Asa R. Coller, whose death occurred in June last. It is not often that an entire family is so soon reunited on the other shore, after the first member departs. In the present instance there were not four years and three months from the first to the last. She leaves a husband to mourn her loss.

Dastardly.

Thursday night, a lad, a grandson of one of the most prominent dwellers on Chestnut Street, while peacefully pursuing his way, was assailed by a sidewalk shoveller and beaten. It is to be hoped that the appearance of the assailant in the Police Court, Friday morning may prove a valuable lesson and possibly prevent his becoming a worse criminal.

In preparing stale bread, dried in the oven, then pounded and sifted for crumbs to be used for fishballs, croquettes, etc., the process will be found much easier if the bits of bread are pounded before they cool.

For invalids, orange cream is a change, a relish sometimes when nothing else seems to satisfy the callings of a disturbed and unnatural taste. Grate three oranges into two cups of cold water, and beat up with two eggs. Sweeten, strain, simmer slowly till it thickens, and cool in glasses.

In hanging pictures it is often impossible to get at a beam or wood work, and there is difficulty in getting the nail or screw to hold. But this may be done by making a hole with a gimlet, then filling the hole with wet plaster of Paris, then insert the nail or screw, and smooth it all around neatly, and when it is thoroughly dry it will be a firm as possible. D.

Salt is generally supposed to be one of the articles, that cannot well be adulterated, but it is a mistake for it is often mixed with other things. If you doubt whether your fine table salt is pure, test it. Take one ounce of salt and four ounces of cold rain water, added to it. If the salt does not dissolve perfectly, you may know that your salt contains plaster of Paris, and the coarser brand of salt often contains fine white sand. We should not care to eat either of these articles in a separate state, and, although salt is absolutely indispensable in cooking, and for other uses, if it is used in too large quantities it is often unhealthy. Too much salt in one's food will often cause constipation, dyspepsia, chronic catarrh and skin diseases. Persons, so afflicted, try various remedies, and wonder why they do not feel better, and all the time they keep on with the same diet. That feeds the disease. Salt has the best effect on the system when it is cooked in with the food. D.

Patients, recovering from a fever and only allowed the most simple kinds of nutriment, will find the following food very pleasant to take.

Drink made from pure cold water mixed with the syrup of raspberry, strawberry, or quince, or apple jelly to which add a little powdered sugar.

Toast should be made of stale bread, but should contain neither alum, potash, nor soda. Pour boiling water on the toast and let it stand a short time, then add a pinch of salt and a little sugar. D.

Ignace J. Paderewski.

Even in the present days of juvenile prodigies and phenomenal exhibitions of pianistic power, Paderewski has appeared to astonish the general public, and to charm music-lovers by the marvellous dexterity he displays upon the key-board, and by the manifestation of much rarer qualities—lifting him above the heads of all his contemporaries—he has acquired in an unusually short time, the highest position in the artistic world. The more frequently the opportunity has been afforded of hearing Paderewski, the greater admiration his performances have excited.

In purely mechanical skill it seems impossible to exceed the limits of his amazing achievements. He has his light and delicate moods as well as his dreamy and romantic humours which find expression in the performance of the beautiful piano-forte works of his fellow-countryman, Frederic Chopin, interest in whose works increases year by year; for fire and fineness of execution nothing can surpass his playing of this master's Scherzos and Fantasies; for breadth of style and forcible delivery his performance of his own concerto in A minor, together with the concertos of Rubinstein and Beethoven is superb; while for sweep of hand, extraordinary rapidity of finger and mastery over Liszt's Rhapsodies and Fantasias he is practically unrivalled in the world; there is yet to be considered the surpassing beauty of those momentary fancies and graceful touches, which, when the music admits of it, can only be imparted by the most gifted of artists, but which adds so much charm to the composition itself. In this delightful quality, Paderewski excels any pianist, in point of fact his playing never gives one the idea of a studied performance, but seems to be rather the outcome of inherent and spontaneous musical feeling. Of all living pianists he reminds the hearer most of Anton Rubinstein, but his manipulation is more delicate, far surer and clearer than that of the great Moldavian. He never plays a false note, and the fire and musical impulse which animate Paderewski never interfere upon the borderland which divides enthusiasm from extravagance.

Ignace Jan Paderewski first saw the light at Podolia, a province of Russian Poland, on the 6th of November, 1860, and at the early age of three began to play the piano. At seven his father placed him under the care of a local teacher, Pierre Sowinski, and with this master the young Ignace remained for four years. In 1872 he went to Warsaw where the foundation of his knowledge of harmony and counterpoint was acquired from Roguski, but he subsequently pursued this branch of his studies under the late Frederick Kiel, the eminent teacher and theorist of Berlin.

Shortly after this date Paderewski undertook his first tournee, which extended throughout Russia, Siberia, Servia and Roumania, during the course of which he performed nothing but his own compositions. At eighteen years of age he was nominated Professor of Music to the Warsaw Conservatory, and it is no secret that the money earned in this capacity was devoted to the acquisition of general knowledge after the hours when his musical duties had ceased. In 1884 he held a profesorship at the Conservatory of Music in Strasburg, but during that year he abandoned teaching and resolved upon the more fascinating career of a pianistic virtuoso. Paderewski accordingly removed to Vienna, and placed himself under his fellow-countryman, Theodor Leschetzky, the well known successful trainer of pianists, and husband of the no less famous pianist, Annette Essipoff, and at the expiration of three years' hard study he made his début before the critical Viennese public in 1887, and was at once proclaimed to be one of the most remarkable pianists of the day.

From this date he paid several visits to the principal towns throughout Germany, always with increasing success, and in the Autumn of 1889 he made his first appearance before a Parisian audience, and as my readers are aware, became the "lion" of the Paris season.

The first performance in England was given at the instigation of Mr. Daniel Mayer at St. James's Hall, on the 9th of May, 1890, since which date he has appeared at a large number of concerts and recitals in London and the provinces, his performances being uniformly marked by a crescendo of success and enthusiasm by the increasing audiences.

Paderewski has composed a large number of piano-forte pieces, many of which have attained great popularity; a concerto in A minor, for piano and orchestra, conceived in a broad and lofty style, and evincing great originality of subject and treatment; a Suite for orchestra in G; a Concerto for violin and orchestra in G minor, and over eighty vocal pieces in the German, French and Polish languages.

Paderewski married at the early age of nineteen, although he lost his wife by illness, he has a son living. Paderewski is exceedingly natural in his manners, kind-hearted and unaffected in the last degree, and possesses one of the rarest qualifications among great players, that of being a wonderfully good and patient listener. I may add that his memory is so vast and comprehensive that he is enabled to perform without a book a repertoire which covers a range of compositions of the ancient and modern writers practically without limit.

Since Franz Liszt and Anton Rubenstein, admittedly the pianistic giants of their time, no artist has appeared to create the same stir in the artistic world as Ignace Jan Paderewski, and it is highly gratifying to know that his transcendent ability is meeting with that recognition and reward which only the most highly gifted can command.

FREDERICK F. BUFFEN.

Paderewski is to appear at one recital in Worcester on Monday evening, Feb. 22d. Lovers of piano music cannot afford to miss this opportunity to hear him, as undoubtedly he will be the greatest and most talked of piano virtuoso of the decade. The public is indebted to the enterprise of Daniel F. Gay for this rare musical treat. It is understood that Paderewski declined to appear in Portland, Me., although $1,500 was offered him for two recitals, afternoon and evening. Subscribers will do well to remember that they can purchase seats Feb. 13th, two days in advance of the public.

COSTIVENESS

If not relieved by treatment and timely treatment, it tends to result in chronic constipation. An agent that may be used with perfect safety and satisfaction Ayer's Pills are recommended. Unlike most cathartics, these pills while they act and cleanse exert a tonic influence on the stomach, liver, and bowels, enabling those who perform their functions with healthy regularity and comfort. Being purely vegetable and non-poisonous, they are in no sense a habit-forming medicine, and may be used with impunity for all and young of every climate. Ayer's Pills are everywhere the favorite. G. W. Bowditch, 2, Pearl Street, Boston, Pa., says: "Having been subject for years to constipation, without being able to find much relief, I at last tried Ayer's Pills, and I declare it both a relief and a pleasure to testify that I have derived great benefit from their use. I would not willingly be without them."

THE ECONOMY IN GOOD CLOTHES BOUGHT HERE.

The "good enough to sell" theory may work well for those who open a store for a brief year or two.

But it is pretty hard on the men who work hard for every dollar they get.

"Good enough to sell" means that the clothes look well enough and will hang well enough while you try them on and pay your money.

But, boys, when you have worn them a week or two, you begin to wonder why your clothes "look so."

You ask yourself whether you have been as careful with them as you ought.

All you know is that they look rough, they look dusty, they looked dragged.

Well, you have an old suit to wear in a month or two.

Isn't that so?

That experience won't come to you with "OUR" clothing.

We don't believe in that kind.

We don't make that sort.

But what you have a right to expect here is

A great week in Silks.
A great week in Handkerchiefs.
A great week in Ginghams.
Oh, Yes, indeed, it has been a busy time, and you have had three delightful shopping days with us.

Where do you get all that is excellent and worthy at the straightest and fairest prices? Let the 50c Printed Indias answer the question for us.

Where do you get all that is lovely in Ginghams?

Let the piled up beauty in silken stripe and plaid join with the lovely Crepes in telling you the Gingham story.

Where can you get Hamburg bargains at all like ours?

"Nowhere in this section," we hear you all answer, and you answer truly.

Where can you see, or where did you ever see, Handkerchiefs of such prettiness at so low prices as you see here—now?

Why, the men who swing the great departments in our house have a strength and a power over the fabric world that wins all that is suitable and beautiful to our customers.

The great importers, the traveling salesmen—all who handle the best products of the world, come here with their choicest.

Because they know that our ladies can appreciate what is artistic and what is true.

Why is it you never see the same goods at other places?

Simply because the same goods are not shown to them.

Simply because they are not wanted.

And yet—these better goods, these better styles, in correct taste, really cost you no more, if as much, than you pay for the common sorts found everywhere and worn by everybody.

Alls of God! If he but wave his hand,
The mists collect, the rain falls thick and loud,
Till with a smile of light on sea and land,
Lo! he looks back from the departing cloud.
—The Two Angels.

"Look both ways" has long been a valuable motto and never was it more applicable than when a Worcester policeman, in front of City Hall kicked a man who had excited his ire.

Two new Aldermen were looking on and Mr. Policeman had to eat humble pie and a big piece of it. And here comes in the thought that our protective force ought to be made up of men who won't kick offenders, but, if they be law breakers, will arrest and carry before the courts. The timely presence of superior officers is a good thing.

A policeman acts impersonally or should. It should be nothing to him, whom he arrests. He is a sworn conservator of public peace and morality. He should discharge his duties with as little show of force as possible and with the very least personal rancor possible. This is one of the reasons why mental characteristics as well as physical should be considered in selecting our protectors.

The theater programs now appear, minus the lottery advertisements, and show-bills, some of them, have been covered with blank paper. Is it any wonder that the young people of the rural districts, in some respects, have a better chance than those of the cities. Parents there are not afraid to give their children full run of the farm and neighborhood. The pitfalls there are dangerous only for the body. In the city, they endanger both soul and body; and all for greed. Cut out the desire to rake in the dollars and nine-tenths of our necessary protective laws might be annulled. Is it any wonder, that poets have written of human wolves?

Our City Marshal, Mr. Washburn, has written a very keen criticism on recent drunk laws in the shape of a letter to certain Boston parties, in which he sets forth that apparently the time is near when policemen will go to their rounds with pillows on their backs, that they may on occasion, minister the better to the ease and comfort of the men discovered drunk in the streets. It would seem that our Marshal believes in a little less sympathy for the inebriate. No state in the Union has legislated so much as Massachusetts concerning drink and drunkards and how much better off are we than when a Prohibitory Law was on our Statute Book?

One can't eat his cake and have it. There are thousands of people in the state who very much wish to have drinking free and yet have no drunkards. Half of our legislation has looked towards this utopian end. Much of the legislation has been effected by men who were not themselves abstainers and what better could we expect than what we have gained. Then there is a wide circle of people who wish to have their particular plan tried. To go the rounds of all these plans would exhaust time and lay hold on eternity. There is no plan so short, so effective as No License and then back the vote up by strict attention to the enforcement of the law.

To pass or not to pass, that is the question. This slight alteration of Hamlet's well remembered soliloquy will well express the matter that engaged the attention of Boston Legislators last week. It is one thing to make laws, quite another to enforce them. Very likely no more Legislative passes, as such, will be issued, but if roads wish to give and men care to receive, there is no earthly reason nor law that can prevent corporation or individuals giving what they choose. There are limitations in law applications if not in law making. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. We shall see what will come of this.

The era of anniversaries is upon us. Worcester alone in church and societies will keep the local historian busy for many a month to come. The semi-centennial of the Mechanics Association is no sooner past than we look forward to the same event in the career of the Horticultural Society. What with quadracentennials, as in the discovery of this country, centennials and other multiples and divisions of the hundred years we and our children are to have history objectively presented indefinitely. After all, it is the very best way in which to impress historic truths. Much that we remember is in mind by way of associations, hence the more we can make of anniversaries the better we shall fix the events they commemorate.

Postal Depositories for Small Savings.

The Postmaster-General argues strenuously for chances to make deposits for people beyond the reach of savings banks. He reiterates his plan of last year, and adds:

Another plan, quite simple and thoroughly practical, would be to issue at the post-offices non-negotiable certificates of postal deposit in sums of $10, $20, $50, and $100, bearing interest at the rate of half a cent a day on the dollar ($1.82 1/2 per year) after the first of the month following the date of deposit, and the principal and interest payable on demand at any money-order office by proper indorsement and identification under regulations of the Postmaster-General. The money deposited in each state to be reinvested, so far as possible, in the same state in school or municipal bonds by the Postmaster-General, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. In establishing these depositories due care should be taken to provide first for the states without savings banks, and for communities with but few facilities. The reports of 36,598 postmasters state that the distance of savings banks from post-offices varies from a few feet to hundreds of miles, and the actual average of distance in 1,876 out of 2,891 counties of the United States is 48 miles.

Many People are Saying

That any attempt to force upon America the European Sunday, in the way of keeping open the Chicago Fair on that day, is deserving of the severest condemnation, that when in Rome we should conform to Roman ways and that it would not hurt our foreign guests to see the inside of some of Chicago's churches on Sunday and that all talk about the laboring man wanting the day for his visits to the Fair is the purest gammon, only a part of the scheme to break down our present Sunday laws.

That the parties who propose to run Joseph Cook for the presidency have undertaken a very large task, that the February talks in Tremont Temple, Boston, fully consume all of the Reverend gentleman's excess of energy and that "Our Joseph" is not, at all, in the presidential way.

That Mayor Matthew's project of a new City Hall in Boston, reminds them of some of the recent eloquence in this city over a similar proposal, that the proposition to take a part of the Public Gardens for the site was similarly like the plan to plant a City Hall on our own Common and that both schemes deserve condemnation.

That the indications warrant the belief that the Dix Street School house will be put in proper shape for school purposes, and that children may again go to school to be instructed without danger of contagion.

That many people hiring houses in the Dix Street neighborhood, unless the school has been properly cared for will move to some other part of the city, leaving tenements to rest.

Dr. William J. Rolfe of Cambridge, the distinguished Shakespearean scholar, lectured on "Hamlet" Monday afternoon, before the pupils of the Home School and their friends.
He spoke first of the historical dates concerning the leading characters, speaking at considerable length concerning Hamlet and Ophelia and concluded by presenting the moral of the play. After the lecture Dr. Rolfe received his listeners in the parlor below.

GRACE.—The Ladies Social Circle of Grace M. E., Church will give an ancient and modern supper with a musical and literary entertainment to correspond, in the vestry
Tuesday, Feb. 23. There will also be a circulating library with many unique and interesting features. The admission will be ten cents and twenty-five cents for supper.

BAPTIST.

PLEASANT STREET.—Rev. H. J. White is preaching a special course of sermons to extend through the month. The subject of the morning sermons is Lessons from the Temptation of Jesus: Feb. 7, The character of Satan as seen in the temptation of Jesus. Feb. 14,
The source, strength and sin of temptation.
Feb. 21, The weapon of defence and how to use it. Feb. 28, The blessedness of victory over temptation. The evening sermons are lessons from the Prodigal Son: Feb. 7, The universal fatherhood of God. Feb. 14, The universal brotherhood of man. Feb. 21, The possibilities and responsibilities of human freedom. Feb. 28, Self-recognition. Continued in March: March 6, Reconciliation and restoration. March 13, The elder brother; or, the uncharitableness of self righteousness.

FREE BAPTIST.—Rev. F. D. George, Deacons P. P. Davis and George W. Vinton were delegates from the Free Baptist Church at the meeting of the Massachusetts Association of Free Baptist Churches, which met in Lynn,
Wednesday and Thursday.

CONGREGATIONAL.

PILGRIM—This enterprising church is trying, with very bright prospects of success, to reduce its debt of $63,875. An attempt is being made to raise $25,000 and about $13,500 has already been paid, while enough more is promised to make more than $15,000.

Y. M. C. A.

The program to be tend-er'd by the Association next Tuesday evening to the young peoples societies of the Worcester churches is as follows: 7 to 8, reception in parlor; 8 to 8.15, wand drill by the Juniors in Association Hall;
8.15 to 10, addresses by State Secretary Armstrong of Boston, D. B. Tucker, president of the Y. P. S. C. E. Local Union and J. L. Gordon of Boston. Musical selections will be interspersed.

METHODIST.

CORAL STREET.—The Ladies Aid Society held a very successful Bazar and entertainment in their vestry Thursday night. There were excellent readings by Miss Angie Parker and singing by Miss and Mrs. Bullen. The tables were in charge of the following ladies:
Fancy table, Miss Nettie Knowles, Miss
Mabel Lawton, Mrs. Cate; kitchen table,
Mrs. Melvin G. Fuller, Mrs. T. O. Knowles,
Mrs. Calvin L. Goodwin; candy table,
Miss Lottie Cate, Miss Nellie Benson,
Miss Frankie Knight, Miss Clara
Wood; fancy and mystery table, Mrs. James
C. Barber, Miss Willow Gates, Miss Edith Pierce, Miss Amy Fuller.

Y. P. S. C. E.

At the monthly meeting of the executive board, held at the Y. M. C. A. building Monday evening, it was decided that the date of the March meeting of the Local Union at Piedmont Church be the 15th. Mr.

Lingley of the Pleasant Street Baptist, Miss Harding of the Salem Street and Harry King of the South Baptist were appointed a committee to secure information from the United Society in regard to the next national convention to be held in New York City in July. It is proposed that if enough from this city express an intention of going to the convention, an entire hotel will be engaged for the week.
A proposition to hold the Union meetings at fixed dates was tabled until the next meeting.

Sunday, Feb. 7, the eleventh anniversary of the Y. P. S. C. E. was observed at Piedmont Church. The morning sermon was on the text
"Not to be Ministered Unto but to Minister."
The evening service, led by the Endeavor Society, consisted of Christian Endeavor music, a paper on the "Model Committee," by J. H.
Child, recitations by Misses Alice W. Laid and Alice Davis and addresses by President
Irving E. Bigelow and the pastor, Rev. D. O.
Mears, D. D. The society was presented with three scrapbooks for use of the committees.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent.
Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Feb. 20, 1892.

Signed _____

I.

"They chained us each to a column stone,
And we were three,—yet each alone."

II.

"Up with my banner on the wall

The St. Ann's coffee party will open in the basement of the church on Monday evening and continue through the week.

Long live the good school! giving out year by year
Recruits to true manhood and womanhood dear,
Brave boys, modest maidens, in beauty sent forth,
The living epistles and proof of its worth!

WHITTIER,
The Quaker Alumnus.

"It is said that President Albion W. Small of Colby University, Waterville, Me., has been elected professor of social science in the University of Chicago, and is likely to accept, but will not leave Waterville until a year from next Autumn."

Money makes not only the mare but the college professor and president, even, go. In this case, it would seem there was something small in it.

"Among those who are mentioned in connection with the presidency of Dartmouth, made vacant by the resignation of Dr. Bartlett, are Prof. A. S. Hardy, Dr. Little, '61, of Boston, Dr. William J. Tucker, '61, of the Andover Theological Seminary, and Dr. Francis Brown, '79, of Union Theological Seminary."

President Bartlett is the father of the wife of the Rev. Mr. Stimson, who was pastor of the Union Church in this city some years ago. He was always noted for his arbitrary ways and "Hot Water" is not too forcible an expression for the condition he has been in, during nearly all his presidency. Prof. Hardy is noted as a novelist and is a graduate of West Point. When the possibility of Prof. Tucker's succeeding was mentioned in Boston recently, one who is "up" on the Andover embroglio at once intimated that the Professor was not "Orthodox." Be this at it may Worcester remembers he bore away a Worcester girl, Miss Charlotte, eldest daughter of Dr. Henry T. Cheever, for his wife and many would like to chronicle the promotion.

President Eliot, of Harvard, is reported as saying: "The fate of co-education in this country is not yet quite apparent. It is more popular in the West than in the East, where colleges especially for women seem to be preferred." The Springfield (Mass.) Republican says: "The president's memory should be jogged with a bit of history. When the demand was made for higher educational opportunities for women, the established colleges in the West, one after another, opened their doors to women. In the East, most of the established colleges selfishly and stubbornly refused to admit women; so that the matter of preference would not seem to be a matter of choice."

"Miss Mary A. Jordan, teacher of rhetoric in Smith College, and said to be one of the most discerning instructors in that or any other college, has organized the girls into a legislature, where various practical public questions are discussed. At the first session, the subject of grade-crossings in the city was taken up, the report of the special commissioners furnishing the basis of the discussion.

The members of the class were limited to five minute speeches, and the discussion showed that they were thoroughly informed on all phases of the subject."—Woman's Column.

Wellesley.

One of the events which stands out with the greatest prominence in the past few weeks is the day which Dr. Cuthbert Hall of New York spent with us. We are much pleased to hear that the sermon which he delivered upon the "All-round Life" is to be published.

Dr. Philip Moxom of Iloston and Mr. H. A. Bridgman of the Congregationalist have supplied the pulpit.

Feb. 1 a concert was given by Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen, assisted by the Bethoven Club of Iloston.

Feb. 15, the students of the School of Music gave a recital.

Feb. 8, Mr. Gamaliel Bradford delivered an interesting lecture on the "Defects in our State Government."

This week a course of lectures in Political Economy is being given by Dr. Shaw of the "Review of Reviews" upon the "Cities of Europe."

One of the social events of the season was an entertainment given to the Freshman by the Juniors, Feb. 13. The president of the class as Queen of Hearts, surrounded by her guards and court, received. The entertainment was a play representing the introduction of '95 to the mysteries of college life, and was followed by dancing and refreshments. The costumes were very effective and the entertainment was voted a great success by the Freshmen.

Through the kindness of Professor Whiting we were invited to the Physical lecture room, last Monday afternoon, to see the size of the sun spot in proportion to that of the sun, as shown by the projection of the sun on the wall by a telescope at the window. In a short talk she explained to us the wonderful connection between sun spots, electrical disturbances and northern lights.

The college was much pained to hear of the death of Miss Mabel Stone, who was such a general favorite during her three years here. Resolutions were passed by the special organization and by the society of Phi Sigma, of which she was a member. The following are the resolutions passed by Phi Sigma:—

Whereas, The Society of Phi Sigma has sustained a deep loss in the death of Mabel J. Stone, we, in behalf of the society, desire to express our heartfelt sorrow for the loss of one so loyal and devoted to its interests. Therefore be it

Resolved, That we extend our most sincere sympathy to her sorrowing family and friends.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to her family and to the Prelude.

Preparations for the annual reception on Washington's birthday are going rapidly forward. In addition to the usual Glee Club concert in the afternoon and to the evening reception, there will be an informal dance in the gymnasium in the morning. Also, besides the teas given at the Campus Houses, almost every outside house: with any number of girls, is issuing invitations for teas, so that Monday will be a very gay and festive day for the college and its friends.

There have been two very interesting recitals of the Music School, one last Tuesday, the other the preceding week. The last was held in Assembly Hall, as it was partly an organ program, three pupils playing finely on the new organ.

Prof. Tucker, President of Andover Theological Seminary, spoke at vesper, Sunday.

Holy Cross.

The President gave a short address to the members of the St John's Guild at their last literary meeting. A rising vote of thanks was tendered the reverend speaker at the close of his talk for the able manner in which he imparted his instructions.

The second term is now commenced and the change of studies has begun to continue until June.

The class of philosophy had their second "Paper," on general metaphysics last Wednesday morning. A holiday was enjoyed in the afternoon.

The B. J. debating society will begin the meetings of the second term, tomorrow evening with the election of officers.

On Monday, Washington's birthday, a whole holiday will be given to the students.

The preparations are nearly all completed for the presentation of "The I'devated Case" at the theater on March 2d. All the orchestra has been sold and but few seats are left in any part of the house. The tickets that have been given out may be transferred at the box office for seats on and after February 27.

The new billiard rooms were opened with a tournament during the week.

The coming baseball season promises to eclipse all previous successes of the team on the diamond. The baseball association has organized by the re-election of J. W. Larkin as manager and Dennis O'Neil, Jr., as captain of the team. This makes O'Neil's fifth year on the team and the second as captain. Last year, under his captaincy, the team administered defeat to Brown and Harvard, who were especially strong last year. This year the club hopes to make its success even wider and games have been arranged with teams far and near. The opening game will be played here on Fast Day, April 7. The opposing team has not yet been chosen. During the Easter holidays, the team will take a trip to New York state playing Fordham. A game has also been arranged with Georgetown play a game with us. Murphy is an intimate friend of many of the students of the college. The following is a partial list of the games as arranged

April 28—Quincy Market Club of Boston.

May 2d—Harvard at Cambridge

May 7—Yale at Worcester.

May 10—Yale vs New Haven.

May 10—Fordham at New York.

James K. Churchill.

Only once before, has Worcester been honored with being the home of the Commander of the Massachusetts Department of the Grand Army of the Republic.

In 1868, the 2d year of the Department, the commander was General A. B. R. Sprague and he sat as one of the delegates as Past Commander at the recent encampment. So then, nearly twenty-five years have elapsed since Worcester last held the gavel.

Our commander in this, the first year in the second quarter of a century of the Department and the one who, if he live will lead the Massachusetts veterans in the Washington parade next September is a native of Boston where he was born in November, 1836. He early learned the upholsterers' trade and in his younger days was a fellow workman of the famous Patrick A. Collins of Boston. In fact at one time, he was president and "Pat" Collins was secretary of the Upholsterers' Union. In Boston and Charlestown, he formed intimacies that have been life long in duration.

When young he joined the militia and he takes no little pleasure in his memories of the Charlestown City Guards, in whose ranks he served. This was composed of men who were Democrats in politics and was the only military representative from New England at the Inauguration of President Buchanan in 1857.

This was Company K of the Fifth Regiment and when President Lincoln called for troops the men of this company were among the first to respond. They rendezvoused at Faneuil Hall and it was brought out, when Comrade Churchill was nominated for the post of Junior Vice Commander, two years ago that his mother was unwilling that he should go. She thought that her son had home duties to attend to as he surely had for his baby boy was only a few weeks old, but her son was not to be balked of his war journey, and when, being at the remote end of the Hall, he saw his mother enter the door, he quickly went out of a window and slid down a water spout to the ground. It was not a case of going up the spout. He kept the hall in sight, till he saw his mother, weary of searching for him, depart and then he ventured back and went on the famous expedition which so much redounded to the credit of the Bay State militia.

The Fifth Regiment went out three times, during the Rebellion. In this, its first enlistment, it sailed from New York the 21st of April and landed in Annapolis three days after. The regiment was accompanied on shipboard by our First Battalion of Rifles under Major Charles Devens. For the most part the Fifth was near Washington during the first service, but it saw severe fighting at Bull Run.

It went out again for nine months in 1862, serving in North Carolina. During its 100 days' enlistment in 1864, Comrade Churchill was first sergeant of Co. H.

At the recent banquet in Faneuil Hall, which followed the encampment, it was Commander Churchill's lot to sit near the window where he made his unusual descent, nearly thirty-one years ago. General Miles of the U. S. Army was one of his nearest neighbors and who could not find them for conversation in that place, especially when one of the party had taken such pains to conceal from his mother the fact that he was out.

In 1862 he volunteered to serve in a Charlestown Company, the Warren Guards which became a part of the 36th Regt., but the examining surgeon, who was also his family physician, knowing that his two children were sick with typhoid fever, refused to pass him, saying, "You are needed at home with your family."

Commander Churchill came to Worcester in 1866 and this city has been his home since. At his trade he worked for J. B. Lawrence, John D. Chollar and others. Though never devoted to politics he has held office being four years in the Common Council and School Board. In War times and since, comrade Churchill has never flinched from the Democracy in which he was reared.

Mayor Kelley, in 1886, made our Commander Assistant City Marshall and for six years he was in the Police Department, serving as night captain in 1883, under Mayor Hildreth. For several years past he has been in the employ of Pinkham & Willis in their house furnishing business.

Commander Churchill joined the G. A. R. in 1873, and passed through the several grades of the Post to that of Commander, which position he held in 1878 and '79. For two years, he commanded the Worcester County Division of the Grand Army. At the Department Encampment of 1890, he was elected Junior Vice Commander and, one year afterward, he was advanced to the Senior Vice Command. During these years, he was indefatigable in visiting all portions of the Department and doing all he could to advance the interests of the veterans. When he came home from his election to his first office, his Worcester friends joined in presenting him a sword and a complimentary banquet at the Lincoln House. His recent advancement to the highest position in the gift of his comrades is appreciated by the city of Worcester as well as by his many personal friends.

Mr. Churchill is a member of Worcester Lodge of Odd Fellows and in 1876, he was in command of the Wachusett Encampment, for a week, during its visit to the Centennial Exhibition. This was the only Massachusetts Encampment of the order that went to Philadelphia in a body. He is also prominent in the Royal Arcanum order.

In 1857, he was married to a Charlestown lady and they have two sons, Edward J., a Worcester druggist and James H., who is a chemical expert in Boston. The latter passed through the Worcester Schools, graduating from the High School in 1881 and three years later from the Worcester Polytechnic. Their only daughter, Katie, also a promising pupil in the High School, and a great favorite in a wide circle of friends died several years ago at an early age.

The past we have. The year before the G. A. R. is one to be filled with interest. It is a Presidential year. It is the Quadri-Centennial of America's discovery and above all, it is the year in which the Grand Army is to move on Washington Massachusetts veterans by the thousands will visit Washington during the National Encampment. Post 10 will lead as a guard-of honor to a member who will command the Department of Massachusetts.

The Encampment.

No Post in the Commonwealth takes more interest in department affairs than George H. Ward Post of this city. Only one command in the state, that of Lynn, exceeds ours in numbers, so the number of delegates who, annually, go down to the Hub, forms no inconsiderable portion of the Encampment. There, too, the delegates have acquired the reputation of staying and of attending to duties to the end. Those who went down this year were Past Department Commander, General A. B. R. Sprague, Commander John B. Lepire, A. S. Roe, William H. Bartlett, James Crosby, C. N. Walker, William L. Robinson, E. T. Raymond, George Mirick, Charles E. Grant, S. F. Babbitt, C. S. Gratton, A. M. Parker, Charles E. Simmons, C. W. Gasset, M. A. Boyden and W. W. Scott. While interested in all that pertains to the good of the order, these delegates may be pardoned for having a paramount interest in the promotion of their comrade and when success crowned their efforts, they were naturally pretty happy. It will be many years before Post 10 sets out again in a similar venture. Two commanders in twenty-five years is not an excessive asking for a Post as large as ours. Once and once only has our city had the Commander-in-Chief, General Charles Devens, and that was many years ago.

In addition to securing the head of the Department, to Post 10 were accredited a delegate to the National Encampment, Alfred S. Roe and an alternate, David Boyden. Post 18, of Ashland has delegate Granville C. Fiske and Post 22 alternate, C. W. Wilcox. Post 48 of Ayer, also, has an alternate in A. J. Lovejoy.

The success attending the encampment prompted the flying of the flag at Post headquarters, Thursday, on the announcement of the vote. Worcester veterans are very happy.

Old Mens' Home.

This very beneficent institution has lately received a check for $100 from Mr. S. R. Heywood. Many more such could be used to advantage.

The Summer Camp.

Col. Chas. E. Burbank is already arranging for the Natural History Camp at the Lake. Amherst will furnish the following officers and teachers. W. J. Fisher, '92, to teach ornithology; H. L. Clark, '92, and E. L. Morton, '91, botany. Alfred Turner, '93, will have the direction of swimming and general athletics. C. E. Burbank, '92, will be commandant, and E. D. Pierce, '92, Adjutant of the camp.

He and She.

For years he'd tried to see her home,
For years had she declined.
Each time he brought some good excuse,
But she in ways that maidens use
Would some quick answer find.
This night he came as usual.
Without a thought of failing,
And said: "I think it is my privilege,
For there's a man on down the bridge
A leaning 'gainst the railing."
She listened quite attentively,
Then spoke in accents rare:
"O thank you, John, for telling me—
He said he'd meet me there."

HISTORY OF THE HIGH SCHOOL.

The Classical and English High School of Worcester began in 1845. At the end of the present school year, it will be divided. Having the data prepared, I purpose, if sufficient interest is shown in the project, to issue a history of the School. The book, a square octavo, nicely bound in cloth, will contain:

FIRST—An account of the beginning of the institution and a running comment on teachers and pupils to the present year.

SECOND—Statements as to the growth and progress of the school apparatus, library and other features, so essential to the success of the same.

THIRD—The names of all pupils in the school down to 1861, the first graduating exercises, and the names of all graduates since.

FOURTH—The graduating exercises in full from 1861 to the end.

FIFTH—Pictures of the school buildings and of teachers with miscellaneous matter pertinent to the subject.

The cooperation of every one ever connected with the school is besought.

To show your interest in the work, please fill out and return the accompanying coupon.

The Peak Family.

HISTORY OF THE FAMOUS SWISS BELL RINGERS.

Some of its Notable Members Living in the Northwest.

F. W. COOK.

William H. Peak, of Niles, Michigan, is the man who has been longest before the amusement-loving public of America. His name is associated with Swiss bell ringing for as long as the memory of any one of this generation runneth back, probably. He is about 60 years old.

As he made his appearance before the public when he was seven years old, he antedates even Dan Rice, of jolly fame. He was born in Boston, but his first public appearance was in Dr. Chapin's church at Charlestown, Massachusetts, as the alto of a quartet, the other members of which were his father, mother and uncle. Even then he was a member of the Handel and Haydn Musical Society, of Boston, and in time the leading alto of the Seguin Opera Company's chorus. The Peak Quartet were engaged by temperance societies of Boston in those days, and, with John B. Gough, travelled through New England in the interests of the temperance cause for two years. After this they travelled under their own auspices, year by year widening their circuit, venturing further and further from home, till the whole United States was their home, fairly, and all lovers of music their friends.

As I have said, at first the Peak family were mere vocalists, their only accompaniments being a melodian, the best portable instrument available in that day, when guitars were added for William and Julia, till William arrived at the dignity of a harp, in which he was quickly followed by Miss Julia, who soon built up an enviable reputation as a harpist which she still retains. She is now Mrs. Blaisdell, and receives pupils for that instrument in New York, and with her is her father, William A. Peak, Sr., who is in active health and spirits still, at the age of 87.

Soon after introducing the harp in their concerts, the Peak family brought before the public staff bells. The very first player of these was a young English boy, who died of consumption before he had been over many weeks. To secure a set of staff bells required the ingenuity of William, and some weeks of experimenting. Very different from those in vogue now was the arrangement he concocted, of swinging bells, which his little sister, Fannie Peak, sat under, on the floor, and touched with very long sticks. These were discarded early for a set of glass bells, some of which were fastened on a frame, with mouth up and the right tone secured by filling with water. These giving much trouble by breaking, in transit, a set of genuine staff bells was secured, the style of which was not materially altered since. This was about 1847, and at that time they came into possession of a set of regular table bells, the property of a Swiss company of bell ringers, who becoming financially embarrassed were obliged to pledge their bells and never redeemed them. The Peak family soon mastered the use of these bells and from that time were known as "The Peak Family Swiss Bell Ringers."

Some account of the bells themselves will not be devoid of interest, I feel sure. They are manufactured at Mears, England, and forty-two comprise a set, ranging in weight from four pounds to half an ounce, and in pitch from F in the bass to F in the soprano—four octaves—of bell metal, the tongue being cylindrical, the tips covered with chamois skin, like the hammers of a piano, the strength of the tone depending on the amount of force used by the player, and there is a spring which prevents it giving out more than one sound when struck. Contrary to the general impression there is no set rule for placing the bells, as the strings of a harp or piano are arranged, but different pieces require a different setting, just as a guitar is tuned differently for "The Spanish Fandango," etc, and this placing of bells is a matter of experience governed by finding out the most convenient places for those most frequently used while learning the piece.

It will be recognized by this that success in bell playing depends for expression as much, if not more, on the taste and judgment of the performers, as in the case with any other instruments. The Peaks adopted in playing the style known as English bell playing, wherein they produced a peculiar effect, by waving or swinging the bells as they were struck, such as no other troupe in this country accomplished, and is almost indescribable. There was a prolonged sound, like harmonies on a violin "as sweet and clear as horns from Elf-land, faintly blowing."

The family continued giving concerts together till about 1853. They came to Niles in the course of a tour, and one member of the family, it is understood, was taken seriously ill so that it was a month before the tour could be resumed. Meanwhile they had made a large circle of acquaintances, and William had lost his heart to Miss Lydia P. Harris, a handsome girl of sterling worth and much more than ordinary force of character. From thenceforth the original Peak family gave their concerts without William, who organized a company of his own, which included his wife, her three brothers, who were very gifted, musically, and two little girls whom they had adopted, with phenomenal voices and remarkable dramatic instincts, and one or two others.

With few changes this organization continued concertizing up to 1875, when it was made to include the exceedingly talented Berger family. In 1862 the company included Sol Smith Russell, then a lad of 16. He was also in the company with the Bergers, and eventually married Miss Louisa, soprano and 'cellist of the family. If a program could be seen of the concerts given by this troupe during the next three years they would be pronounced unapproachable now for novelty and brilliancy. Later the Bergers took the road under their own management and in their places were the noted Vescellius sister and Jeppe Delano, the comedian, who married Fannie Peak, who for years had been a very strong member of the company and is still known as a fine soprano.

All through these years the sun of prosperity seemed to shine steadily, but there came a time when bell-ringing was no novelty, and the public taste had shifted, and perhaps shifted faster than a manager, who was now considered "an old timer," could keep pace with. Any way there were losses for a year or two, and a retirement from the road and losses from unfortunate speculations, as might be anticipated would be made by one of an artist's "in" and not at all speculative turn of mind. Added to this, the fatigue of travel had engendered the use of stimulants, of late years, and everything seemed to conduce to augment the temptations. The regard and admiration men felt for him too often sought to express itself in invitations to drink, and there came years when the reins of business were laid down, in permitted with admirable brave struggles to resume them, with varying but never brilliant success.

I do not think I should ever have the heart to tell this story if the end had had to be a sad one, but the Keeley cure at Dwight, Ill., has changed it to one of rejoicing. From it has come the man who in sunshine or shade made no enemies, who when life was the hardest, never forgot to be kind and gentlemanly, come with steady nerves and eyes that look straight into yours, now, and a face with the same kind look upon it, now that the clouds are drifted away. You should see the hearty handshakes he encounters, and know how sincere is the frequent "Thank God," he hears. You would be glad with us, his fellow citizens, that he has come back to us freed from the worst bondage in this world, a free, fearless man, to whom life once more seems worth living. The brave wife, by her own unaided exertions, had a good home awaiting him; his sons had hung to him through all the clouded years, and he once more has taken a place among the world's workers.

His oldest son, Frank H. Peak, has won for himself a name, and a very strong following in Chicago, by the aid of a very gifted wife, in the teaching of dancing, and the youngest son is almost equally successful in the same line, and the subject of my sketch is engaged with him furnishing music for flourishing classes, every night of six days in the week, and I, who write, am glad to tell the story, believing it will come to thousands who will rejoice with him and for him, and be glad of his emancipation and prosperity, and that from far, as from near, will come to him heart warming, stimulating words of sympathy and congratulation, and because I believe, with Mrs. Whitney, that "there is some spiritual alchemy that may transmute good wishes into something a life we are interested in may be the richer and better for."—Minneapolis Spectator

Our Children

There is nothing like sleep to restore a tired brain, and nothing like the lack of it to expose it to harm. A child should be allowed to waken of itself, it is sure to do so when it has had sleep enough. To this end it should always retire early.

The growth and the special development of the young girl involve a special demand for food. Moreover, the brain is not only growing, but is being specially worked, and must be correspondingly nourished, if it is to retain its vigor. The girl must not be allowed to go off to the exhausting work of the day with a stomach half or wholly empty. Harm is sure to come of it, particularly to the brain.

Books and Bookmen

Don't go too far in your books and overgrasp yourself.
MARCUS AURELIUS

A portrait of Ralph Waldo Emerson will be placed in the new public library building in Boston. It is to be by D. C. French, an artist in Boston.

Lovers of poetry will welcome the volume of Maurice Thompson's poems which will shortly come from the Riverside Press. It will include the "Songs of Fair Weather," and poems written since that excellent little volume appeared.

The next volume in the series of American Men of Letters will be devoted to William Gilmore Simms, the distinguished Southern novelist. It is written by Professor Wm. P. Trent, of the University of the South.

"A Yard of Roses."

One of the popular paintings at the New York Academy of Design was a yard-long panel of Roses. A crowd was always before it. One art critic exclaimed, "Such a bit of nature should belong to all the people, it is too beautiful for one man to hide away."

The Youth's Companion, of Boston, seized the idea, and spent twenty thousand dollars to reproduce the painting. The result has been a triumph of artistic delicacy and color.

The Companion makes an Autumn gift of this copy of the painting to each of the five hundred thousand subscribers. Any others who may subscribe now for the first time, and request it, will receive "The Yard of Roses" without extra charge while the edition lasts.

Besides the gift of this beautiful picture all new subscribers will receive the Five Double Numbers and all the Illustrated Weekly Supplements. The price of the Companion is $1.75 a year.

Every family should take this brightest and best of illustrated literary papers.

President Carter of Williams College has written for the series of American Religious Leaders a biography of Mark Hopkins, former president of that college, and one of the wisest, noblest and most influential leaders America has ever produced.

Miss Cornelia Warren, daughter of the great paper manufacturer of Boston, Samuel D. Warren, has written a very bright and readable novel entitled "Miss Wilton," which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will publish immediately.

M. M. Ballou, who is widely known as one of the most observant of travellers, has just ready a new volume on "Equatorial America," describing several of the Antilles Islands and whatever is most interesting to readers concerning Brazil, Buenos Ayres, Chili and Peru.

Miss Jean Ingelow and her Work.

Miss Jean Ingelow, who lives with her brother at Kensington, has recently given a Woman's Herald interviewer some particulars of her career and work. In Summer she sits in a beautiful conservatory, from the garden behind which a view is obtained of the grand old trees in Holland Park. When the Winter comes Miss Ingelow retreats to the dining-room, where her writing occupies her some two or three hours in the morning, for "she only writes when the spirit moves her."

"Training," by the well-known athlete, Malcolm W. Ford, in Outing for February, contains many valuable hints for the aspirant to athletic fame, as Mr. Ford makes plain the methods by which he obtained great reputation.

Some of the finest reproductions of instantaneous photos ever published appear in an article on "Photography and Athletics," by W. I. Lincoln Adams, in Outing for February. They are marvelously sharp and typical and were produced from negatives by the expert, Mr. John C. Hemment.

The February Inland Printer has a magnificent engraving of the Columbian Fair grounds and waters as they will appear when completed. It is by far the very best representation yet put forth. From the World's Fair to dogs is a long way in one sense, but in this book it is only to turn over a leaf or two and we see a likeness of a Scotch Collie that would excite the envy of any fancier. While the other cuts are excellent, these are the gems. No reader can close this book without having an exalted sense of the dignity and value of the art of printing. To the printer it is invaluable. Chicago.

Number Lessons. A book for second and third year pupils by Charles E. White, Principal, Franklin School, Syracuse, N. Y. Boston, D. C. Heath & Co., 1892: 45 cents.

Mr. White has made a very good book. The very cover will please a child. As the book is a compilation of work done in the lower grades of the Syracuse Schools, and is thus the result of observations, it must be valuable. While no book can take the place of an old Warren Colburn there is a place for this. It comes very early in the child's life, and will make a good foundation for later work.

Dreams of the Dead by Edward Stanton, Boston. Lee & Shepard, 1892. Good Company Series, 50 cents.

Not since the departure of Edgar Allen Poe has there been gathered into one volume so much of the occult as this volume of 268 pages possesses. Readers of The Banner of Light and frequenters of Spiritual Seances will hail it as a new revelation. For those who love to dwell on the improbable, not to say impossible, this book will have a special charm, but to those who relish hearty meals three times a day and believe only what they can hear, see and feel, who find in terrestrial matters pleasures enough, the volume will be foolishness. Many a reviewer, of the earth, earthy, will say, "I can make nothing of this." It is Hypnotism, extenuated. It is a summation of Col. Orcott's and Madame Blavatsky's peculiar teachings. Just a little of the Fox Girl's rappings is introduced. Like Lumen in Flammara's books, the disembodied spirit can move as rapidly as thought. If readers ever give themselves an hour of thorough verbal dissipation, this is the book to indulge in. Begin its reading at 10.30 p.m. on a cold Winter's night. It will be read with zest to the end, and, ten to one, the reader will fancy himself out of the flesh before he finishes. His sensations may not be those which he had when he read Mr. Oldebe, or when he sat up, too late, to read Hugo's Haurs of Iceland, but it is safe to say he will find himself very sensitive to spiritual impressions, and if he doesn't see ghosts it will not be any fault of his. As to the theories advanced, they are to be taken just as the reader likes. Doubtless, it will have many readers, some of whom will find wisdom, others only an excellent example of mental and literary gymnastics.

"The Real Carlyle."

"It is not only in connection with his attitude to Ireland that the real Carlyle differed from some representations of him which have recently been current:

It has been a personal pain to me in recent times to find among honourable and cultivated people a conviction that Carlyle was hard, selfish, and arrogant. I knew him intimately for more than an entire generation, as intimately as one who was twenty years his junior, and who regarded him with unfeigned reverence as the man of most undoubted genius of his age, probably ever did. I saw him in all his moods and under the most varied conditions, and often tried his impatient spirit by dissent from his cherished convictions, and I found him habitually serene and considerate, never, as so many have come to believe of his ordinary mood, arrogant or impatient of contradiction.—Duffy.

Four articles in the March Atlantic can hardly fail to attract attention,—a story by Kate Douglas Wiggin entitled "A Village Watch-Tower;" a very bright essay on "The Children's Poets," by Agnes Repplier; "Doubts About University Extension," by Professor Geo. H. Palmer of Harvard; and "An Old English Township," by Rev. Brooke Herford.

The lectures on "The Evolution of Christianity," recently delivered at the Lowell Institute in Boston by Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, which has caused such a whirlwind of discussion, will be carefully revised by Dr. Abbott and then published in a volume by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, famous for the price she gets for her writings, lost just $13,000 in attempting to make a success of her latest play, "The Showman's Daughter."

Mrs. Humphrey Ward may well be supposed "the prey of mingled emotions" when she reads the hot-pressed criticism of a famous London authority that her new book, "David Grieve," produces the effect of "a series of praiseworthy and laborious shadows."

Hidden away in Galesburg, Ill., lives Mrs. Julia A. Carney, who, according to the writer in the Epoch, is the author of a little jingle perhaps as famous as was ever written. It is the one beginning "Little drops of water, little grains of sand," etc. She wrote the lines some fifty years ago, when she was Miss Julia A. Fletcher of Boston.

Wide Awake from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, Mass.

Something about Indians, something about horses, a page or two about Fulton and his steamboat, a shipwreck graphically told, a story of olden days, an old legend, and then the continued stories which all are following with so much interest, make one of the most entertaining magazines that comes to our table. Its price is $2.40 per year.

January's Artist Printer is just at hand. "A Journal for the Progressive," it fully sustains its title.

The need of an Apprenticeship System is set forth by A. C. Cameron. There is no doubt about the necessity. Wood Engraving is the subject of several pages of text and illustrations. The Chicago Daily News is set forth in an entertaining manner, filling six pages. The miscellaneous matter, with engraving, are fully up to the high standard at first raised by the publication. "How do you do" is too funny for anything. A pug puppy has been seated in a big goblet. Whether happy or miserable his face does not indicate, but it is funny to the beholder. Chicago, $1 a year.

Blaine's First Speech.

"There are but two statesmen in the world," says an old Californian, who admires the Plumed Knight, "and they are Gladstone and Blaine. I heard Blaine make his first speech over 55 years ago! Long time, isn't it? So it seems to me, but it was nearly 50 years ago, 'way back yonder in a little old log school house when we were both awkward, barefooted boys, that we were elected to speak our pieces one Friday afternoon. Scared? We were scared to death, and 'Jimmy' Blaine shook worse than I did. I can see him as though 'were yesterday; there he stood, barefooted, patched trousers and a linsey woolsey wamuses' buttoned tight around him; he dug the toes of his right boot into the ankle of his left, working and swinging his heel in a kind of semi-circle, while his hands twitched and hung like pounds of lead at his side. This is the way he bowed" (here the storyteller arose and bent himself as the big blade of a jackknife shuts), "and this is what he said as he gazed steadfastly at the ceiling:

"R-im, rim; p-i-n, pin;
L-f-p, lip; f-a-h, hat;
B-i-t, bit; s-t, sit;
J-o-b, job; s-o-d, sod; G-o-d, God."

"Another bow, and 'Jimmy' Blaine took his seat, stumbling as he did so against the old daub chimney made of sticks!"—Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

Thought Heaven out of Place.

Little Mary (who lives on the third floor of the Excelsior flats)—"Mamma, is heaven higher than this?"

"Yes, indeed, Mary."

"And when we die are we going to heaven?"

"I hope so, darling."

"Mamma, if we are real good maybe we can get to move down on the second floor when we die."—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Curious Corner.

The Monarchs of England Since the Conquest.

A POEM BY H. B. SWAN

First of his line—Norman William re-ign,
Then William Rufus, by Walt Tyrrill slain,
Next Beauclerk—Harry is the nation's choice,
Then deep I-lephen of the line of Hoel,
Next Hal the Saxon, tall, in his own island,
First Edward next, as fourth—Lain for Then Eadland John, who Magna Charta signed,
Then Hal the Third, of just but feeble mind,
Edward the first, renowned for power and piety,
Next Edward, who, in his life by castle died,
A Third King Edward wears the English crown,
Then second Edward soon by friends put down,
Then reigns fourth Henry, alias Bohingbroke,
Next madcap Hal, who forced on France his Sixth Henry sings through a troublous reign,
Fourth Edward next, incognito and vain,
Fifth Edward next, vanquished before his time,
Then crook-back Edward reigns his reign of crime,
Seventh Henry rules, for plodding avarice famed,
Then bluff King Harry—blame be to her name,
Sixth Edward reigns, crowned with too early days,
Then Mary next, alike of flora and praise,
Then Virgin Beas—high paragon of dames,
Then "high and mighty" Caledonian James,
Then Baby Charles the martyr's crown attains,
When cowles Oliveron more than reigns,
Next Charles the Second, "Merry Monarch" styled,
Then Second James, by friends and fate beguiled,
Dutch William claims his matrimonial winnings,
Next Anne reigns, half ruled by Sarah Jennings,
Four Georges reign—then Will, the sailor prince,
Last, good Victoria, monarch ever since.

The Wooden Indian.

I used to live in Spain, and afterward in the West Indies, before I came to the States. I met the wooden Indian long before I came to this country. I have been asked before where the wooden Indian got his start. I only know what I have heard about him in the Old World. There was an adventurer named Rutz, who left his old city, Barcelona, and came to Virginia 300 years ago. When he returned he executed the wooden Indian in a rude way as a type of the sort of animal he had met in the New World, and the figure was set up in front of a shop where wine was sold. Finally it became a sort of trademark. There were smokers in those days and they assembled around the Indian. And the wooden Indian is now seen in front of nearly every cigar store.—Interview in Chicago Tribune.

Some Synonyms.

The construction of the English language must appear most formidable to a foreigner. One of them looking at a picture of a number of vessels said: "See what a flock of ships!" He was told that a flock of ships was called a fleet, and that a fleet of sheep was called a flock.

And it was added for his guidance in mastering the intricacies of our language that "a flock of girls is called a bevy, that a bevy of wolves is called a pack, and a pack of thieves is called a gang, and a gang of angels is called a host, and a host of porpoises is called a shoal, and a shoal of buffaloes is called a herd, and a herd of children is called a troop, and a troop of partridges is called a covey, and a covey of beauties is called a galaxy, and a galaxy of ruffians is called a horde, and a horde of rubbish is called a heap, and a heap of oxen is called a drove, and a drove of blackguards is called a mob, and a mob of whales is called a school, and a school of wear-shippers is called a congregation and a congregation of engineers is called a corps, and a corps of robbers is called a band, and a band of locusts is called a swarm, and a swarm of people is called a crowd.—Boston Commercial.

A Business Woman's Lesson.

A business woman often takes letters and packages to the general postoffice to be weighed. As often as she has done that she has been impressed anew with the weak and trivial curiosity of the male mind. For every time she handed in something to be weighed the busy men in charge stopped to turn it over and read the address.

"It certainly beats anything," she said to herself, "to think of anything being as curious as that."

A few days ago she repeated this experience up to a certain point. The variation began when the examining magnate said cheerfully "He a good idea, wouldn't it, far you to put on here the state those papers is goin' to? Yes, certainly, I'll write it for you—Guess I've saved 500 bundles from being lost in the last three weeks, lookin' to see if they was directed all right. I don't bother about the men, don't care so much about their bundles, and then they've got more head for lookin' to such things, but I always look at the ladies' bundles. Ten cents." And the crushed business woman walked away with all the sad dignity she could master.—New York Sun.

Lay College.

A meeting is in prospect at the Y. M. C. A. in behalf of the Lay College at Revere. Further announcement will be made later.

Howard Brothers.

It is good news all around. Good that the business of card clothing has outgrown its present quarters and good that increased accommodations are to be found in this city. That brothers should dwell together in unity has been well illustrated in the case of this firm. It seems probable that their new location will be on a part of the Trumbull estate, bounded by Vine and Foundry Streets and the railroad. Every one rejoices that they have not yielded to the blandishments of other places, and that Worcester is good enough for them.

Burnside Building.

The fifth story of the structure is now ready for occupancy. There are fifteen excellent rooms for offices. All well lighted and heated, but the problem that is troubling the old tenants of the building is what is to be done of the old Burnside desk that has been so prominent a feature of the loft for the last few years. It has been moved from room to room, there is no upper loft for it now and there are too many associations connected with it to destroy it. Truly its future is uncertain. With the elevator handy, there are no better rooms in this city.

A Crazy Scrap.

A Story.

An honest confession, we have been told, is good for the soul. It may be, since all suffering is supposed to elevate humanity, and the confession I am about to make to my good sisters is far from enjoyable to the narrator. I am one of you—have, indeed, been one of you since the halcyon days of Tambourine Zingara, E. C. I., Emory and I others—when Aunt Patty still lived and Jean Earnest was among us, but who I am—where my name and what's my name, I dinna choose to tell. Enough that I tell you all this little story of a certain far away New Year's day, when I, a young wife and mother, heard words that are still ringing in my ears.

Do you see this crazy scrap? This rich, blue ribbon square caught into place with threads of shining gold—real bullion covered thread that will not tarnish for all Time's handling of this precious quilt—this is the one I mean—blue as the sky and shining and beautiful. Faded? Well, it may seem to you, dear friends, but to me it is new and ever will be—yes, time without end, perhaps—as bright and blue and radiant as it was when first my mortal eyes rested upon it, for I see now with my lesser material organs of vision, and nothing, to the spiritual sight, can change the color of that crazy scrap.

I had been brought up by my stepmother, a fussy, energetic, thorough-going woman, good enough to me in her own unsympathetic way. I now know: but it was a negative sort of kindness that allowed itself no positive proof of its existence. I grew very much to be like my good second mother as I advanced in years, assuming her virtues, if I had them not, until I was as careful of all mundane matters as if they were "the all of life to live," and the dusting of this speck, the polishing of that surface were of intense importance. Then I married. I was nineteen, a good-looking enough lassie, I remember the old clock mirror telling me, as I peeped into its depths to see if the parted hair were smooth and trim before Ned came knocking at the sitting-room door. The parlor was too fine to use. My own, dear, beautiful mother had been buried from that room, brother Jo had soon followed, and then sister Hattie had, years afterward, stood, blushing and sweet as a rose, before the immaculate, tall, white mantel, herself in robes as white and pure and snowy, and given her hand and heart to a stammering, incoherent young farmer, who lived through the trying ordeal—that was all. Dear, old John—when I go out to the farm nowadays and catch him trotting his three-year-old grandson on his knee, and note how his fine eyes light up with pleasure at my appearance and his hand reached out with a cordiality that is as sincere as it is delightful, I look at the good face, set now in its frame of soft white, and wonder if it is possible this grand old gentleman could ever have metamorphosed, butterfly like, from the stuttering young worm of the earth, who claimed our Hattie that far-away Summer's day.

I was left alone with my father's second wife, and, as I have said, grew, as children will, into a pretty fair imitation of herself; baking and brewing and scrubbing and hewing—until, when I had reached the age of nineteen, Ned came, and—well, there was another occasion to throw open the grand apartment that faced the road—and telling the people and place about an indifferent good-bye, I went away with Ned to the home he had made ready for me in the town.

I went on in the same old way, knowing no other or better mode of living, and devoted myself to the keeping of that small house, as if it were the only thing on earth to do. I saw that Ned—dear, amiable, old Ned, who never had a criticism to offer, and who was as amiable always as an angel, had comfortable surroundings, and his meals on time though the skies fell, and had no occasion to find fault with my housekeeping. That there was anything that he might not like never occurred to me. I was too busy to notice any signs of discontent—my eyes were blinded by the dust of my own raising, and I saw nothing clearly. I was a splendid servant for my husband those days, and that was all. He tried, at first, to get me to go with him to some lecture or concert, but I was not willing to go. I was too weary by evening to care to make the effort to dress and go the distance to the hall.

The years rolled on. Our son came to us one day in beautiful May, and grew and thrived and gladdened our hearts with his baby brightness, his infantile cleverness, his childish wisdom. I lost my indifference and grew absorbed in my precious youngling. There was nothing too nice for my Tom, and I spent days over his wardrobe, until with little outlet compared to that of others, my son was as well dressed as any boy in town. Time passed, and Tom started to school. This was to me both a joy and a sadness. I missed him, but I now had more time to devote to household affairs. Of myself I took no thought. I knew nothing but work, and drudgery never seemed drudgery to me, but just the only thing with which to occupy myself. I went nowhere, received few calls, for those who came at first had so often rung the door bell in vain, that they had ceased to try to enter the house, and left me in solitary possession. Ned grew to burying his face in the paper during the evenings, reading aloud if I cared to hear the news, which was seldom indeed. And so a few years more went by until Tom was eleven years old. Then, one memorable New Year's eve, the day dawned to which I have called your attention. Christmas had brought with it added work. The tree I had arranged for Tom had made me much trouble—popcorn would be dropped upon the floor, bits of paper from candies, lengths of string, and nut shells, and I found myself cleaning, cleaning, cleaning until I was ready to drop. On the day preceding that of the first of the year, I had managed to obliterate all traces of the confusion consequent upon Christmas, and was congratulating myself that so much bother would not ensue for another year, when, broom and feather-duster in hand, I, advancing toward the back stairs, caught the sound of childish voices. I recognized them instantly as belonging to my son and his playmate, a dear little fellow living with his widowed mother just across the street from us.

I smiled at the sound of the children's earnest voices—something evidently of quite a serious nature was occupying them. I smiled—and then, as the first distinct words greeted my ears—I—I leave you to imagine what I did.

"My mamma"—it was my Tom speaking—"my mamma don't ever comb her hair!"

"Honest?" quoth Tom's playmate.

"Well, it ain't smooth and shiny like your mamma's. And your mamma's dress is so tight and purty—I wish my mamma had a tight dress."

"Hain't she got any?"

"She's got some; but she never wears 'em only to go to the stores in. Your mamma wears 'em in the house, don't she, Bob?"

"Yes, you bet."

"I think (with a sigh that hurts me) your mamma is lovely."

"So do I."

"And if I could choose a mamma I'd have her justly exactly like youn. I'd have her wear a purty tight dress, and a white collar and white cuffs and a big bow 'o ribbon under her chin—just like youn. And comb her hair."

"And read to you—like mine does?"

"Yes and take me in her lap and talk to me; but I'd like the collar and ribbon the most. Say, Bob, what do you s'pose they cost—much?"

"Spect so. We could ask mamma. She knows everything."

"And when we know, I'll ask papa to give me just that much money to buy mamma a New Year's present with. He never loses me nothin'. And then we'll get your mamma to go with us to buy 'em, don't we, Bob?"

"You bet."

"But say, Bob, let's don't let your mamma know who we're buyin' 'em for. I'd rather not."

"All right. She'll never guess, 'cause o' course she thinks all mammas dresses up, she does. And your mamma'll be as purty as mine, all fixed up with her hair combed."

"D'you think so, Bob? And won't papa be s'prised? And if your mamma'd only come and see her and be good acquainted—"

"She will. She never come before 'cause some one told her 'at your mamma never come to the door when anybody rung, 'cause she's never fit to be seen, and don't want company around to bother her nohow. But I'll fetch her."

"Sh! Listen!" and Tom whispered something that I couldn't catch as I, my blood boiling in my veins, my heart cold and aching, my whole soul aghast at the blinding, sudden light of comprehension turned full upon me by the hands of my little child, reeled into the kitchen and fell heavily upon a hard wooden chair.

"If he could choose—if he could choose he would not choose me! I am not pretty—I—I! but my sobs choked me, and all at once I began to despise myself and the poor, impoverished, well-meaning, but almost useless life I had led. I had always had so much to do, that I had allowed my personal appearance to grow to be a thing of nothing to me. So the house was tidy, Tom and Ned decently clothed, what mattered aught else? I had grown to believe that my husband and my son had accepted the situation as one for which there was no help, and had loved me as I was, blouse-waist, tumbled hair, mopstick and all! But here was Tom choosing another style of mother—one who did not wait until after supper to brush up a bit—and Ned—Ned—no, no, no—Ned was my own dear Ned still—faithful, honest and my own! I fought the awful feeling at my heart, but the demons of doubt would assail me again and again. I sat and stared into the kitchen fire, seeing it go out under my own eyes, yet, for once in my whole life, caring nothing. A thousand hideous fancies darted through my brain, and I waged war with them, and called out to them, and when Ned came home I was hot with a terrible fever, and crawling into bed, allowed my husband to get what supper he could for Tom and himself.

Next morning—New Year's day—the fever was all gone. As I felt a bit languid, however, Ned insisted upon doing as he'd be done by and himself proposed getting breakfast. So he arose in his good natured might and left me snug among the pillows, with time in which to reflect and make the new resolves that he was pouring in upon me from some blessed source, things of reality. As each resolve came forward and stood before me awaiting commendation and acceptance, I felt my heart grow lighter and happier, my life seemed suddenly to expand, future possibilities grew alluringly beautiful, and I seemed, as it were, new born into a new and glorious world! I had just taken a mental view of my new self, when the pattering of small feet aroused me from my most delicious reverie, and there by my bedside, staid Tom, a paper parcel in his hand—a parcel which he placed upon my pillow—the contents of which parcel I knew—by heart!

"New Year's gift, mamma! And here's yours!" cried Tom, and, kissing my boy and cuddling him close within my arms, I felt that, for me, a new year was indeed beginning. "Yes, mamma's better, Tom, thank God, and is going to get up now and help you enjoy papa's breakfast. Just smell that coffee, Tom, isn't it fragrant? And, oh, I almost forgot—I want you to run across the street and ask Bob and his mamma to eat dinner with us—tell her that our turkey is a monster and that it won't be safe for less than five to attack him—"

"Oh, mamma!"
 "And say that we dine at two, dear—"
 "A real company dinner, mamma? hooray!" Down stairs dashes Tom full of glee, and I, feeling strong, now, and ready for the day's work, spring from bed and fall to brushing my soft, thick hair, until it consents to lie in smooth shining masses about my head. I then do a gown that fits snugly about me, and turning to my son's parcel, open it and—lo, there is a dainty linen collar and a pair of cuffs to match, as white as snow, two pretty cut buttons of mother of pearl, and a yard of blue silk ribbon, fresh and bright and crisp as the blue, unclouded Winter sky itself!

Some minutes later, and just as I enter one door, Tom bounds in at the other. Catching sight of me his face changes as must the face of mortal change when he puts on the glory of immortality—yes, even so much as that; for a radiance shines from his glad, gray eyes, his face grows transfigured with an unnamable emotion, and, with a cry of delight, he rushes toward me, and clasping me in his young arms, holds me in a long, silent embrace.

Then does Ned appear upon the scene—poor, patient, long suffering Ned—and I beg your forgiveness—but some things are beyond the telling!

And now do you wonder that, for me, this crazy scrap can never, never fade?

Concerning Candy.

Don't, if you eat candy at night, go to bed without brushing your teeth; the neglect of this causes the teeth to decay.

Don't eat cheap candy; insist upon this, and prefer one-half pound of good pure (and by five pounds of poor, chemically colored, glucose sweetened stuff.

A "Tech" Boy.

An esteemed correspondent from Madison, Wis., calls from a Chicago paper an item which he very kindly forwards to LIGHT, as it has a bearing on a young man who spent a part of his school days here.

The Inter Ocean of Jan. 28th has a picture and sketch of Charles F. White, who is the consulting engineer of the Society for the Prevention of Smoke. Mr. White when in the Polytechnic, catalogued under Brookline and was graduated in 1875. In the last Catalogue of the last institute, he was put down as a member of the Dunkirk Engineering Company of Dunkirk, N. Y. From that position he has gone to the City of Smoke, i. e., Chicago, to see what he can do towards making that same city presentable at the Columbian Fair.

It seems that Mr. White is an expert in the problem of smoke consumption. He was for six years superintendent of the Manual Training School in St. Louis, and there began the study of this subject. He is not a theorist but he adapts his remedies to the particular case in hand. If our former "Tech" man can do anything to make Chicago less smoky and sooty, he will certainly merit a deal of praise from his old friends in this city.

Company C. of the 36th.

Ninth of prettier has come to LIGHT in many a day, than the invitation to the third annual family reunion which is to take place Friday afternoon and evening Feb. 2. The reception committee consists of Mrs. Fred W. Wellington, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. H. Mills, Mr. and Mrs. Fred W. Briggs, Mr. and Mrs. Charles T. Hottomly, Mr. and Mrs. I. dwin Scaries, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Rice. The reunion will be held in A. R. Hall, the scene of so many delightful army reunions. The program has the name and residences of all our living members of the Company, including some of the least known details in Worcester. The committee of arrangements includes Maj. E. T. Raymond, Fred W. Briggs, A. B. Whipple, Charles W. Wood, Luke K. Davis, F. dwin Scaries, John A. Rice is Secretary of the Association.

A Picnic in Cuba.

FOR WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

"What shall be done on the 22d, we must celebrate the day in some way, or we shall disgrace our country?" There was a long pause, no one cared to propose anything, unless it was something interesting. We were a party of Americans stopping at a sugar plantation, in Itabo, Cuba, and fifty miles from Havana. Our nearest neighbors were on the next plantation, twelve miles distant. Thus we found our means of making a spread rather limited. Suddenly Jack gave a loud whistle and exclaimed, "Why not go on a picnic down to the Lema." "Jack you are a jewel," we said, "that is just the thing." When some of the party inquired what the Lema was, young Don Promone thought we were very stupid not to know that it was a splendid river and was named Lema because of the wild lime trees that grow on its banks.

It was about fifteen miles distant, narrow and shallow in the dry season, but in the Summer when the rains come it turned into a rushing torrent. The young Don volunteered to invite all the nearest white neighbors. Our next question was, what shall we carry for dinner, for we knew to our sorrow, that there was no bread, no cake, no pie, as they are unknown articles of food almost, outside of the large hotels, as flour and yeast will not keep in that climate and they have no stoves and no butter. Although there were plenty of cows on the plantation, the cream would turn to oil in the attempt to churn it. No cheese, no sandwiches, no pickles, no cold tongue, no oysters and no roast clams! We were in despair, but our hostess only laughed and said, "never mind we will take our cook along, she can fix up something." We said no more, but we had our doubts all the same.

On the morning of the 22d, we were awakened about five o'clock by the chamber-maid bringing in coffee, for it is the Cuban custom to take a cup of coffee before getting up in the morning, as nine or ten o'clock is the breakfast hour. We started about six o'clock, as the heat is so intense in the middle of the day that the travelling is all done in the cool of the morning or evening. We wished our friends in New York might have had a peep at our procession as we started; first, was a team or rather a yoke of oxen hitched to a large cart, one used in drawing sugar-cane to the mill. In this were seated the cook—a fat black woman, weighing about two hundred pounds—and a table girl, young and pretty. This fancy-team was driven by Pontleon, who was a slave and a character in his way. He was the very blackest black man we had ever seen. He wore an old red Tam O' Shanter on his head, an old pair of cotton pants, an old shirt left entirely unconfined at the waist which we called Pontleon's flag of truce for whenever he was scolded, he would stand still and twist and roll it in every shape he could with one hand, while with the other he would pull at a long loop of wool that hung over his eyes. Next to the cart was the volante, a large two-wheeled carriage drawn by two horses attached to the pole that was about fifteen feet long. The driver was seated astride the left horse; he was dressed in dark-blue and red livery with brass buttons.

Those of the party that did not care to go in the volante went on horse back. Some of the party could not speak a word of Spanish, some others did not know a bit of English, others again were at home in both languages. Such a laughing, chattering time as we had! The scenery was new to the most of us; the pure morning air was full of the fragrance of the orange blossoms hanging in deep contrast with the dark green leaves, among which were flocks of the orange-birds getting their breakfast from the ripest of the fruit. They were a pretty sight, being a shining black with a bright yellow spot on each wing, but they are a great pest to the orange grower as they will eat all the finest fruit on a tree in a few minutes. On we went past cane fields, where the field hands were already at work, then through avenues of tall palm trees, then past some overseers' cabin, surrounded by its plantation patch and close to the bohies or cabins of the negroes; then through fields of stumpy palms, then past fragrant coffee plantations, how we did enjoy it. It was all so new and strange to our Yankee eyes.

Sometimes we (I mean we Americans) would find our horses going directly opposite from the way we wished to go, then the shouts of laughter from our friends would make us remember that we ought to have pulled the left rein of our horse's bridle if we wished him to turn to the right (they told me that was the way the Cuban horse is trained). They had many a hearty laugh at my expense before I could remember that my left hand meant my right to my Cuban steed.

When we reached the Lema we found it a narrow cool river, with high banks, plenty of shade and abundance of bright-colored flowers, but we missed the green grass, rocks and stones of our own country. The grass there was dry and parched as it is at home in August after droughts. We soon had our hammocks hung up, and prepared to enjoy ourselves. The large laurel and mahogany trees gave a dense shade that was very refreshing as the sun was getting very hot. Many of the tall trees were festooned with long gray moss that hung down to the ground and took root; the oleander tree grows wild and sometimes attains a great height and its blossoms mingle with those of the pride of India, which next to the palm, I thought the most beautiful tree in Cuba. Its leaves are light green and the flowers lavender-colored. The wild lime trees were in full blossom and mingled their colors with those of the cinnamon tree. Excepting in California, we had never seen nature in such profuseness and, not even there had we seen such gorgeous colors. The screaming parrots, the bright plumed birds, made us think the old Spanish saying true, in Cuba the birds have no song, the flowers no perfume. Aside from the coffee-plant, the orange-blossom and the blooming cereus, the flowers had but little fragrance. Right glad we were to hear the summons to dinner, and we Northerners opened our eyes in surprise, such a feast as we saw before us. The hostess pleasantly inquired if we thought we could make out to eat some lunch. In the center of the table was a large vase filled with orange blossoms, this was surrounded by oranges, bananas, pine-apples, dulcies and olives. Then came roast chickens, roast duck, sweet potatoes baked in hot ashes, fried fish, boiled rice, fried plantains, guava jelly, tamarinds, the most delicious coffee we ever tasted, lemonade, Spanish wines and other dishes, the names of which were all unknown to us. To simply say that the food tasted good is too mild a term. Mammy Nana, as the cook was called, stood by with a broad smile on her fat face, as she and her attendant helped the hungry crowd to the tempting food. "I know what you white folks like," she said. "I see ben Norff myself. Here Senora, take mo dis chicken, I want all dis here food dun eat up, I don't take none of dis here truck back in dat cart."

Could the shade of the great Washington have stood by and have seen our efforts to eat in his honor, he would have covered his face and whispered, "Rash mortals." After dinner, we asked Mammy Nana how she cooked her nice dinner without a fire. "You Senoras come, I shows you where I cook." She led the way to a low place in the bank of the river, there we saw several glowing heaps of charcoal. "Dere chillins, I cooked all dem victuals right dere. Pontleon, he pulls the feathers, skin and all right off dem chickens, then he roasts them right dere over that fire on dem sticks you see. Dem air charcoal-fires air heap better dan your Noaff stoves. I have ben Norff honey I knows." We rode home by the loveliest moon-light, so bright we could see to read as we rode along. We thought of our friends in America, on five days' journey away, wrapped in Winter clothing and furs, and we in thin garments, straw hats and slippers. There seemed to us no such thing as snow and ice; we felt then as if life could be one long bright dream, in that beautiful island, the Gem of the Sea; and as we parted for the night, we all said it would be long before we should forget our picnic in Cuba, on Washington's birthday. Oxford.

Probably there is not in the state of Massachusetts a prettier village than this. Such a broad, level, main street! Had Goldsmith seen this, he had forborne his praises of a certain hamlet further north. LIGHT took a brief run down to Oxford last Saturday, just to see certain C. A. R. friends, but the village afforded so much more pleasure than was expected that this much mention must be made of the place in Winter. Its Summer outlook has long been lauded but nothing could be lovelier than the white outspread of one week ago.

Then there are some of the very best of people there. L. C. Thayer keeps the typical village store and a good one. Unfortunately, Comrade Thayer has had a full run of La Grippe in all its nefarious phases. He is better now, however. Quartermaster Leary doesn't like the snow because it impedes navigation. Comrade Yeomans and others are rejoicing over the election of J. K. Churchill to the command of the Department. Albert Tyler is still "sticking" type and getting out his Oxford Mid-Weekly. If one could only live in Oxford what more could he desire?

Knowledge is no burthen.

Forty Years Ago.

There have been 22d of February celebrations for many a year and away down the coming years, the line extends, but there was an event on that day in Worcester in 1842 which was of far more than ordinary interest. The Worcester City Guards, then young and known as the Worcester Guards, issued the following invitation.

"Military Ball. The managers solicit the favor of your company at Brinley Hall, on Tuesday evening, February 22d, 1842.

Capt. George Hobbs	Managers	Sergt. C. Blanchard
Lieut. E. Pool		L. Lincoln Newton
Lieut. S. B. Conklin		Luther Slater
Sergt. H. Gould		Samuel Hathaway
Sergt. E. G. Pratt	gers.	Edwin Eaton
Sergt. J. S. Coes		Samuel Lees.

A carriage will call at 6 o'clock.

An early answer is recorded, addressed to S. Hathaway, Worcester, Feb. 1, 1842."

In a volume owned by a prominent citizen of Worcester, are preserved the answers to these invitations. They include both declinations and acceptances. What a breath from the past they bring to us! Many, nay the most of those who danced on that festive eve, have long slept the sleep that knows no waking. Many a gallant Guard who led the march in 1842 was the brave leader of equally brave followers in 1861-5. Death, the great leveler has been at work, and rich and poor, old and young, men and women, the most of the merry throng on that festal night have gone to the hereafter.

Today, we are not interested as to whether Miss — accepted or not but the list gives us a good notion of how our mothers wrote and just who the dancers were, fifty years ago. To the Worcester of 1842, these names are many of them complete enigmas save when we sit down by some one whose memory is filled with accurate pictures of the long ago. He may tell us whether these folks are alive or dead. The names are

When this ball took place, the Guards were only two years old. Formed for political reasons, much rancor still existed between them and the Light Infantry. Very likely, many of the regrets from foregoing names were induced by fealty to members of the town's other company.

Of the twelve Guards who made up the managers, seven at least have passed on, viz., George Hobbs, who was the Second Captain, Livetts. Pool and Conklin, Sergt. Blanchard, Privates Newton, Slater and Eaton.

There are 150 names of fair ladies who responded favorably or unfavorably. Many of them will be recognized, at once, as those of people still living in Worcester or recently deceased. Others, however, whose names were changed in marriage have quite disappeared from the Directory of the day. Of the Town of Worcester, seven years before becoming a city, they were representative names. They included a large share of the old families and very clearly indicate the social standing of the Guards. Some represented girls in their early teens; others were those of mature matrons, all were those of the best city afforded. There is hardly an old family name omitted.

The book into which these letters were bound, by the way, a most valuable notion on Samuel Hathaway's part, is marked on the back, in gilt letters "Billet Doux." On all sorts of paper, in all kinds of ink, in penmanship from bad to elegant the collection is a treasured memory of years ago. It should be treated with the veneration that is always due to age.

It is in place to state who some of the ladies were and what is under obligations to a gentleman whose mind retains most clearly the names and faces of that period. The Misses Tenney were daughters of Jos. A. Tenney, who was a wholesale liquor dealer.

One of the Misses Wheeler became Mrs.

Henry H. Gird and so mother of Capt. Jos. W. Gird, killed at the Wilderness. These sisters in the same year, 1842, made a beautiful flag and presented it to the Light Infantry. The company marched over to Summer Street where Mrs. Gird still lives, and Captain Conk lin received it with an appropriate speech. It is in keeping today, as bright as ever.

Miss Fenno became Mrs. N. G. Tucker. The Misses Ilead were sisters of a young lawyer then in the city.

Mrs. Seymour and Miss Eaton were daughters of Nathaniel Eaton, who lived in the old mansion at the foot of George Street, now the oldest house on Main Street.

Sarah J. Bowers was the daughter of a hat ter who had been a British soldier. She was, first, Mrs. Henry Eaton and afterwards Mrs. Moneypenny of New York.

Miss Miller was a sister of the late Henry W. Miller.

Mary and the Misses Higelow were daughters of Alajah Higelow, Judge of Probate.

Osgood Bradley was the father of the Misses Bradley, of whom one, Elizabeth, married George Hamilton, the other John B. Wyman, who was killed during the war, while in command of a Western regiment.

Miss E. Burnett became Mrs. Marshall Flagg.

The Misses Perry were daughters of Emory Perry a famous singing master.

Miss Kettell was the daughter of John Kettell, the hatter.

Mrs. Howen was the wife of the first captain of the Guards.

Miss Wheeler was a daughter of Wm. A. Wheeler, the noted manufacturer.

Caroline Ward, a daughter of Colonel Artemas Ward.

Miss Rogers, a daughter of the long time editor of Aegis.

The Misses Pratt lived in the old Bancroft mansion on Salisbury Street.

Miss M. A. Eager, a teacher, married and went west.

Catharine Lazell, one of the city's most honored teachers.

Miss Brigham lived in Northville.

The Misses Vose resided just opposite Rural Cemetery on Grove Street.

Mrs. Trumbull, wife of George A. Trumbull, cashier of the Citizens' Bank.

The Burts lived on the corner of Elm and Chestnut Streets.

Mrs. E. Conant, wife of the late Edwin Conant, Esq.

The Stowells lived on Park Street.

Miss Charlotte Lincoln was a relative of the Governor. She was an excellent singer.

Mrs. Claffin, wife of the subsequently noted New York merchant, Horace B. Claffin.

Miss S. Butman, daughter of Deacon Benjamin, after whom the Butman Block is named.

Miss E. H. Bangs lived on Main Street, opposite the Court House.

Mrs. C. Allen, wife of the famous Judge Charles Allen.

Mrs. M. Bigelow, Jr., was a sister of Samuel Hathaway.

Mrs. Thomas was the wife of Judge B. F. Thomas.

Miss Stiles, a sister of the late Charles Stiles.

There were three Misses Puffer, daughters of Seth Puffer.

Milmarth was a teacher.

Mrs. Phillips, wife of Ivers Phillips, now in Colorado.

Miss S. A. B. Bancroft was a sister of the late Professor of Brown University.

Mrs. Bliss, wife of the late Harrison Bliss.

The book gives no token of the party itself when

"There was a sound of revelry by night," but the care taken of the replies is convincing proof of the success of the Guard's undertaking and, as in Belgium's Capital, no doubt

"Soft eyes looked love to eyes which spake again,
And all went merry as a marriage bell."

Over that evening there was no cloud of death dealing war, but it came later and, men and women, they learned that, all of military life does not consist in wearing uniforms and dancing to delicious music. But when the storm came none could be braver, bolder, truer than the hearts which, on Washington's birthday, 1842, exulted,

"When music arose with its voluptuous swell."

They were happy then. If living, let us hope that they are happy now; if dead, that their lives won for them restful, peaceful immortality.

"Leaves Have Their Time to Fall."

"In this city, 12th, Mabel Jones Stone, eldest daughter of Arthur M. and Mary L. Stone, 21 years, 5 months and 20 days."

Every day our papers contain announcements of death. The most of the names are those of strangers and we read the items with something akin to indifference. Again we see a name which excites in us the utmost attention and we greedily read every word concerning the same for we knew the one who bore it and a flood of recollection comes over us as we realize that, for this life, all is over.

Thus it was, one week since, when our community was startled by the knowledge that the daughter of one of Worcester's most respected citizens had suddenly died. Herself, one of a wide circle of friends and acquaintance, no similar announcements for many a day had carried with it more of sorrow or grief. To many the news was doubly surprising, for they not only had not heard of her illness, they did not know that she had returned from her western visit.

Many friends are saying, "How well I remember Mabel. She was always so bright and cheerful. I shall always recall her face wreathed in smiles." In home, school and church, she was ever cheerfulness itself. Passing through the lower grades, she was a High School graduate, Class of '88, Classical Course, going thence to Wellesley College. In her High School days she made many friends among teachers and pupils. In these days, she was considered one of the best musicians in the class and she wrote the music for the Class Poem. The air was unusually good and doubtless many a classmate, since her death, has sung over the opening lines of the poem,

"As the sunset's golden splendor,
Casts long shadows on the day,
And the landscape fading, dying,
Into darkness far away."

and has thought of the close of day that came so early to this young life, "fading" not into darkness but into the endless light of immortality.

Her life in Wellesley, so far as pleasant associations and impressions were concerned, was a repetition of that in the High School. Music was there her specialty and when she left the college in 1891, it was with the expectation of pursuing the art under the instruction of Boston teachers.

Then came the long and pleasant journey to the West, her father's meeting her in Chicago, and her return to Worcester. She reached here Wednesday, the 3d inst. and her apparent health was the frequent remark of her friends. Friday she became ill and the doctor was summoned. The way was steadily downward to the end, her case completely baffling the medical attendants.

Monday at 2 p.m. her father's house was crowded with sympathizing friends, schoolmates and teachers; those whom she had known in her church relations and others came to look upon her face once more and to hear her pastor, Dr. Mears, speak words of comfort.

The Piedmont Quartette, consisting of Messrs. Shirley and Hyde, Misses Flagg and Houghton sang, "Lead Kindly Light" "Father, we come to Thee" and "Home Land." The Rev. W. G. Tuttle, father of one of the Wellesley teachers, read the Scripture lessons. After which Dr. Mears spoke very feelingly concerning the life and thoughts of the deceased. She had expressed to her father a determination to be more devoted to church work. In the blissful hereafter very likely there's work for her to do. A very touching memory of Mabel was a volume of Thomas Kempis' Imitation of Christ. A Christmas present, it appears that she had read it diligently and had marked many passages thus making it almost a message from her to her friends. The company that filed by her remains of her, known so well in life, was a fearful one, bearing witness to the love and esteem in which she was held. Clad in white, surrounded by many floral tributes, it did not seem that she was arrayed for the tomb.

The bearers were E. H. Warren, William Manns, Alfred Kirke, Lewis W. Dunton, Everett S. Jones and A. J. Bassett and the burial in Hope Cemetery.

From the bunch of twenty-one white rose buds, at the entrance, to the white dove that hung above the casket, white predominated. From school and college mates, from neighbors and friends the floral offerings were beautiful and profuse.

"This is the end of earth," but her life, though brief, in its unselfishness, has left lessons that must tell in time and eternity.

A large portion of this bustling city has been hushed in sympathy with the stricken household. This one touch of Nature has made us all kin.

What to do.

If the world seems cold to you,
Kindle fires to warm it,
Let their comfort hide from view,
Winters that deform it.
Hearts as frozen as your own
To that radiance gather;
You will soon forget to mean,
"Ah! the cheerless weather."

A Living Spring.

BY CORNELIA WESSON BOYDEN.

Lo! In the heart of forest's tangled shade,
And hid where glint of sunshine never strayed,
So hushed by wild bird's song and plaintive cry,
And a murmuring voice winds swiftly passing by,
A captive barred from all that made life bright,
A tiny spring lay buried from the light.

No human soul knew aught of where it slept,
No human eye a guard o'er it had kept;
Nor truer had feverish lip its thirst allayed,
Or on the ear its crystal music played;
None dream'd of it, or gave it thought or care,
But yet God knew that spring so pure was there.

And when the hour had come, the spring, grown strong,
Burst forth and through the forest rushed along,
And heeded naught that crossed or marred its way,
But strengthened in its progress day by day,
Till broader, deeper, purer, swift and grand,
It spread a blessing through the verdant land.

So if within a soul lies buried deep
A living spring, that long in quiet sleep
Had only dreamed of power, if God should say,
"Awake! burst forth! dost know 'tis break of day,
And thou hast much to do ere 't is night shall fall?"
Shall not that soul make answer to that call?

And with its human strength strive long and well
To do its work and break the coward spell
That kept it back, afraid to do or dare!
Ah! He who holds us all within his care,
Who placed that spring within that human soul,
Will guide it: safe and sure unto its goal.

Monuments.

The committee of the Society of the Army of the Tennessee, which has in charge the collection of a fund for the erection in Washington of a statue to the memory of General William Tecumseh Sherman, has issued an appeal which is promulgated by Commander-in-Chief Palmer of the Grand Army.

An equestrian statue of Gen. G. B. McClellan is to be placed in front of the government building in Philadelphia. It is to be of bronze, H. J. Ellicott being the sculptor.

At the late G. A. R. Encampment in Boston, the matter of a monument to the memory of General Grant in Washington was broached. It will be brought up before the National Encampment in Washington. His old soldiers ought to build it.

Naval School.

If Ralph Earle passes his examinations for admission to the Naval School and he undoubtedly will, he will be one of the happiest middies who ever entered that institution. He is a son of Stephen C. Earle, the architect, and is now in the High School, but he has ever had a longing for these. One year ago, he took a midwinter trip to Cuba on a sailing vessel. This Annapolis course will place him on the pinnacle of happiness.

If by any means, he should fail to get in, a very bright second stands ready to try in the person of Walter Clark of Chestnut Street.

An Example From History.

Freddy (studying American History) — "Papa, is there anything in what people say about thirteen being an unlucky number?"
Old Suggs (English by birth)—"Yes, it seems so."

Freddy—"Well, how was it the Union was so lucky? It commenced with thirteen colonies."
Old Suggs—"Oh—er—that was unlucky for King George."

Marie.

Marie was born in the city of Worcester, Mass., on the 10th of June, 1855. She was educated in the common schools of her native city. She was married to Mr. H. H. Ames, on the 10th of June, 1875. They have three children, two sons and one daughter. She is a member of the Worcester Female Society, and of the Worcester Female Aid Society. She is also a member of the Worcester Female Musical Society. She is a devoted wife and mother, and is well known in her native city for her many good deeds.

Mr. H. H. Ames

After an illness of five weeks Mr. H. H. Ames died at his home on Oak Avenue, Tuesday evening. He was born in Holland, Miss., and was nearly seventy years of age at the time of his death. He had long been one of the city's most active business men, having come here in 1837. For some time he was foreman in the Court Mills, and, after various occupations, in 1859 undertook the furniture business at 223 Main Street which he sold out in 1881 to Mr. Henry Walker. Since then, he has followed real estate brokerage at 85 Main Street.

He leaves a widow and four children. Two daughters of his first wife are Mrs. L. C. Leathers and Mrs. George Paige. His city and two sons by his second wife, Of these, H. H. Ames, Jr., was graduated from the High School last year.

He was a Past Grand Master of (Worcester) Lodge, I. O. O. F., was a member of the Worcester Encampment of Working Men's Lodge, F. & A. M., of Worcester Royal Arch Chapter; of the Iron Hall of Worcester Lodge Knights of Honor of Pearl Lodge, Knights and Ladies of Honor; and was Supreme Grand Trustee of the Non-Secret Fraternity Order.

The funeral, under the direction of the Odd Fellows takes place, today, at the Church of the Unity.

Mr. Ames will be missed from our community as a reliable progressive citizen.

At the meeting of Post 11, Thursday night, it was decided to give Comrade James K. Churchill, recently elected commander of the Department, a reception.

April 13th comes the twenty fifth anniversary of the Post and plans are already forming for an adequate observance of so important an event.

Yesterday afternoon Naam's Lodge, Daughters of Rebekah, held a fair in Odd Fellows Hall 11 Pleasant Street. In the evening there was a leap year party, supper was served and there was dancing. The committee of arrangements were Mrs. H. H. Ames, Mrs. A. P. Lagg, Mrs. J. H. Martin, Mrs. C. I. Ongley and Mrs. O. M. Savels.

A BILLION AND A HALF.

The above is estimated to be the amount due to heirs of unclaimed estates in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France and Germany. The heirs are supposed to be chiefly in the United States, descendants of people who crossed the ocean years ago. You who read this are sanely requested to correspond with the undersigned, if your people came from across the sea. Remember that a letter to this country requires a five cent stamp. Broiled oysters are dipped in melted butter, seasoned lightly with salt and pepper and broiled on an oyster-broiler over a clear fire for two minutes on each side. They are especially delicious with maitre d'hotel sauce; or, if you prefer a simpler dish, serve them with fresh, sweet butter and slices of lemon.

Undoubtedly the best method of cooking rice is to cover it well with water and set it in a moderate oven, stirring it occasionally. When nearly done and the water mostly absorbed, milk may be added if desired, making a very good dish. Or the water may be omitted and it may be cooked entirely in milk, using the same proportions of milk and rice as for a pudding, but omitting the sugar.

The lower part of the leg of veal, called the knuckle, is especially good for white soup. The leg itself can be roasted whole for a large family, but affords several pieces, the fillet being the nicest. This fillet is simply a piece of solid meat from the upper part of the leg, and can be larded and stuffed or merely roasted plain. The neck and breast are used chiefly for stewing.

A potato will possibly always be a potato, but fried potatoes may be several different things, varying with the intelligence of the cook. If, as some doctors declare, "Mischief lurks in the frying pan," they probably mean in homes where the definition of the verb "to fry" is to "soak in grease." The vegetable we present suffers heavily in the general condemnation. Given the conditions of pure lard, and a hot fire to insure a quick browning, the capabilities for harm are somewhat lessened; but it is a pity that in so many kitchens the sphere of the potato is narrowed, vibrating only from boiled to fried with monotonous regularity. The same potatoes, thinly sliced and placed in an earthen dish, each layer covered with a slight sprinkling of flour, together with bits of butter, a seasoning of onion, salt and pepper, and the whole nearly covered with milk, will, after two hours' baking in a hot oven, come forth a tempting-looking, wholesome dish.—Good Housekeeping.

Panned Oysters.

Drain the oysters free from all liquor, put them in a colander, and allow one or two quarts of cold water to simply run through them. Have ready a sheet-iron pan hissing hot. Throw in the oysters, shake for a moment, and to each fifty add two ounces of butter, one-half teaspoonful of salt, and a palatable seasoning of pepper. With a wooden spoon stir until they boil, and serve immediately.

I always prefer water to milk in cakes that are not rich in butter. It, to my mind, makes a more delicate cake. Milk is liable to toughen in cooking, especially the crust, while water being neutral makes the crust soft and delicate. When I say add water gradually I do mean, of course, so gradually the butter will not break. This takes a long time; but if beating is done rapidly, it makes a better cake.
MRS. RORER.

In make up: Most baking powders contain ammonia or alum. Cleveland's does not; not a particle.

In strength: A rounded spoonful of Cleveland's does better work than a heaping spoonful of any other.

In results: Cake made with Cleveland's is fine grained and keeps fresh Fashions.

Baby girls wear bonnet hoods which usually match the pelisse in color, and are very pretty in plush linen and cream, white or soft pink and fitted with full white border. Charming little white woolen bonnets of the Granny shape, the front relieved with silk and the usual border, are sold at a much less cost than they could be made at home, and finished in a superior manner. Fashion naturally dictates in infants' clothing, and outfitters are bound to show novelties, even for such tiny customers, but the mother who studies her child will select only the most simple shapes and gain the smart effect by the materials and trimmings which she selects.

Anybody buying a muff will show great wisdom in getting one as large as is consistent with one's size. Just remember that it is much easier to have a large muff made smaller than to have a small one made larger. This is repeated for the benefit of the woman who is buying her muff late in the season.

The ring that is chosen as a present from a young girl to her betrothed is a chain one of platinum and gold, with a true lover's knot just on top. It must not be a stiff chain, but one that when taken off the finger falls in a little heap, if she doesn't wish to impress him with the fact that her chains are hard ones.

Shaded or changeable silk continues to be liked for blouse waists to be worn in the house. They are made quite simple, and have as their only decoration collar, cuffs and belt of velvet. A very pretty one showing green and scarlet in the silk has these adjuncts of moss-green velvet.

Mrs. Ward McAllister is an exceedingly brilliant, well-versed woman. In a pleasant chat in her own house she said: "So much is said about dress, and style, and form galore, which a true lady should possess, that the ultimate and foundation qualities of a true lady are entirely ignored. My idea of a true lady is one whose reigning characteristic is thoughtfulness for others. Who does not annoy anyone with whom she is on good terms. Who is discreet, as well as personally honorable. Who refrains from the unconventional things which cause her friends uneasiness, and her enemies food for scandal."

Bengaline has quite taken the place of faille. The newest has a thick and decided cord, and has been brought out under the name of Tyrolienne. Satin remains the most fashionable fabric for wedding gowns.

An authority in matters of feminine adornment insists that it always pays to give more for a becoming dress. Hasty choice usually results in a gown that one grows tired of in a few weeks, whereas a really becoming dress is not thrown aside until it falls to pieces.

Dressing-gowns are more shapely than they used to be. The favorite material is colored flannel,—old rose, pink, blue, heliotrope, gray or terra cotta, patterned with flowers or stripes in contrasting shades. Some of the newest flannels are made in Paisley shawl patterns.

Gargles for Sore Throats.

An excellent gargle is made of one tablespoonful of cayenne pepper, half a cup of boiling vinegar and three teaspoonfuls of salt. Mix well together, and when settled strain. Gargle the throat every half hour. Any one subject to sore throat of any kind will find a certain cure and preventive in the daily use of salt and water as a gargle.

Burnt Camphor.

The fumes of burnt camphor will instantly relieve a cold in the head. Put a piece of camphor the size of an egg in an old saucer. Set it on fire, and after burning a few moments blow out the flames, and inhale the fumes.

To keep a griddle in good order, so that cakes baked thereon may always present a clear brown surface, scour it occasionally with a thick stale crust of bread and a little dry salt, and never neglect to wipe it clean around the edges before putting it away.

Flavoring butter with the odor of fresh flowers is an art of the French peasantry. The process consists of putting the little prints, wrapped in thin cloth, into a tight porcelain dish on a bed of roses, or whatever blossoms are chosen. Among the flowers which give the most desirable results are clover and nasturtiums.

A solution for replating knives, forks and spoons with silver may be made by dissolving a quarter dollar in three ounces nitric acid, then adding three ounces quicksilver, and when the latter is quite dissolved, adding a quart of rain water. Dip the article to be replated in the solution and let it remain there a short time. Then rub with a sponge wet in the solution and polish with a chamois skin.

The best way of ridding a house of rats is to fill all the holes that can be found with pounded glass, and seal them up with plaster of Paris and tin, if you wish. Then thoroughly clean the premises and see that there are no garbage pails left about to attract rats, and secure the service of a good cat.

Iron or steel immersed warm in a solution of carbonate of soda (washing soda) for a few minutes will not rust.

To remove a rusty screw, apply a red-hot iron to the head for a short time, the screw-driver being applied immediately while the screw is hot.

Gilt frames may be restored by rubbing with a sponge moistened in turpentine.

Steaming the face at night over a bowl of very hot water, and then bathing it with very cold water, is a simple method of giving it a Russian bath, and will tend to make the skin whiter and smoother, and the flesh firmer.

The Athletic Directors have appointed a committee including Fish, '95, Strong, '93, Southgate, '92, to see about holding a series of Cross Country runs the same as a year ago. It is probable that none will be held, however, as the Intercollegiate Sports come May 26th, and the Institute Sports about three weeks earlier, so that to arrange for a series of runs between the two would be difficult. The Directors were authorized at a meeting of the Athletic Association this week, to decide whether base-ball should be managed by a separate association or not. They have come to a decision and have called for a meeting this noon of all interested to organize a base-ball association. A committee has been chosen by the Athletic Association to redraft the constitution.

Tech boys seem just now to be in clover with the young ladies. About a week ago the misses of the Home School gave a reception to the Socialists of '92, and last Wednesday evening the latter returned the compliment by taking the former on a sleighride to Leicester. The same evening quite a number of other Techs were guests of a party of Normal School girls on a similar ride to Westboro. And all this thanks to Leap year.

Chapel exercises are a little more orderly now than usual. After a considerable lack of discipline for a long time, the authorities suddenly came down and suspended a Middler until September for applauding in Chapel. About ten others were guilty, but as this was the only man caught, he had to take the consequences. His class ('93) appointed a committee to petition the Faculty for leniency in this case inasmuch as it was his first offence; he received no warning and men from other classes had been suspended and immediately taken back. The only outcome was a hearing which did not seem to effect the opinions of the Faculty committee. Various threats of other petitions to Faculty and Trustees are now in the air.

The entertainment for the benefit of the Athletic Association is to take place at Horticultural Hall, March 25th. The committee in charge is Marshall and Rawson, '93, Brackner, '92, Burdick, '94 and Denny, '95.

Dartmouth Alumni Association.

The Dartmouth Alumni Association of Central and Western Massachusetts, which was recently formed in this city, will hold its first annual reunion and banquet at the Bay State House, Friday evening, February 26. There will be a reception at 6.30 o'clock and dinner at 7.30 o'clock. Several prominent graduates have been invited and among those who have accepted are President Samuel C. Bartlett, Hon. J. W. Patterson of Hanover, N. H., Hon. George A. Marden of Lowell, state treasurer, Hon. E. E. Maynard of Springfield, judge of the Superior court, City Solicitor F. P. Goulding and others. The president of the association, Lieut.-Gov. William H. Haile of Springfield, is expected to preside and the vice-president, Judge John Hopkins of Millbury, also expects to be present. The reunion will bring together about 100 graduates and a pleasant time is anticipated.

High School.

Some little talk has been made about the Senior boys and their sleigh ride. Most of the boys are in favor of a banquet in its stead and consequently did nothing about one. Meanwhile the girls had banded together and had arranged for a sleigh ride to Millbury which occurred last Saturday night. No little talk was made last Monday by the girls but the boys can meet them on equal footing after their banquet, to take place at Lincoln House Feb. 23.

The rhetorical exercises in the hall last Tuesday were of great interest. The principal made a few very interesting and practical remarks on Washington's birthday. He said that this day was not so much a day of celebration as it was intended to be. Of the six holidays that we have this is the only one for an individual man. Attempts have been made for one in honor of Grant, Lincoln and others but they have all been unsuccessful and Washington alone remains. He stated that he thought it rather peculiar that Washington should be so greatly honored by his people when he gained no great victories of himself and some of these were not much better than defeats. He was continually retreating. No poet has ever yet written his masterpiece on Washington but in fiction and oratory he has not been forgotten. He advised the pupils to read Bancroft's treatise on Washington then if they had time repeat it and then read Daniel Webster's oration delivered in New York in 1838. At the close of the exercise, Dr. Souther spoke a few words in commendation of the exercises and was pleased to have a chance to address the whole school assembled in one body.

The lower corridor and adjoining rooms have been the center of attraction and enthusiasm for the last week. Class meetings were held Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday noons and all the officers are now elected and the excitement will gradually die away. The office most evenly and fiercely contested for was that of president. The candidates were Messrs. Witherby and Tower. The vote stood 51 to 40 in favor of Mr. Tower. Miss Gates was easily chosen as vice-president. Miss Kingsbury was elected as the secretary and Mr. Sprague was unanimously chosen treasurer, no opposing party was nominated for the treasurership. Mr. Field was chosen chairman of the executive committee after two votings. Mr. Burrage is the class historian and Mr. Belisle is class pianist.

Mr. Perry is making air tests in the various rooms of the building.

At the Shoreham.

Hon. Jos. H. Walker gave a reception, Thursday night, at his hotel in Washington to the delegation from the Massachusetts Legislature. To meet the delegation, one of which was Mr. Jas. H. Mellen of this city were present the most of the Massachusetts Representatives in Congress. The Legislative people are in Washington to look after certain railroad interests.

Mr. William Lavin, Tenor, and Mr. Franz Rummel, Pianist.

MR. LEACHS HOBBS, ACCOMPANIST

TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 3d, 1892.

Tickets, with reserved seats, 50c, 75c, and 1.00 according to location.

The sale of tickets will begin at 10 o'clock Saturday morning, Feb. 27th at Mechanics Hall of C. L. Gorham & Co.

The Mary Howe Concert.

Worcester people who are usually acquainted are very greatly pleased that they are to have an opportunity to hear Mary Howe once more before her departure for Europe where she is to spend considerable time in study. She has always pleased Worcester audiences and as it was at the Worcester Festival that she began to make her reputation, Worcester has always taken a peculiar pleasure in honoring her rise to her profession. Besides herself, many wish with us for her husband, Mr. William J. Lavin who was once with her. He is a tenor of considerable repute and has during this winter, together with his wife, added to his fame by very successfully filling a large number of engagements in oratorio and concert work. He is not well known in Worcester except by reputation and there will be considerable anxiety to hear him not only from an artistic standpoint but also because he is Miss Howe's husband.

But these two are not the only ones who are to take part in the concert. There are also Mr. Franz Rummel, one of our world renowned pianist, and Miss Maud Powell, the hardly less renowned violinist. The date of the concert is Tuesday, March 3rd, at the place, Mechanics Hall and the sale of tickets will begin at Gorham's next Saturday. There will undoubtedly be a large attendance.

Dr. Higgs T. Cheever will address the Boston Ministers meeting at Pilgrim Hall, Washington's birthday on the 22nd and the services of this distinguished brother, the late Dr. Geo. E. Chawner of the Church of the Puritans, New York, an exceedingly fit way to spend the day.

Entertainments.

The Tennis Drill given at Pilgrim Hall Tuesday evening by sixteen young ladies was pronounced by those who attended to be "the finest thing of the kind ever given in Worcester. It went way ahead of fan drills, parasol drills, etc." The young ladies have been drilling very steadily for three months and their marching was almost perfect. They were dressed in tennis costumes decked with flying ribbons and carried tennis racquets. Description could give no idea of the beauty of the drill, it must be seen to be appreciated. The young ladies who took part were Misses Jessie Duckworth, Grace Larkin, Mabel Chamberlain, Nellie Brown, Julia Robbins, Sadie Dewhurst, Grace Cook, Edith Sherman, Mary Towne, Maude Copeland, Hattie Dunn, Ella Larkin, Maud Picco, Alice Chute, Lila Fletcher and Eva Robbins. The drill was conducted by Fred Knight and the piano accompaniment was played by Miss Lavinia Knight. Also, during an intermission there were tenor solos by George L. Moore, readings by Miss Ella Johnson and selections by the Tech quartet consisting of Howard W. Bracken, Charles A. Needham, Hugh M. Southgate and George D. Ball. The entertainment was given under the auspices of the Christian Endeavor Society and for its benefit. About $50 was realized.

In the Friday Populars came The Kellogg Concert Company. One of the troop was ill and Miss Dorothy Renfrew, a reader, took her place. She was encored several times thus showing that her audience did not fret over the change of program. The whistling solos evidently pleased, and Mr. Kellogg gave the different methods of the art and illustrated each one. He seems to have fully mastered all that he has undertaken. Miss Devine sang ballads and the Perry Brothers gave several combinations which were well received.

The tableau class and some of the pupils in elocution of the Worcester School of Elocution and Oratory gave an entertainment at the Lake View Church Tuesday evening under the auspices of Class 10 of the Sunday School. The program included readings by Miss Gertrude Tuller, Miss Edith Gould, Miss Mary L. Howard, Miss Nellie M. Hatch, Miss Emma Hewitt and Miss Olive Hewitt; piano solo by Miss Eva M. Coughlan; songs by Mrs. E. H. Plaisted and Japanese fantasies, marchings, tableaux and pantomime by the class. There was a large audience, which thoroughly enjoyed the program.

Charles S. Stoughton, for several years tenor at the First Universalist Church, has been engaged at the Salem Street Church in the new quartet.

Mr. William B. Sprout, Esq., formerly of Worcester, now attorney for the West End Street Railway Company, Boston, has recently purchased an estate in South Natick which is to be his Summer residence. Mr. Frank W. Clapp, paperer and house decorator of this city, has been in Natick for the past week or ten days, superintending the interior decorations.

At the Home School last week Friday evening the young lady students received the Seniors of the Polytechnic Institute. There was dancing and singing and the young men were invited to try their hand at making bouquets, for which Mr. Smith received first prize and Mr. Needham the booby prize. To close the evening's pleasures cake and ice cream were served. Miss Swett and Miss Houghton received and Misses Carpenter, Harlow and Mellen had charge of the entertainment.

A movement is afoot to elect Rev. Dr. W. V. Davis of this city, a trustee of Amherst College to fill the vacancy caused by expiration of the term of E. W. Peet, of St. Paul, Minn.

Mrs. Lavinia is still known as Mary Howe and she evidently intends to retain that as her professional name for some time longer. She is now taking a concert tour through New England. She will sing in Fitchburg next Friday evening.

Miss Lulu Isaacs, R. R. Simmonds and Miss Hendricks took part, last week Friday evening, in an entertainment given in Grand Army Hall, Gardner, by the Charles Summer Camp, S. of V., of that town. Miss Isaacs read and gave whistling solos, Mr. Simmonds sang and Miss Hendricks was the accompanist. The Gardner papers spoke very highly of the work of each one.

The Stone Club, composed of young people of All Souls Church, met by invitation with Edward F. Britton and wife, 17 Wyman Street, Tuesday evening. There were literary and musical exercises in addition to a valentine party. The committee in charge included Misses Sadie Sparrell and Bertha Cady and Ernest Houghton.

Commander Churchill finds his hands full with the duties of his new position. Washington's birthday he will attend a meeting of the Grand Army Club in Boston and in the evening will be present at a G. A. R. Fair in Newton.

The meeting of the Second Parish Club Tuesday evening was devoted to the study of the life and works of Rubinstein. The program included a sketch of the composer's life by Mrs. H. W. Johnson; a duet, "Polonaise et Polonaise" from Bal Costume and selections from Feramors by Miss Mary F. Tucker and Miss Mary B. Adams; solos, Barcarolle, Polka Boheme and Romance by Miss Tucker; songs, solos, "The Dream," "Spring Fancies," "Thou art like unto a flower," and "The Lark," by Mrs. Johnson; solos, "Good Night" and "Good Morning" by Mrs. G. M. Bassett; duets, "Song of the Birds" and "Wanderer's Night Song," by Mrs. Johnson and Mrs. Bassett.

The replacing of some of the gas and gasolene street lamps by incandescent lamps is a very welcome and much needed change. The new circuit of 40 lamps, the location of which is not yet decided, will be accepted by the city about March 1.

A High Priced Stamp.

The highest priced postage stamp in existence is the famous Dundee stamp, worth $2,500, and not purchasable at that price. James Chalmers, of Dundee, was the inventor of the adhesive postage stamp in 1834. The stamp is in the possession of Sigmund Friedl, an extensive postage stamp merchant of Unter Dolberg, Vienna. It was exhibited at the Vienna Jubilee Stamp exhibition. The postage stamp museum, held on May 25, 1891, at Vienna, displayed this gem as the greatest attraction among 3,000,000 stamps and other objects exhibited there.—Yankee Blade.

Typhus Fever.

The far reaching effect of wrong doing is painfully evident in the driving from Russia of the Jews and, through their coming to America, in the breaking out almost in our very midst of this dreaded disease. Oakdale is very near us when we think of a pestilence that has, within the present century, carried off more men than war its. It is similar to typhoid fever, it is considered more contagious and fatal. It has been called jail, hospital, putrid, spotted and camp fever. From May, 1812, to the following February, the Bavarian army serving with Napoleon, lost over 25,000 men by typhus fever. In Mayence, in six months, 1813-14, out of 60,000 men, the French lost 25,000 by this scourge. In 1856, the French in the Crimea lost 17,000 men. It has been stated that in the British army this fever has been the fourth most important item in destroying life. The outcome of the cases in Oakdale will be watched anxiously. By all means let us have immigrants carefully inspected.

Tippecanoe.

Equity Bank.

The stockholders of the Equity Co-operative Bank met at room No 6, Mechanics Hall building, Friday evening, the 12th, and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: President, Charles L. Gates; vice-president, Ellery B. Crane; secretary and treasurer, T. J. Hastings; directors for three years, Henry G. Crane, E. J. Bardwell, Urgel Jacques, C. J. Nourse; for one year, Lewis N. Smith; auditors, Wm. Lancaster, J. B. Ratigan and H. L. Keys.

Mary Had a Plot of Land.

Mary had a little land
The soil was very poor;
But still she kept it on her hand,
And struggled to get more.

She held her land until the day
The people settled down;
Till where a wilderness had been Grew up a thriving town.

Then Mary rented out her plot,
(She would not sell, you know),
And waited patiently about,
For prices still to grow.

They grew as population came,
And Mary raised the rent;
With common food and raiment now
She would not be content.

She built herself a mansion fine,
Had luxuries galore;
But every time that prices rose,
She raised the rent some more.

"What makes the land keep Mary so?"
The common people cry;
Why, Mary owns the land, you know,"
The knowing ones reply.

And so each one of you might be—
Wealthy, refined and wise—
If you had only owned some land,
And "waited for the rise."

A Time to Dance.

Possibly the gathering with incidental festivities would have been had just the same, but some how or other, the advent of the infant Becker has set the pupils, past and present, of that flourishing institution into a ferment of activity and generosity. First it was a silver cup for the young man and now it is a souvenir silver spoon to put in it. Some are said to have been born with such utensils in their mouths, but in this case the argentine insertion was simply postponed a few weeks.

It appears that the young people who have passed through the college entertain a merited affection for the same and, each year, they are accustomed to meet, eat and dance in memory of pleasant hours spent in and under Mr. Becker's care. This time, the reunion came Monday evening at the college rooms, with an attendance of fifty graduates and at 8 o'clock there were business meetings of the different classes. Then at 9 p.m. they sat down to an excellent supper served by Estey. Finally the light, fantastic toe was tripped from 10 o'clock to 1 of the next morning.

The 8th order of the dance was announced. It was in honor of the lad who has Junior written at the end of his name, but who is quite too juvenile for such hours as these. His father was proud to act for him and being called to the front he received in behalf of the future college principal the souvenir spoon already alluded to, the gift of the class of '89, thus forming another bond between the school and those who profited by its teachings.

At the table Walter H. Hadley was toastmaster and the following toasts and responses were had. "Some of the faults of the pupils from a teacher's standpoint," C. L. Mahoney; "Some of the good points of the pupils from a teacher's standpoint," E. C. A. Becker; "A few words in behalf of the teachers," Miss Minnie Bigelow; "Extemporaneous toast," Robert T. Bowen; "The class of '91," W. C. Stevens. The welcoming address was made by H. E. Hosley, the president of the association.

The dancing was under the direction of floor manager C. L. Mahoney, with aids, W. C. Stevens, '91; Ada Whitney, '89; H. C. Young, '92; Minnie Schofield, '88.

The officers of the association are: President, H. E. Hosley; first vice-president, Miss Ada Whitney; second vice-president, Miss Minnie Scofield; secretary and treasurer, H. C. Young; executive committee, H. E. Hosley, Miss Ada Whitney, Miss Eugenia Wood, W. H. Hadley, W. C. Stevens, Miss Minnie Scofield, H. C. Young, Miss Jennie Adams, George Adams, Miss Georgie Sutton, Miss Grace L. Hale, Miss Grace Griffith; past presidents, Walter H. Hadley, James V. Colles.

The college has this element of success in a marked manner; its pupils love it. This speaks volumes for all concerned.

The "Sacred" Codfish.

At any rate, that is what many people call the figure of the fish that hangs in the Representative Chamber of the State House. The question is frequently asked as to why it is there and few can answer.

There was a time when our state set more store by its cod fisheries than in any other one industry of her people. This first has been productive of more wealth than all the monies of California and in the days of Governor Shirley the cod figured on a two cent stamp. Mr. Drake in his "Old Landmarks of Boston" alludes to this figure as though it hung in the Old State House before the Revolution. At any rate, after the return of peace, March 17, 1784, on the motion of John Rowe, it was again hung up in the old Representative Chamber. So when in 1798, the House moved to its present quarters, the fish came also. How queer it is that two important Boston events, the evacuation and the suspension of the fish should have taken place on St. Patrick's Day. No wonder, that Irishmen love Boston. Quite likely, the foregoing is all there is to be found descriptive of the effigy so frequently referred to by strangers who visit the Hub and the State House.

Boys' Club.

Mr. Geo. Johnson is teaching U. S. History to the boys in the way of a story. It seems to take the youngsters in excellent shape. They love stories.

Worcester Abroad.

Miss Nellie Saunders of Mapewood is entertaining her cousin, Miss Alice C. Knowles of Worcester.

A wise man said: "to each of you, my poor friends, I can give little for you, too many but I can give much to all of you, and I will," this is the foundation which will substantially benefit the world. It is all very well to feed the hungry body, that is easily done, but when the mind is fed, when the intelligence is advanced, when the man or woman who feels an instinct for better than mere drugs for bread, is shown the way, a greater work is accomplished than if the city's streets were strewn with gold, easily picked up and as readily spent.

LIGHT

VOL. IV.

WORCESTER, MASS., SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1892.

No. 27

Where Washington hath left
His awful memory
A light for after times.

—Southey.

February 22d.

This date, 160 years ago, made Westmoreland, Va., famous for all time.

Today, only a slight depression in the surface of the land indicates the site of Washington's birth-place.

Fredericksburg has far more to mark the early life of the Father of his Country. Here, the visitor may see the old home of his mother, where she died and near by may see her grave,

Standing by the side of the Rappahannock, which rolls along in muddy, sluggish power, the patriot may look across the stream, to the old Washington possessions on the Stafford Heights beyond, and may try to emulate the youthful Washington who, 'tis said, could throw a silver dollar across. If he does try, the chances are, he will lose his money.

Who knows but what, on this date, ghosts of the mighty dead awake and through the halls of Mount Vernon stalk to note what changes time hath wrought, since they from earth were set free. There is no home in America to which so many people turn with loving gaze as that in which Washington lived and died.

But all this is of the past. That we cannot recall. What of the present and future? What are the patriots of 1892 doing to keep alive the fires of affection for country? The Governor of Massachusetts gave a reception at the State House and then hurried away to participate in the festivities, in New York city, of an organization whose only reason for existing is the fact that its members once did their best to destroy the Union. It is such laxity as this that endangers America. "The penalty of treason is death," looks well on paper but who knows of an instance of its enforcement save in General Butler's hanging case in New Orleans?

Such carelessness, not to use a stronger word, reminds us all the more of the necessity of teaching and practicing the very strictest national integrity. That teacher does best who most zealously inculcates the love of country, of this country, not Massachusetts, nor New England, but the whole United States. Possibly other exercises in this city were not reported, but certainly there has not come to the attention of LIGHT another case so meritorious as that of Principal Mooney of Quinsigamond, to whom reference is made in another column. Here is a teacher of Irish extraction, filing into line of duty a legion of young people whose names indicate the country of Gustavus Adolphus and Charles XII. While the memories of the Northland are yet fresh upon them, they join in singing America and Hail Columbia. Possibly in imperfect English they read the words of the fathers concerning Lincoln and Washington. This course maintained throughout their school life and they will be welded to country.

This is as it should be. Country is of far greater consequence than grammar. It is impossible to make this idea too prominent. Nothing else need be neglected, but children must be impressed with the fact that they are to be American citizens first, school afterward. To this end, the glorious past should be as an open book. Every page should be indelibly impressed upon the childish mind. Teachers who fail to do this are remiss. All that the school can teach should go along with love of country with the latter in the lead. Hooks contain much but not everything. Precept and example have their places.

The recent attempt at train robbery, west of Syracuse, New York, reminds us that the details of crime have altered much since the days of Dick Turpin and "Sixteen Stringed Jack." Imagine the gentlemen of the road of a century ago, swinging themselves over the side of an express car to enter the same by a window. Even their intrepidity would pale under such a requirement. One of those gentry could hold up a coach on Hampstead Heath but how would he look stopping a train in Missouri or Arkansas? He would feel that his vocation was gone. He would have to learn all over again. After all the robber who climbs into the car and rifles a safe or who holds up a train full of passengers is only the merest tyro compared with the man or body of men who try to steal the road itself and yet maintain a nominal respectability. They have even been sent to Congress. O Tempora, O Mores!

Palmer.

Not the flourishing town up Springfield way, nor yet that party, who years ago, in the days of the Crusades, paraded his patron branch and came very near being a beggar, but a good, honest, ruddy cheeked apple of that name which our friend, Mr. O. B. Hadwen, raises in perfection. He is very likely to have a specimen in his pocket about these times, for February is the month in which this delicious fruit reaches its prime. It is sweet with just the slightest suspicion of sourness. Apple fanciers cannot help thinking it the best late fruit in existence. It has a bright yellow face as befits a sweet apple while the blush that deepens in places indicates the trace of tart that it possesses. LIGHT will answer for the merits of the fruit and if any reader has doubts or curiosity just speak to Mr. Hadwen, himself. He will gladly tell you the history of the specimen and quite likely give you a taste.

Society of Antiquity.

The library of the society has lately received several valuable gifts among which were several early books and pamphlets from Charles E. Stevens, Esq., viz, his "Anthony Burns," "New Biographies of Illustrous Men," "Worcester Churches," "The Company of the Moselle," "Church and Parish," "Henry Chapin" and "Noah Tenney of Feter."

Samuel H. Putnam has also donated a copy of "Historic Storms of New England."

"Our Paper."

There is, at least, one paper in Massachusetts that has no use for advertisements. It is the one whose title is seen above, published by and for the inmates of the Concord Reformatory. The reason for no "ads" is at once apparent. It is a singularly well filled paper and must afford the young men, confined there, a deal of pleasure.

Augustus W. Weeks.

Though for many years a resident of Lowell, where he died last Sunday, Mr. Weeks was born in Worcester, Feb. 5, 1833. He prepared for college in the Lowell High School and entered Wesleyan University, Class of '64. He did not graduate, leaving college, during the Fall term of his sophomore year. He served in the Massachusetts Sixth regiment and was, for some time, in the services of the Freedmen's Bureau. For a number of years, he has been in business in Lowell. He has ever been a conspicuous member of the Methodist Church. A sister of the deceased is the wife of Rev. E. P. Tenny of Manchester-by-the-Sea, formerly president of Colorado College.

WORCESTER, SATURDAY, FEB. 27, 1892.

Mr. Thomas C. Orndorff of this city has prepared a "Method of Playing Twenty-four Whist Hands in Duplicate by Two Teams of Four Players Each." This is an outcome of the interest excited in the game by recent events at the Commonwealth Club. Charles Lamb should be alive to give us another chapter of Susan Brattle's opinions of this ancient game. The pamphlet may be had of the writer by addressing him, Box 501, Worcester.

The second number of Baby, one of New York's most recent contributions to Journalism, is an improvement even on the first. The picture is that of the Duchess of Fif, holding her baby girl in her arms with the underscript, "A Possible Queen of England." One thing is certain, this publication need never lack for interesting babies to picture. Every well regulated family has one, at least.

LIGHT acknowledges the favor of No. 1 Vol. IV of the American Bandsman, a Worcester publication devoted to bands and orchestral music. Apparently, it is an excellent journal. Harry Prendiville, 98 Front Street.

"Voices of the Night."

"When the hours of Day are numbered,
And the voices of the Night
Wake the better soul that slumbered,
To a holy, calm delight;"

The trouble is that LIGHT did not awake. The voices were there and they were loud enough, we are told, but "The cares that infest the day" had so locked the soul, better or otherwise, in slumber, that nothing was heard. However, LIGHT is very grateful to former pupils for the "Hurrah" of Tuesday night. Come again boys! Possibly, we may be awake, next time.

Mock Trial at Pilgrim Hall.

That most exciting and interesting breach of promise case, Ann Maria Jones vs. Peleg Doodittle, will again come to trial, before Judge Woodenhead, in Pilgrim Hall, Tuesday evening, March 1st. New evidence will be brought forward and a new jury impelled. The learned counsel are "Know it all" for plaintiff, "Whatacallum" for defendant. Owing to the extensive acquaintance and popularity of the parties it is expected that a large number will be present to witness the trial.

A Literary Contest.

LIGHT is anxious to stimulate reading and literary research; also to promote the sale of papers. To this end, six quotations from well known British and American writers are given here. To that one who first names correctly author and location or comes nearest, a fifty cent book, publisher's price, will be sent. Another book, at LIGHT's discretion, will be given to the one doing second best. Every ten weeks, a book of increased value will be given to that party who has taken most first prizes in that time. The following condition must be observed.

Every solution must be accompanied by this coupon, cut from LIGHT, and signed.

I forward the within as answers to quotations in LIGHT, Feb. 27, 1892.

Incident of the 25th Mass. Vols. at Cold Harbor.

Of the fighting qualities of the 25th as shown in this battle, we shall quote from a narrative of the battle published in one of the Philadelphia papers, Jan. 31, 1865, by Gen. P. D. Bowles of the Confederate army, who commanded immediately in our front and who was an eye-witness to the gallant charge made by the 25th in that engagement, he says

"We were not long waiting. Soon the woods in our front resounded with the cold mechanical huzzas as if from a myriad of voices, and a general advance was made along the whole line. They came out of the woods directly in my front and their lines extended as far to the right and left as the eye could reach; first one, then two, three, four, five, on they came until the eleventh line was in full view. I ordered my men to hold their fire until they came within seventy yards of our works. This command was so well executed that the first, second and third lines of the enemy looked like one. The Federals were advancing all this time without any caps on their guns, and not a shot had come from the Union lines save those from the six gun battery in my front, which was bursting shells high over our heads and in our rear. Our artillery was not idle, but firing double-shotted canister from the two rifled guns, and at the distance of one hundred yards was cutting wide swaths through their lines at every fire, literally mowing them down by the dozen, while heads, arms, legs and muskets were seen flying high in the air at every discharge.

"We were not long in discovering that there was no child's play awaiting us. We were opposing a determined and gallant foe. The wide lanes made in their columns were quickly closed, while on, on they came, swaying first to the right, then to left, like great waves of the sea, until one upheaval from the rear would follow another, hurrying them nearer and nearer each moment to the murderous fire from our works. There was a ravine with a marsh in General Anderson's front and just at the edge of the woods. Here the enemy would surge to the right to obtain shelter from my men, only to be raked by the artillery and the leaden hail from Anderson's Brigade. At this point the dead were piled upon each other five or six deep, and the blood ran down the branch or gully until it flowed past our line. At times the smoke was so dense that nothing could be seen, but as the wind carried it away the solid blue mass could be observed r-forming in the old orchard in our front.

"About this time the excitement ran so high with my men that the surgeon of the regiment quit his litter corps and was in line firing before I discovered him. Some of the officers, with hats in their hands, went up and down the line, feeling so much elated that they would strike the men over the heads and faces and shout with all the joy ever expressed at a camp-meeting by a new convert.

"Here for one hour and a half a solid mass of humanity had charged and charged again like a flock of sheep against a stone wall. Such invincible resolution I never saw before or since. They would advance to the charge again and again, only to be shot down with out any shadow of resistance, until the ground was blue with the dead and wounded. Finally the Federal columns passed out of sight in the deep smoke. I then had a good supply of ammunition brought into the line and everything made ready for the third attack. After waiting some twenty or thirty minutes we again heard the old huzza, but in such a feeble manner and from so few that it caused surprise. Then it was that the videttes called out: "They are coming again!"

"On looking over the works I discovered what I supposed to be one regiment with a single flag and an officer in front with sword raised high in the air, calling on his men to charge. I ordered my command to place their guns on the works and wait for orders. When the advancing line reached within seventy yards I ordered my line to fire, when the whole of the Federal regiment fell to the ground save one man, who ran back to the edge of the woods and attempted to hide behind a white oak tree, but was completely riddled by fifty balls in less time than it takes to write it.

"The regiment that made this gallant charge was the Twenty-fifth Massachusetts, which was the only regiment that obeyed orders to advance. This we learned from the twenty odd officers and men who fell down among the dead and wounded at the first fire. The balance of the brigade had refused to go forward, and not since the charge of the three hundred at Balaklava has a more heroic act been performed.

"Up to this time not a man in my command had been scratched, and no one in our brigade except our Brigadier General, E. M. Law, who was struck by a fragment of a shell early in the engagement. It was the most sanguinary charge of our civil war, and no more heroic act was performed by either side during that unhappy struggle than that on the part of the Federals which I have just described."

From A. A. Parker, Esq.

This venerable gentleman from his home in Fitzwilliam, N. H., sends LIGHT a pleasant letter recounting his troubles with La Grippe and the following lines of poetry which all readers will greet with pleasure.

"I feel my time is short but mean to die with the harness on, or rather

I shall try to die game

And humbly aim

To enter my name

On the "Roll of Fame;"

Yet still, if I find

I have become blind,

I shall hope to find

A friend true and kind

Who will supply all

Needful things at my call.

Well, I've done my best,

And now stop and rest

And die in my nest.

—Amos A. Parker.

Now aged five score

And a few months more,

And cannot ignore

A plain simple fact

I shall cannot act

As in days of yore,

When I was three score,

Although I deplore

I cannot work more.

Yet I am content

Paderewski.

The biggest surprise in the musical line this season was the enormous audience which turned out to hear Ignace J. Paderewski, Monday evening in Mechanics Hall. It was a surprise because, when his coming was first talked of there was so little interest shown that four hundred subscribers could not be obtained. The managers decided, however, to bring him here and, without a doubt, they are not in the least sorry now, for they must have netted a very handsome sum.

To many people piano solos, as they are played, are not interesting. There is too much noise and too little melody and it is melody and rhythm that please the popular taste. There are, to be sure, many in Worcester who are educated up to the appreciation of this class of music, but they are not so numerous that they could fill Mechanics Hall at one dollar a seat. It was this lack of fondness for this class of music which prevented the public from enthusing at first over his appearance. But when it was settled that he should come, the managers set about informing the people concerning the Polish wonder and caught their attention by accounts of his wonderful playing, his eccentricities and of his enormous audiences in other cities. Paderewski became the leading theme of conversation and everybody vied to tell the latest story about him. Then, of course, everybody who could spare the dollar must see and hear him for to many the former was about as much to be desired as the latter. It was curiosity which caused the large audience.

Paderewski stepped upon the platform promptly at eight and was greeted with a burst of applause. Sitting at the piano he rambled over the keys while the late comers were finding their seats. Then he began the program which was as follows: Sonata appassionata, Beethoven; Papillons, Schumann; Serenade, Erl-King, Schubert-Liszt; Nocturne, Etude, Berceuse, Mazurka, Waltz, Chopin; Melodie, Gavotte, Paderewski; Rhapsodie Hongroise. Such playing has never been heard before in Worcester and those who came out of curiosity became enthusiastic over the music for it was real music and not a display of digital agility. In fact it was very noticeable that he had no mannerisms whatever, there was no striving for effect. It was a revelation to the audience and those who had never cared before for the piano came to the conclusion that there was music in it when played by the right person. The secret of his power lies in the facts that he has mastered the technical difficulties so that he never has to give them a thought and he possesses the qualities of soul which enable him to fully comprehend the music and interpret it to others. His playing has been described as possessing a "rarely beautiful singing tone" and it was just this quality which won the great audience Monday evening. It is doubtful if any other pianist can hold the interest of so large an audience for so long a time, by his own playing alone. Furthermore, should Paderewski come to Worcester again next year, he would undoubtedly be greeted by nearly as large an audience as that of Monday evening.

While all of the pieces were greatly enjoyed, his own compositions elicited the heartiest applause, he being obliged to repeat the Gavotte. At the close the audience seemed very loath to leave and Paderewski was called out and bowed his acknowledgments.

In every respect it was a notable performance and will be remembered as one of the leading events in Worcester during this season.

Ben Hammond's Recitals.

Mr. Ben T. Hammond's 53d and 54th recitals were given at his studio, 452 Main Street, Thursday and Friday evenings. The pupils who sang Thursday evening were Mr. Walter H. Barber, Mr. Peter Culbert, Mrs. G. W. Shattuck of Boylston, Miss Fannie E. Schofield of Webster, Mr. Frank F. McMurray, Mr. Henry C. Grimwade of Charlton and Miss Georgie M. Corser of Spencer. It was the first public appearance of the first five.

Friday evening the pupils taking part were Mr. Fred W. Hoppin, Miss Eliza V. Kittredge of Fitchburg, M. J. Alfred Tougas, Mr. John Hendrick, Miss Nellie T. Foley and Miss Nettie B. McGaffey. This was the first public appearance of the first four. In the recitals Mr. Hammond has had the assistance of Miss Emily G. Whittemore, Miss Mary L. Starr, Miss C. M. Milliken, Miss C. L. Lowell, Miss Mabel Cowie, Miss Florence Putnam and Mr. F. E. Muzzy, pianists and pupils of Mr. B. D. Allen.

At the 55th recital next Monday evening the following pupils will sing: Miss Natalie Traique of Westboro, Miss Lillian W. Rusack of Webster, Miss Marian L. Jenkins, Miss Allen Kennedy, C. Clarkson Kenyon and Mr. Harry C. Robinson. The assisting pianists will be Misses Starr and Whittemore.

Retrospective.

ENFIELD, CONN., FEB. 21, 1892.

DEAR LIGHT, I was surprised and interested in your article in No. 25, on the old invitation book of the Guard's ball in 1842, entitled "Fifty Years Ago," and while it recalls sweet memories of the past, it also reminds me that a very large majority of those mentioned have rallied on the reserves, and that those of us who remain are now silver top veterans, living in the memory of the past, and holding dear the names of all of those who were our comrades then. But I find so many errors in the history given of some of them that I write in correction, as history is valuable only as it is truthful!

1st. You say "of the twelve Guards who make up the managers at least seven have passed on." As I read the list I believe eleven instead of seven have struck their flag, and gone down before the scepter of death, the writer alone, of them all, remains. Sarah J. Bowles, not Bowers, was the daughter of the latter, probably an error of the printer. Mrs. Seymour and Miss Eaton did not live in the old house, foot of George Street, but in a one-story house, a few rods south, where now stands "Chadwick Block." Miss Eaton became Mrs. Tucker, and is now well known in connection with the public library. Wm. Eaton, a man of public affairs, selectman, sheriff, county commissioner, etc., built and lived in the house mentioned, where his daughter—dear old Aunt Sarah—lived until a few years ago, when she passed on beloved and honored by all who knew her. Mrs. M. Bigelow was not the sister of Samuel Hathaway, his sister married Joshua R. Bigelow, who was a prime mover in getting up the Guards and one of its first sergeants. She still survives him. Miss Rogers was not the daughter of Henry Rogers, a long time connected with the Aegis, and father of Henry and Charles O., who were founders and owners of the Boston Journal. Miss Coe became Mrs. C. O. Rogers and still retains a large interest in that valuable paper, and so I might go on, through the long list of names, that to the present generation are but names, save only a few who still keep alive in loving hearts, in honored age, the sweet memories of their youths and, who though scattered wide, oft come back on wings of thought to that dear old shrine—Brinley Hall.

S. H.

"The Hub."

Don't forget that the familiar term, as above, owes its origin to Dr. O. W. Holmes who, in the Autocrat at the Breakfast Table, used the following:

"Boston State House is the hub of the Solar system. You can't pry that out of a Boston man if you had the tire of all creation straightened for a crow-bar."

Bostonians have gradually grown to apply it to the whole city. They are very proud of the words.

Monuments.

A statue is to be erected at Pontcharre, in the department of Isere, France, to the Chevalier Bayard, "sans peur et sans reproche," who died near Ravenna, Italy, in the great battle between the French and the Spaniards. The statue, which is to be equestrian, represents Bayard in armor, with the casque on the head and the vizor up. It was designed by the French sculptor Rambaud, and is much praised by the French critics.

The Monument Commission of the state of Indiana has sent circulars to all the American ministers and consuls in Europe calling the attention of foreign sculptors to the competition, as they will not probably care to devote their time to such uncertain work at their own expense.

Nothing has been heard, lately, of the project to erect a statue to the memory of General Charles Devens in this city. Perhaps the projectors are working silently. The figure of the scholar, soldier and jurist would be a fine addition to the surroundings of our court house. Then too the Boston matter seems to be in abeyance, at least, nothing is heard of it. Massachusetts anxiously awaits the memorial to her distinguished son.

There are thousands of people in Worcester and elsewhere who would like to see a befitting monument to the memory of John B. Gough. Worcester is pre-eminently the place for such a memorial, but the temperance world should have a part in its erection. The world moves rapidly and unless something is done in this direction soon, the time will have passed in which the means for a monument can be collected.

God help the rich, the poor can beg.

About Folks.

A leap year party was held Tuesday evening in Grange Hall by the Worcester Grange, Patrons of Husbandry. About thirty couples attended and danced until midnight. During an intermission a basket supper was served, for which each young lady had brought enough for herself and some young gentleman who should be invited to share it with her. The party was under the direction of Misses Sara Mingley, Susie Haynes and E. M. Flagg.

Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Dutton of Boston spent the 22d at the home of Mr. Luther M. Lovell, No. 3 Dix Street. Mr. Dutton is the principal of the Hancock School.

Mrs. J. C. Pellett, Mrs. Davids and Miss Culbert gave a cobweb party to about fifty of their friends at their residence, 47 Wellington Street, last week Thursday evening.

The last of the Light Infantry's series of three socials was held at the Armory last week Friday evening and was a more elaborate affair than the first two. There was a very large attendance, including a large number of city officials and of the local militia. Until nearly two o'clock the long floor was covered with merry dancers. Rebboli served refreshments at midnight.

Mrs. Mary F. Tucker, pianist, gave a recital to her friends last week Friday evening at her home, 35 Chestnut Street.

Reform Club.

The good work goes on. Last Sunday night was, emphatically, anniversary night. James L. Scott and Alexander M. Comrie had kept in the right way fifteen years. H. E. Walker twelve, and L. L. Whitley, Timothy Comrie, William Wells and John McClelland one, each. No wonder that the members were enthusiastic. President Robinson presided and congratulatory addresses were made by the President and by James H. Laying, J. A. Stowell, James McCullough, John H. Hession and Major F. G. Stiles. The latter was particularly happy in his words of thanks that so many years of sobriety could be represented there that evening. Remarks were also made by Messrs. Comrie, Whitley and Walker. Badges of membership were presented to those who had completed their first years.

Police Matron.

The retirement of Mrs. Mary B. Lane from her position as Police Matron, one held by her for nearly five years, is a matter of more than passing moment. She is the first occupant of the office, it having been created during the time of Mayor Winslow. She has been earnest in her efforts to improve the condition of those unfortunate women who have been taken to the station under arrest. She has had to do with 1,400 women, an almost incredible number for five years in a city no larger than Worcester. She will leave her post April 1st, going to Concord Junction, where her husband is employed and where they will again begin housekeeping. It is possible that her successor will be Mrs. Mary D. Ware, in which case there would be no lessening in the character of the work.

The Horticultural Society.

One year ago, LIGHT gave a comprehensive sketch of the origin and history of this excellent organization. Its semi-centennial is to be observed next week Thursday. But this week we take great pleasure in presenting the face and sketch of one of the society's noteworthy members. We have already given the accomplished secretary, E. W. Lincoln, and the present president, the Hon. Henry L. Parker. There will be no opposing voice to our selecting O. B. Hadwen for this week, ending the first half century of the society's history. Horticulturalists are not necessarily agriculturalists, but LIGHT takes particular pleasure in depicting the face and career of a Horticultural Society's president who was first and last a farmer, the only one in the long and honorable list.

The story is told that some time ago the atmosphere in one of the rooms in the Dix Street School became so foul that the teacher concluded that there must be a dead rat under the platform. So a carpenter was called in to tear it up and remove the offensive body. But when the boards had all been removed no rat was found. Subsequent developments proved the trouble to be one not so easy of removal as the rat would have been. But what some people are wondering is why it took the authorities so long to find the true cause.

The St. Anne's Total Abstinence Society will hold its ninth annual social at Horticultural Hall on Monday evening, February 29th. It promises to be one of the most successful the society has ever held. The good influence of this organization is far-reaching and is felt in many homes in this city.

Business College.

The following list of names of young people, all placed in situations within the last few weeks, speaks volumes for the success of Mr. E. C. A. Becker's Business College. It is evident that the public likes the quality of work done by him. It should be stated that the demand for his pupils is greater than he can supply. Within the last week he has had to say "no" to parties desirous of obtaining clerks and bookkeepers. This situation of affairs should commend itself to the many young people who are wondering what they can do in life. Apparently, the best thing would be to call on Mr. Becker and see if he can't teach them something that can be used to their advantage.

How some Americans "Do" Rome.

E.—"You say you saw everything in Rome in three days? That's impossible!"

F.—"But you must remember that there were three of us. My wife took all the churches, I visited all the picture galleries and my son went to the restaurants and cafes. Then we met in the evening and swapped experiences."

Works Both Ways.

"You say you are in love with your chum's sister?"

"Yes."

"Well, my dear boy, you have something to learn yet. I never knew a girl to marry her brother's friend or her friend's brother. They know too much."—New York Life.

Greek Wit and Wisdom.

John Randolph stole one of his best witticisms from Aristippus, the cynic and pupil of Socrates.

When a pedantic singer was boasting of his voice, Aristippus said:

"It takes no brain to have a good voice."

"How is that?" asked the singer.

"Why, a tin-horn with an idiot behind it can produce better music than any singer in Greece!"

This made the singer mad, and he twitted Aristippus with having no children.

"The gods will not permit any more such cynics to be born, while I have many children," said the singer.

"Yes, you ignoramus," said Aristippus, "you boast of a quality in which all slaves are our equal and every jackass your superior."—Translated from the Greek by Eli Perkins.

Old Postmaster.

Roswell Beardley, of North Lansing, Tomkins county, N. Y., who received his commission as postmaster from President John Quincy Adams in 1828, still lives and conducts the post-office in person. In answer to an inquiry last year, Assistant Postmaster-General Hazen stated that Mr. Beardley was the oldest post-master. He was appointed at the age of 19 years, and will celebrate his 83d birthday and also the 94th anniversary of his appointment in June next. Mr. Beardley has his commission hanging on his wall, and was some years ago offered a handsome sum for it by the New York Historical Society.

The Human Race.

Life is a sign, so people say.

And marriage is a double beam.

Youth and old age a tandem, they.

While longhair's quite sulky when.

And he will work a monster mill.

Who talks from down the end of sun,

Will wish a stone ball on him rilled—

He'll have to twirl a waggon tongue.

—Chicago Herald.

A Challenge.

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

My soul will make obeisance to truth in whatever form it may appear. The mind shadowed by an ignorance of facts, is unable to judge fairly of what an unfettered mind may appropriate as a divine truth, and because of this fact I am prone to exonerate the "Critic" of "Dreams of the Dead." Our "Critic" has spoken according to the "Light" which he possessed, or, possibly, with his fingers upon the public pulse he has deemed it wise not to admit a truth, but he is not a skilled physician or he would have noted that in this age of progress some of our greatest minds are becoming earnest investigators of the occult sciences, and the time has come for independent thought and action and the man who is a slave to an ignorance of facts is frowned upon by the livelier minds who dare to enter the avenues of progressive thought which must ultimate in spiritual unfoldment. I claim no special interest in the book, "Dreams of the Dead," for I have not looked between its covers, but I do claim an interest in the great tide of love, of hope, of aspiration, of incentives to labor for higher, nobler spiritual conditions that are engendered by the study and acceptance of these hidden truths. When the "Critic" says "Not since the departure of Edgar Allen Poe has there been gathered into one volume so much of the occult as this volume of 268 pages possesses." it might be wise to give this statement a small margin as the "Critic" may never have read the works of some of the boldest, grandest thinkers of the nineteenth century, and accordingly may not be quite equal to weighing the quality, or quantity of matter relative to the occult, furthermore, our "Critic" avers that "For those who love to dwell on the improbable, not to say impossible, this book will have a special charm, etc." When he is reminded that the telephone, phonograph, photophone, and cinematograph were the impossibilities of yesterday but the realities of today he may be led to recant his past statements, and thus be placed in a condition wherein he may be enabled to more thoroughly appreciate divine prerogatives and privileges. I trust my words will not be construed into dagger-thrusts, aimed toward a personality, for I am simply assuming to deal with that portion of the unthinking public that has squared itself intentionally or unintentionally against truth. Our "Critic" continues, "Many a reviewer, of the earth earthy, will say, 'I can make nothing of this.' 'It is Hypnotism extenuated, etc.'" I cannot treat questions, styled Hypnotic, lightly when I consider that Liebalnt, Bernheim, and Charcot of Paris, the critical observers, Paul Richer, P. David, Professor Luys, and Reginald of Paris, also many leading physicians and other scientific investigators of France and other Continental nations have given the subject their time and attention. When I know that the Belgian Parliament has passed a bill making Hypnotism a legal offense, and a progressive thinker writes, "If this kind of sporadic legislation against Hypnotism is attempted with a view to confound all exercise of mental power over others with fraudulent and criminal design, then a struggle is coming in which it will be worth while to live to witness and share in." When matters come to this we have to deal with public questions, and it is our duty to think seriously of humanity's interests. Our "Critic" speaks lightly of Flammarion, but perhaps I have not seen the same side of this author that our "Critic" has. As to Camille Flammarion's lofty flights, am I to despise them, or account them empty dreams because my wings are too closely clipped to allow me to breathe the same atmosphere? It is no narrow mind that says, "Every gigantic step in modern science changes our perspective, and immediately enlarges the sphere of our knowledge," and so Flammarion addresses us. Am I to sneer because Madam Guzman bequeathed to France one hundred thousand francs to be awarded to the person who should, within ten years, establish a means of communication with any star (planetary or otherwise), and am I to continue to sneer because Flammarion approves, and admits the possibility? I do not consider a rash conceit, conclusions fixed upon a basis I cannot fathom, so I join him in saying, "We have but entered the vestibule of our acquaintance with the universe. Let us not complain too much! It is glorious to already have our eyes opened toward immensity, and to be able to throw a glance along the avenues of space and time. We are beginning to spell out the first pages of the grand volume of the universe." Am I to scoff at the ancient Hebrews, who believed that the soul lay in the blood and also at Henry Wood who, in the "Solidarity of the race," says, "Evil being negative and having no God-like basis in the real loses its vitality by the third or fourth generation, while good goes on even to the thousandth," and again Beecher frankly asserted that one properly generated man was worth a dozen or more regenerated ones? Let us broaden through each evolutionary step until, if we cannot behold truth in its varied forms we can at least acknowledge the possibility of its existence even if we are forced to confess our inability to comprehend it. All times should have allowed free speech, but man in the past has made it otherwise, today however in this nineteenth century, although there are fagots piled high above the heads of martyrs, there is not, thank God, the wherewithal to light them.—Mrs. A. H. Hinman.

Harvard Street.

The afternoon tea given by Mrs. T. C. Bates at her home, No. 29 Harvard Street, Thursday, from 5 to 6 p.m., was one of the most successful events of the society world during this season. More than 200 guests were present and did honor to the occasion. Mrs. Bates had the assistance of the following ladies: Mrs. Dr. Sprague, Mrs. Francis N. Dewey, Mrs. John S. Baldwin, Mrs. Jared Whitman, Mrs. Nellie Rogers, Mrs. E. D. Buffington, Mrs. Nathaniel Paine, Mrs. Alexander De Witt, Mrs. Charles C. Baldwin, Mrs. Lewis G. White, Miss White, Miss Whitcomb, Misses Marsh, Misses Wyman, Miss Hopkins, Miss Peckham of Providence, Miss Eaton, Miss Adams, Miss Clarissa Smith, Miss Wood, Miss Whitman and Miss Throop.

HISTORY OF THE HIGH SCHOOL.

The Classical and English High School of Worcester began in 1845. At the end of the present school year, it will be divided. Having the data prepared, I purpose, if sufficient interest is shown in the project, to issue a history of the School. The book, a square octavo, nicely bound in cloth, will contain:

FIRST—An account of the beginning of the institution and a running comment on teachers and pupils to the present year.

SECOND—Statements as to the growth and progress of the school apparatus, library and other features, so essential to the success of the same.

THIRD—The names of all pupils in the school down to 1861, the first graduating exercises, and the names of all graduates since.

FOURTH—The graduating exercises in full from 1861 to the end.

FIFTH—Pictures of the school buildings and of teachers with miscellaneous matter pertinent to the subject.

The cooperation of every one ever connected with the school is besought.

To show your interest in the work, please fill out and return the accompanying coupon.

The schoolmaster is abroad, and I trust to him armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array.

Vassar's share of the Fayerweather bequest—$50,000—is to be used in building the new dormitory made necessary by the increase in the number of students.

Richard T. Ely, associate professor of Political Economy in Johns Hopkins University, has placed his resignation in the hands of the Board of Trustees, to take effect June 1. Prof. Ely has accepted a professorship in a Western University.

Lassell Seminary, Auburn, Mass., agrees to be one of the ten schools to contribute $5,000 towards building a home in the suburbs of New York City for poor working girls in time of illness or fatigue.

A $2,000 scholarship has just been established at Mount Holyoke College by Mrs. Mary L. D. Hall, of New York. Miss Annie A. Gould, of Portland, Me., is made valedictorian for '92. The highest rank during the course obtains this honor.

Dr. H. E. Von Holst, author of a "Constitutional History of the United States," has accepted a chair in History in the University of Chicago. He was in this country in 1869-71, and married a graduate of Vassar. He has since been professor in History in Strassburg University.

Progress in our Worcester school system may be reported when we find that three members of the School Committee, Messrs. Balcom, Garver and Ware, have visited Boston to look over and through the kindergartens of that city. They are, also, to visit Springfield on a like errand. Let us hope that the outcome of their investigations will be the instituting of that form of instruction in the city.

Dix Street School.

The subject of diphtheria in this neighborhood is not so frequently referred to now as it was a few weeks ago. Since the close of the school, no new cases have been reported from this part of the city. The practical ending of the dry closet system, has reassured many people who, otherwise, would have felt compelled to move to a part of the city where better accommodations were afforded.

Principal Mooney of Quinsigamond has a happy faculty of blending the useful and the pleasant. His schools properly observed the birthdays of Lincoln and Washington by a program of patriotic selections. The Principal gave the pupils some happy thoughts as to the men whose lives were thus commemorated and then, while the school interspersed the exercises with the songs, "Hail Columbia," "Mt. Vernon Bells," "Star Spangled Banner," and "America," the following pupils read or declaimed appropriate selections.

Hilda Carlberg, Benjamin Nystrom, Alice Joyce, Oscar Hammerstrom, Selma Hagberg, Gustave Bjork, Mabel G. Matthews, Joseph Burt, Annie G. Burgess, Annie L. Carlberg, Harvey Watkins, Annie Lavin, Clara Pierson, Peter Lavin and Fritloff Ekstrom. These names are worth studying. At least seven of them are those of children whose parents have come to America within the last fifteen years. There is no way like this to teach patriotism and the significance of country.

A Quaker Story.

Ex-Governor Van Zandt of Rhode Island is a prince of story tellers. Once, when visiting Worcester for the purpose of making an address, he was introduced to a gentleman of Rhode Island extraction. "Ah indeed," said the Governor, "are you descended from _____?" "Yes," is the reply, he was my great grandfather. "They say that in the days when Newport owed much of her wealth to the African trade in Negroes and the West India business in rum, your ancestor was owed a large sum by a man who indulged in both these objectionable traffics. He would not settle, till at last your forefather of the strictest Quaker principles, managed to get a hold on him, which obliged him to pony up the amount due. Then, reckoning on your ancestor's Quaker doctrines, he professed the money saying, 'Here is the money, Mr. _____, but it was made in the slave trade.' He had mistaken his man, for the old gentleman was equal to the occasion. He reached for the lucre saying, 'Ah well, any man who would buy and sell slaves would lie, so I think I'll take the cash.' That possible doubt as to the origin of the money was sufficient to cover a whole volume of principles."

Those Dreadful Societies.

An old negro preacher in Thomasville thus expressed himself to the editor of the Thomasville Times, being asked how his church was getting along:

"Mighty poor, mighty poor, brudder."

"What is the trouble?"

"De 'cieties. Dey is jist drawin' all de fatness an' marrow out en de body an' bones ob de blessed Lord's body. We can't do nuffin' widout de 'ciety. Dar is de Lincum 'Ciety, wid Sister Jones an' brudder Brown to run it; Sister Williams mus' march in front ob de Daughters of Rebecca. Den dare is de Dorcas, de Martha, de Daughters of Ham, and de Liberian Ladies."

"Well, you have the brethren to help in the church," we suggested.

"No, sah, dar de Masons, de Odd Fellows, de Sons of Ham, and Oklahoma and Promise Pilgrims. Why, brudder, hy de time de bruders and sisters pays all de dues an' tends all de meetings dere is nuffin' left for Mount Pisgah Church but jist de cob; de corn has all been shelled off an' frowed to dese speckled chicks."

"We should be as careful of our words as of our actions, and as far from speaking ill as from doing ill." Cicero.

Lines

written on the Old Blandford Church. Built in 1735. Petersburg, Va.

Thou art crumbling to the dust old pile
Thou art hastening to thy fall,
And round thee in thy loneliness,
Comes the ivy to thy wall.
The windows are scattered now,
Who kneel before thy shrine,
And silence reigns where anthems rose
In days of Auld Lang Syne.

And sadly sleets the wandering wind,
Where oft in years gone by,
Prayers rose from many hearts to Him,
The highest of the high
The transfere of many a busy foot,
That sought thy aisles, is o'er,
And move a weary heart around,
Is still forever more.

How dost ambition's hope take wing,
How droops the spirit now,
We hear the distant city's din,
The dead are mute below
The sun that shone upon their paths,
Now glides their lonely grave,
The zephyrs which once fanned their brows,
The grass above their waves.
Oh could we call the many back,
Who've gathered here in vain,
Who've careless roved where we do now,
Who'll never meet again,
He would our very souls be stirred,
To meet the earnest gaze,
Of the lovely and the beautiful,
The lights of other days.

Employer—Dennis, I hear that you have been drinking again; if you can't do better I shall have to let you go.

Butler—Sure, sir, it was against me that I got off this time, sir.

Employer—Nonsense! no man can do things against his will!

Dennis (grasping at a straw)—Faith, I had a brother who went to prison against his will.

As a natural and necessary complement to Professor Gildersleeve's paper on "The Creed of the Old South" in the January Atlantic, and Professor Shaler's statement regarding "The Border State Men of the Civil War" in the February number, General J. D. Cox of Ohio, an officer in the Union army, will have a strong article in the March Atlantic showing clearly and unmistakably "Why the Men of '61 Fought for the Union."

"If you want to know a man, make a solitary journey with him. Sir Gavan Duffy did so with Carlyle for six weeks, and this is his verdict:

"I ask those who have come to regard Carlyle as exacting and domineering among associates to accept as the simple truth the fact that during those weeks of close and constant intercourse there was not one word or act of his to the young man who accompanied him unworthy of an indulgent father. Of arrogance or impatience not a shade. In debating the arrangements of the journey, and all the questions in which fellow-travellers have a joint interest, instead of exercising the authority to which his age and character entitled him, he gave and took with complaisance and good-fellowship."

A new neighborhood story entitled "A Golden Gossip," by Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, will be published immediately by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. Retailers of gossip not "golden" would do well to read this.

The March Babyland is a picture, a story and a song, all in one. The dainty frontispiece of Mother, and Baby in the new cradle, "The Tiptoe Twins," "The Neighbor Babies," "Sweetheart in her Day Night Dress," "The Nursery Blacksmith," and the illustrated "Mouse Story," with other pretty pictures and merry jingles, will captivate Baby and receive hearty praise than ever from Mamma.

Price 50 cents a year; 5 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

It was Miss Ingelow's brother who helped her to publish her first volume of poems. "He offered to contribute to have the MSS. printed, and my mother went with me to the publisher's (Mr. Longman). He was most kind, and took the matter up warmly. In the first year four editions of a thousand each were sold, and this first volume has been republished again and yet again, until it has reached its twenty-sixth edition."

The March Pansy opens with "A Happy Little Girl," which, upon examining the entire contents, we find suggestive of many other happy girls and boys who will read this admirable number. The stories by Pansy and Margaret Sidney move along in that masterly fashion which marks the writings of these authors, and its shorter stories, articles, sketches and verse, well sustain the opinion always expressed whenever The Pansy magazine is spoken of.

Price $1 a year; 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

Mrs. Celia P. Wooley, author of "Robert Armstrong?" and "A Girl Graduate," will very soon publish through the Riverside Press a new story, "Roger Hunt," in which she depicts forcibly the evils resulting from inconsiderate marriage, aggravated by selfishness.

Lippincott's Magazine for March, 1892. Contents: A Soldier's Secret, Capt. Charles King, U. S. A.; The Newspaper-Man as a Confidant, (The Journalist Series) A. E. Watrous; Horsemanship and Polo, (Athletic Series) Foxhall Keene; "One Hundred Miles an Hour," Charles R. Deacon; Days and Nights, (a poem) Anne Reeve Aldrich; Pomphero, Lillian A. North; Ibsen's Earlier Work, C. H. Herford; Rebuilding the Navy, (Illustrated) Harry P. Mawson; The Balance, (A Poem) S. Decatur Smith, Jr.; Touch and Go, M. G. McClelland; Defeat, (A Quatrain) Clinton Scollard; An Independent Theater, Edward Fuller; The Independent or Free Theater of New York, James L. Ford; Sleep, (a poem) Ruth Johnston; After Life's Storm, (a Quatrain) Nora C. Franklin; Getting There, Robert Tinsol; As it Seems; With the Wits, (illustrated by leading artists.)

The complete novel in Lippincott's Magazine for March, "A Soldier's Secret," is by Captain Charles King, who alone among living Americans has the secret of the military tale. What he does not know about army life in the West is not worth knowing, and what he knows he can impart with unsurpassed and unflinching charm. The post, the bivouac, the battle-field,—whenever goes on at these he makes to live—gain before us; for he has been a part of it all, and his heart is with the cavalry still. His last story has a very recent theme,—the Sioux war of 1890,—and will be found equal to any of his previous work.

In the Journalistic Series, Mr. E. Watrous handles "The Newspaper Man as a Confidant" ably and but too briefly. His contention, that editors and reporters have a singular gift of keeping secrets which it would be money in their pockets to publish, will surprise readers not of the profession, and he supports it by some curious and striking incidents.

In the Athletic Series, the mysteries of "Horsemanship and Polo" are revealed by an accredited authority, Mr. Foxhall Keene.

Under the heading "One Hundred Miles an Hour," Mr. Charles R. Deacon, of the Reading Railroad, discusses the facts and possibilities of railway speed, and rejects the popular notion that a faster rate necessarily means increased danger.

Certain facts ancient "Rebuilding the Navy" are set forth by Mr. Harry P. Mawson. This article is liberally illustrated.

Mr. C. H. Herford, an English scholar who has given special attention to the Sagas and their reproduction in modern literature, gives an account of "Ibsen's Earlier Work," and especially his "grand and lurid drama," "The Vikings in Helgeland."

The projected "Independent Theater" is explained in two papers by Edward Fuller and James L. Ford, the latter having special bearing on the plan now incubating in New York.

Mr. Robert Tinsol delivers a modicum of wisdom about "Getting There," mingled with certain humors of the editorial den. The department "As It Seems" considers Mr. Thomas Hardy's last novel, Mrs. Terhune's Virginia tale, and sundry other matters.

There is a short story by Miss M. G. McClelland, and a brief sketch by Lillian A. North. The poetry of the number is by Anne Reeve Aldrich, S. Decatur Smith, Jr., Prof. Clinton Scollard, Ruth Johnston, and Nora C. Franklin.

Into Morocco by Pierre Loti. Translated by E. P. Robbins, illustrated by Benj. Constant and Aime Marot. Rand, McNally & Co. Chicago and New York, 1892. Paper 50 cts.

This firm seldom puts forth a book of greater interest than this. It is not a book of statistics nor of history, but a keen-eyed, quick-witted Frenchman improved his opportunity to describe most graphically the ways and habits of a people, dwelling in the northwest part of Africa. An attaché of the French minister, he had exceptional opportunities to see the Arab at his best and his worst. He landed at Tangiers and with Arab escort made the trip to Fez. His sights and insights among the dwellers of that ancient city are as interesting as any bit of description that has ever come to our notice. He evidently loves Africa. In fact, he concludes his book with the declaration that he would rather be a holy caliph than president of the most parliamentary, most literary, most industrious of republics. Seeing Africa with such eyes, what wonder that he imparts to his book a charm that binds us to it, till it is finished.

Our Little Men and Women for March is an unusually readable number. "Boots and Bonnet" is a capital story; "Playing School" tells more about "The Doings of the Studio Dolls," and "Like a Fairy Princess" is a true incident, told as a charming story, about the Princess of Wales. "A Seal's Sayings," "A Boy and a Girl," "Joker and his Relations," are all worthy of special mention, while, "Mamma Trusted Us," "Five Little Servants," "A Star Story," each embellished with fitting and beautiful pictures, show a knowledge and appreciation of child-life which enables the publishers of Our Little Men and Women to send out an exceedingly helpful as well as beautiful little magazine.

For youngest readers. Price $1 a year; 10 cents a number. D. Lothrop Company, publishers, Boston.

Editor A. E. Winship of the New England Journal of Education lately spoke before the Department of Superintendence in Brooklyn, N. Y., and gave this high praise to the work of a Worcester lady.

"All the books ever written upon New England history prior to 1891 may be learned word for word, and yet we cannot 'speak by the book' upon New England character unless we have read Alice Morse Earle's 'The Sabbath in Puritan New England.'"

Col. T. W. Higginson has issued a pamphlet entitled "List of Battles and Casualties of Massachusetts during the War of the Rebellion." In this work he has been aided by Mrs.

Florence Wyman Jaques. In a clear way, these losses are tabulated from April 19th, '61, in Baltimore to April 19th, '65, at Swift Creek, S. C. While the pamphlet has been sent to every C. A. R. Post in the state, it may be had by comrades and others interested by addressing Mrs. Jaques at 114 Charles Street. This publication is sent out with the hope and expectation that many corrections may be made. It is a noteworthy fact that the first and last Massachusetts blood was shed on the 19th of April, a date, by some remarkable fate or line of coincidences, inseparably linked with the fortunes of the Bay State.

Mr. A. P. Sinnett, whose Occult World and Esoteric Buddhism have had a wide reading, has written a book on "The Rationale of Mesmerism," which Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will publish shortly.

Equatorial America is the title of Mr. M. M. Ballou's forthcoming book of travel, describing a visit to St. Thomas, Martinique, Barbadoes, and the principal capitals of South America.

In his exceedingly meritorious purpose to place the Records of Worcester beyond the reach of decay and fire, Mr. Franklin P. Rice has reached the interval between 1806 and 1810 or pages 105 and 216 inclusive, this being the middle number in what will be the Tenth Volume of the Society's published proceedings. Every issue of his carefully prepared and superbly printed volumes demonstrates the value of his undertaking. It is rare that a man is willing to give so much time to the preservation of the ancient and curious. Certainly, Worcester owes much to his patience and perseverance. Undoubtedly another result to follow in the time to come will be the efforts on the part of other cities and towns to follow Worcester's example. They cannot begin too soon. The number bears the imprint of the Worcester Society of Antiquity.

William Gilmore Simms, by William P. Trent Boston and New York. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1892.

This is the latest volume in the American Men of Letters Series, edited by Charles Dudley Warner, a series that deserves a place in every good library in the land. Unless Edgar Allen Poe be thus classified, Mr. Simms is the first Southerner included by the publishers in their list. In fact, it would be difficult to name many conspicuous writers, before the war, who were known as residents of the South. Mr. Simms was easily first. He was a very prolific writer. He was poet and prose writer, both a novelist and historian. There are some libraries, even in New England, that contain complete sets of his fiction and they are thrilling stories, in the main, of Colonial and Revolutionary days. Still comparatively few people of today recall him as more than a name that takes up a deal of room in Allibone's Dictionary of Authors. His biographer is a Tennessee and he has done his work well and impartially, even from a Northern standpoint for it must be remembered that Mr. Simms was one of the most rabid of the South Carolina Fire Eaters. Born of Irish extraction in 1806, he was reared in Charleston. His childhood was a combat with poverty, but native genius triumphed and he became one of the most noted men in his native city. He survived till June 11, 1870. In the famous picture of a Literary Reception at Sunnyside, Simms sits at the extreme left. He was fully depicted in that group on account of his many contributions to Northern publications, particularly the Knickerbocker Magazine. Mr. Trent, in his Simms bibliography, enumerates no less than eighty titles of books that he produced, along with nearly fifty titles of contributions to magazines. Some idea can thus be had of his amazing industry. He was buried in a corner of the lot in Magnolia Cemetery that had been reserved for a monument to John C. Calhoun.

The reader of the Series and let us hope that they are many will place this book alongside the lives of Irving, Noah Webster, Cooper, Emerson, Willis, Franklin, Bryant and others of the list with the feeling that it is a worthy companion. For sale by the Denholm and McKay Company.

* Illustrated.

The most interesting articles in the New England Magazine in March are Recollections of Louisa May Alcott, by Mrs. Maria S. Porter; Harvard Clubs and Club Life, by William Dana Orcutt, and Milwaukeee, by Captain Charles King, the military novelist.

The New England Magazine for March is a very bright number. The article on Harvard Club Life, by William Dana Orcutt, will attract a great deal of attention just now, when the newspapers are discussing the barbarities of the "fast set" at Harvard. It is beautifully illustrated, and gives a detailed description of the peculiar customs of the different college societies.

Mr. Edwin D. Mead discusses the Chilian trouble in the March New England Magazine and takes the view that the United States has been made ridiculous by the recent explosion of war brag. Walter Blackburn Hart devotes his "In a Corner at Dodsley's," to exposing the quackery of professional literary advisers.

Captain Charles King, the famous military novelist, contributes a splendid description of his western home, Milwaukeee, to the March New England Magazine. It is finely illustrated.

Everybody will read the article on Louisa May Alcott, by Mrs. Maria S. Porter, in the March New England Magazine with interest. It reveals the home life of this noble woman as it has never been revealed before.

Memory.

BY MARY WOODWARD WETHERSDEE.

Sweet as a Summer's bloom,
Laden with rare perfume,

Is memory, queen enthroned among her treasures:
Her garments smell of myth.

And all the air is sweet,
With voices, soft as twilight's slumber measures.

(It, as an avenging foe,

Is memory's obsession.

This swollen river, black with turbid waters
It wrecks life's fairest hopes.

And all its rocky slopes,
Are strewn with corpses, to the hearts' high altars.

(Oh memory, be thou sweet,

As lilies of our love!

And all our hearts, as roses' full of beauty
Fertile, sweet and rare;

Blooming in native air,
And Love presiding with a queenly duty

Phil's Tenth.

BY ADELAIDE SKEEL.

If it be true that one can read a woman's story by looking at her clothes, Cathy Ann's biography, as shown in her drab and black dresses, was a dull one, and she might well have posed as a lay figure for any of the dreary, plotless magazine titles now so much in fashion, since, from the crown of her bangless head to the sole of her French-heeled shoe, she was that nearly obsolete household phenomenon, the single woman who loses her life that the married may find it. Free lances and female bachelors were scarcely known twenty years ago, so our Cathy was not the anachronism in her village that she would be in this present year of grace; and by all odds the queerest thing about her was the simple fact that she was not an old maid at all, but a wife deserted by a dissipated husband! Everybody in One Tree knew this; it had been a nine days' wonder, and lived down as only bad things can be lived down by good people in a good community; and now here she was innocently imposing on the world as small as a spinster!

"An old maid like myself," she would say, not only to Summer boarders, newcomers, and such novelties, but to neighbors who had tasted her wedding cake; and nobody resented the fiction. At the time of this story the scandal was stale, and Cathy settled down in her father's house to take care of her brothers' and sisters' children as if she had remained an unplucked blossom on the family tree for this special reason. She was a handy thing to have in the house, particularly when a wife or husband died and the relic wished to remarry, in which case Cathy came to the fore and took the undesirable left-over boy or girl till a school was found for the waif. The verdict was ever the same, that Tom or Lizzie was spoiled at Grandpa's, yet it was never Grandpa who overfed them on hot gingerbread or showed a culpable indifference on the subject of bed hours. Of course Cathy had no discipline, but this the children never knew, nor did they know that this sort of enforced maternity was draining their Aunt's life-blood. I think she did not know herself that she would have been a person of more consequence in One Tree if she had joined clubs and classes and church guilds instead of spending her time spoiling other people's children; but however that may be, she jogged in her rut, as we all do; and one thing gained beyond question was the love of Tommy and Susie and Lily and Lizzie and Jamie and Phil; especially Phil, who was the most confirmed gingerbread fiend and late sitter of the whole tribe. His mother and stepfather never actually abandoned him to Cathy, yet he was so much with her that his times with his parents became visits, and it was on one of these in town that he joined her when she came in from One Tree to do some shopping.

"I know you hate going into the stores," she said to him when he presented himself at the big station and offered his boyish escort—not without the ulterior motive of getting soda-water out of her later—"so I will hurry all I can, that we may get a peep at the Wax-Works, if you like. I really have nothing to do for myself, only a list of patterns to match for the folks at home. They heard I was coming, and they brought me in these bits here"—poor Cathy pulled some frayed pieces of dry goods from her pocket (for this was before the blessed relief of sample by mail came to us). "We will get to sight-seeing before you know it."

Quickly enough the time slipped away, and then, with a last taking account of samples and goods purchased, the oddly assorted pair made their way to all the places of amusement that a large city offers to a grasping nephew and liberal-minded aunt. Truth to tell, Aunt had not a great many quarters nor dimes to spare, but Phil was her favorite, as she was his, and money, be it scarce or plenty, is not to be kept like bric-a-brac when one of a company is altruistically inclined and the other a school-boy of a receptive turn of mind. Phil had been to a bird-store to price white mice, to a gunsmith's to look at fishing tackle, to a stamp depot to get the latest in philately, and, finally, after a lunch eaten at Cathy's expense, to the new Museum, when the clock struck three.

"The train leaves in ten minutes," she said to him in sudden alarm, and then, after a hurried race, learned at the bureau of information that there had been a change in the time-table, and here was a whole hour left to wait.

"I wish we could eat another dinner, Aunt," sighed the boy, as he realized the impossibility and regretted it.

"I believe I will go buy a bonnet," said Cathy Ann, with all the solemnity of making a confession of faith. She fairly blushed as she spoke, and seemed half afraid the masculine element in her nephew would raise some insurmountable objection. His reply surprised her. "Well, Aunt Cathy, do get a good one, for I don't remember that you ever got one before. Come along." Manlike, he took the lead as they trotted together through the bright dazzling streets which are almost as bewildering in their glare to country eyes as the shop windows themselves, till they reached a French milliner far famed in the rural solitudes of One Tree.

"You will get a real city bonnet, won't you please, Aunt?" asked Phil, with enthusiasm born for the occasion. "How much will it cost?"

"That depends," answered Cathy, discreetly, adding, half in self-defence to herself for her unusual extravagance, "but I shall give no foolish city price."

"But you will get a city bonnet, Aunt?"

"Yes, yes, come along—"

"I am coming, Aunt, but do get a city bonnet, and pay a city price,—please do. I want to see how you would look. Grandpa is rich—"

"Come along, Phil."

So they went on together, he a big, clumsy school-boy of the most pronounced hobble-de-hoy type, dear only to mothers and partial relatives, and she a slim little figure, in colorless attire not exactly in mourning, yet in grays and browns of hopeless shades, in contrast to which a widow's smart new crape is gay.

"Recent grief, Miss?" asked the sparkling, jetted milliner, as she turned to answer Cathy's request for "something not too bright."

"Oh, no,"—Cathy Ann could not fool the great city woman as she did the One Tree people—"no, indeed; but I have always been quiet in my tastes."

"Here is one, Aunt," cried Phil; "is it quiet?" and as he spoke he pulled from its wooden post a wonderful creation of black lace and roses, and set it upon Cathy Ann's head. Madame the milliner forgave his boldness when she saw how well the red roses became her customer, who heretofore had appeared to be a shabby, insignificant little woman, and was now transformed into a glowing creature. The blush of the flowers brought out a long lost blush on her cheek, and the filmy lace softened the fine wrinkles which the cares of yesterday had written on a delicate skin. She looked as she felt, like some one else, and that was the charm of it, as it is the charm of all new creations.

"But it is too much for me," she faltered, still keeping it on, however, and dallying with its dazzling beauty.

"Only fifteen dollars, Miss."

"Oh!" said Cathy Ann.

"Is it a city price, Aunt?" whispered Phil.

"Reduced from twenty-five, Miss."

"Oh!" said Cathy again.

"You look sweet in it, Aunt—better than I ever saw you."

"Hush, Phil!"

"Twelve dollars, Miss, as you look so well in it."

"Buy it, Aunt."

"No, it is not only the price," stammered tempted Cathy; "it does not suit me."

The obliging milliner, now put on her mettle, exhibited her whole stock, blue, black, green, gray, yellow, and pink, finally coming back to the red roses and lace, offering it, as a last bait, at the sacrifice of ten dollars, "as just to clear the shelves to make room for the Fall trade."

"Buy it, do buy it!" pleaded Phil, who dearly loved a bargain, all untrained in Henry George's doctrines concerning the moral necessity of paying a good price for a good thing.

"Out of the question," Aunt said, firmly, and in less time than it takes to tell it she was out of the store and in a second-rate emporium, where she bought, in a spiritless way, some dull-colored materials to construct a home headgear which should match the whole tone of her life better than the other would.

"Horrid looking things!" said her nephew, whose taste had been suddenly developed in this new direction. "It looks for all the world like the bonnets you have always worn. I do believe you are in mourning, as the milliner said." It was foolish in poor Cathy Ann, but the half truth of the words made her drop some tears on the change left of her five dollar bill when it came back to her in the croquet-ball from the cashier's desk. She was tired, the holiday was over, and train-time had come. Phil was to go to his father's office, so, when he had gallantly put his aunt and all her belongings in the car, he made haste to finish up the day's fun with a try at the office typewriter and a brush with the elevator boy. He found a long-haired, low-voiced ladylike gentleman with his father, asking for money as eloquently as ever Phil asked for it. He was saying, over and over again, something that sounded like "A tenth—a tenth—a tenth to the Lord."

"Was he a beggar, papa?" asked the boy when the solemn stranger was finally shown the open door.

"An altruistic one," was the equivocal reply. "I say, boy, if I must give away money—which I can't afford to do—I will give it to you. I meant to have put a hundred dollars to your credit at the bank on your tenth birthday, but the home expenses are so confoundingly heavy lately! Here is ten dollars; throw it to a beggar or put it in a hole in the ground—go be happy; I will give you the rest when I get it."

Phil stared with delight, and then, with a hurried goodbye, without daring to calculate how many ice-cream sodas this newly acquired fortune would bring, hastened to the Fashion House of French Bonnets, at which he and his aunt had lingered so long, and where he now surprised the milliner by buying and paying cash for the red roses and black lace. An hour later he surprised Cathy Ann by bouncing out of the rear car, when the train stopped at One Tree, and handing her a wooden hat-box.

"Something you forgot to buy," he whispered, roguishly, as he hugged her around the waist. "I want you to look as pretty on the outside as you really are inside." He had meant to say something about giving a "tenth" but it was not Sunday, and a boy is always more bashful than one guesses. I think the Lord understood; and Cathy Ann wore the bonnet three Summers.—Christian Union.

Seward and Foote.

People unaccustomed to the ways of public life are often surprised to find men who abuse each other in courts of law, in public assemblies and legislative bodies, the best of personal friends after it is all over. Ex-Collector "Tom" Murphy of New York in some reminiscences of Senator Seward, with whom he was intimate, relates an experience which was a help to him in his own career. "My first visit to the Senate," says Murphy "was for the purpose of hearing him (Seward) speak. He made a great speech. He was replied to, as I felt, in the most bitter and insulting language by Senator Foote of Mississippi, and the language that he used was so offensive, in my judgement, that I could hardly restrain myself from jumping from the gallery and choking him.

"I dined at Senator Seward's house that evening, and to my utter amazement the gentleman sitting next to me was General Foote. When the ladies retired from the table I left my seat and went around to Seward and said: 'I heard that man sitting next to me at your table abuse you in such a gross manner that I was indignant. I can't understand it.' Senator Seward laughed heartily, and called out: 'Foote, I want this young man to go around and tell you what he has just told me.' Senator Foote also laughed heartily and said to me: 'Young man, I want to give you a lesson in politics. Seward lives in New York, and when he makes a speech in opposition to slavery and I reply to him and denounce him that helps me at home, and Seward tells me it does not hurt him a bit.'

A Glimpse of the Old Dominion.

BY W. A. ROBINSON, D. D.

R. T. M.—was the son of a Methodist preacher of Kentucky known for his unflinching fidelity to his convictions and his independent habit of doing his own thinking. R. T. was like his father. At the age of nineteen he was teaching school. One evening a slave, owned by their nearest neighbor, a warm friend of his father came to him and said: "Massa Robert, I want to learn to read and write, and I want you to help me."

"But, Adam," said Robert, "you know it is contrary to law, and liable to be visited by a heavy penalty to teach a slave to read."

"I know dat, but wha's de harm? I just wants to learn to read de Bible."

"Yes, but the law makes no exceptions; but, Adam, I don't believe the law is right, I have no respect for it, and on one condition I'll agree to teach you to read and write, if you have the patience to learn."

"What's dat condition, Massa Robert?"

"It is that you will never write a pass for yourself or anyone else to be out after nine o'clock at night."

"All right, sah; I'll never do it."

Accordingly, night after night, the slave followed the directions of the young school teacher, fashioning pot-hooks after his copy, and laboring through his ab, als, until, as a reward of his patient toil, he could write fairly well and read the Bible. But such a flagrant crime could not go unpunished. The alert Prosecuting Attorney got hold of the facts, and the case of Robert was presented to the grand jury and witnesses summoned. Robert, learning of what was brewing, mounted his horse and rode to the county-seat, and went to the hotel and put up his horse and got his dinner, and there met the foreman of the jury, who was a warm friend of his father and the owner of Adam. As he came up to him he said:

"Hello, Bob, what are you doing here?"

"I came to Court."

"Who are you courting?"

"Nobody."

"But what are you here for," he continued, uneasily.

"Well, sir, I understand that I'm indicted before the grand jury for teaching your slave, Adam, to read and write, and I propose to go before them and give all the facts. If this state will send a man to jail for such a thing as that, I'm their man."

"See here, Bob, get on your horse; and go home."

"No, sir; I shall do nothing of the kind. I propose to see the bottom of this business."

The foreman turned away, greatly perplexed, for he had no idea of allowing the son of his friend and neighbor to be subjected to any penalty for what he had done. The first case jury convened after dinner, the first case brought forward by the Prosecutor was Robert's, and a witness was put on the stand who told all he knew. At this juncture the foreman, though it was wholly irregular, said:

"Gentlemen of the jury and Mr. Prosecutor, I know all about this case. This young man is the son of my friend and neighbor and he is here and proposes to come before you, and plead guilty to all that is charged in this indictment. This slave is mine, and the facts connected with it pertain to nobody's business but my own. Now I want this case nolléd or withdrawn right here."

Such was his influence that the Prosecutor promptly did as he was requested to do, and Robert quietly returned home the same evening.

Years and years afterward, when slavery had long become a thing of the past, Robert met a slave of long ago on the street in the city where he was residing. The man recognized the benefactor of his boyhood at once, and made himself known by calling up the facts we have given.

"What are you doing here?" said Robert.

"I am here to preach," said Adam.

"You a preacher? I should like to hear you."

"I would like to have you hear me tonight at the little brick church on—Street."

"I'll be there," said Robert.

At the time appointed a large congregation, Robert among them, listened to the melting story of the cross. In concluding his sermon the preacher gave the facts about his learning to read and write, and said: "But for this I probably never would have become a minister of the Gospel. And now," he continued, "friends, the man is here who taught me, and I want you to know him."

At the close of the service the congregation gave an ovation to this modest man, who as a boy dared to do right because it was right. And so he does yet. What a delightful commentary upon the promise: "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days."—Christian Advocate.

Same Girl, Same Play.

Gas Mortimer, the theatrical manager, re-lates this incident. He was standing in front of the theater one evening where Marie Wainwright was billed to play in "Twelfth Night," when a countryman came along and looked long and admiringly at the lithographs of the star. "And that's a gal, is it?" asked the countryman.

"Yes that's a girl."

"Purty, ain't she."

"Oh yes; quite pretty."

The countryman studied the name and the face awhile and then said:

"I wonder if that ain't the same gal I saw once in a play called 'Ten Nights in a Bar-room'?"

"Same girl."

"Well, that was a mighty good play, stranger. If she was playin' that tonight it would catch me, sure."

"Same girl and same play."

The countryman spelled out the name on the bill a few times and asked:

"Wall, now, if it's 'Ten Nights in a Bar-room', what do they call it 'Twelfth Night, for?'"

"I knew the countryman ought to see the play," said Mr. Mortimer, "and so I told him it was called 'Twelfth Night' because this was two nights more."

The countryman bought a ticket and went lo.—Chicago Journal.

Mr. O. B. Hadwen.

This gentleman, a leading member and former president of the Horticultural Society, is one of those who are better known by their initials than by their full names, yet Obadiah Brown, for which the well known initials stand, recall the name so prominently connected with the planting of the cotton spinning industry in this country. His wife was an aunt of O. B. Hadwen's father, so his name went to the son and Dorcas, that of his wife, to a daughter.

Our well known farmer and nurseryman was born in Providence, Aug. 2, 1824. His father's people were of Quaker stock and had been settled in Rhode Island for many years. The first comer, John Hadwen, settled in Newport and was an extensive merchant there. The family came from Rochdale, England, and a descendant of the English branch became the wife of the famous John Bright. The descent from John, the first comer, to our respected Horticulturalist was through James and Charles who was a Providence merchant and manufacturer. His boy, however, did not like closely built houses and had sidewalks so well as the green and grassy country. Mr. Charles Hadwen married Amy Sherman Brownell of Portsmouth, R. I. One of his brothers was William Hadwen who made a fortune in oil in Nantucket, one of the firm of Hadwen & Barney. Of him, the good story is told, that when a fair was progressing in favor of the Athenaeum of that Island, Mr. Hadwen came in late and without a ticket. He was told that he could not enter, without the necessary ticket and that they were not selling them then. "Come to think of it," said the merchant, "I don't know but I have a pass," and he produced a check for $100, which he had prepared before leaving his office. It passed him right in.

Charles Hadwen moved to this city in 1835 and his farm was the old Wing Kelly place, back of Newton hill. H. B. Witter's Summer home is a part of it now. His children were our O. B. Hadwen, Mrs. Dorcas B. Lee of West Street and Mrs. Sarah A. Kimball.

Mr. O. B. Hadwen's school advantages consisted in four years in the Friends Academy in Providence and, after coming to this city, he went four Winters to the Clinton Grove Institute in Ware, N. H., under the excellent instruction of Moses A. Cartland, a friend of Whittier and whom the latter refers to in "A Memorial," M. A. C.

"In love surpassing that of brother
We walked, O friend, from childhood's day;
And looking back o'er fifty Summers,
Our footprints track a common way."

His school life ended with a single Winter in the Worcester County Manual Labor School.

Mr. Hadwen was so fortunate as to find his wife in Vermont, that state of sterling patriotism and historic memories. As a maiden, she was Harriet Page of Westminster, a daughter of Major Page and a niece of Judge Closson of Springfield, Mass. Their children are Amy, wife of John H. Coes of New Worcester; Charles, a wholesale dealer in produce in Chicago and William E., a grocer on Chandler Street in this city.

It was in 1843, that the young farmer, less than twenty years of age, took his present farm or a part of it. It was a part of the original Lovell estate, but the present possessor erected all the buildings and set out the trees. He had had some experience in the nursery business at Kendrick's in Newton so it was to be expected that he should devote a part of his farm to young trees. While these were growing, he followed market gardening to some extent and in 1848, he began selling milk and for forty years he ran a milk and vegetable wagon.

The nearly fifty years of his living on May Street have wrought many changes in his surroundings. Then he was in the country. Now the city stretches out and bids fair to surround him; but his immediate home and farm are still rural enough even for a man who preferred the farm to trade. It seems that his sons prefer the occupations of their ancestors.

Many people are unhappy through their following uncongenial callings, but this can hardly apply to Mr. H. He loves the country, the farm and everything that pertains to the good and development of the latter. He joined the Worcester County Horticultural Society in 1847-8 and has been trustee, vice-president and was president in 1875. He also belongs to the Worcester County Agricultural Society, of which he is a vice-president and trustee. He is a member of the American Pomological Society, of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society and he does not miss many of the Boston meetings. Of the latter, he is chairman of the committee on publication and discussions.

Mr. Hadwen's devotion to agriculture has been recognized by the state authorities in that he was for many years a trustee of the Amherst Agricultural College and, for a long time chairman of the executive committee of the Board. Under his direction, were erected the drill hall, president's house and chapel. He was also one of the first members of the Board of Control of the Experiment Station and its first secretary, holding this position four years. Though not quite in the line of the former organizations, he is a member of the N. E. Historical Genealogical Society.

While never actively a politician, he was first a Whig, next a Free Soiler and then a Republican to date. Once, without his knowledge or consent his fellow citizens made him a member of the Common Council for the years 1868 and '69, but he has served the city well in a far more useful capacity. Since 1867, he has had to do with the appearance of this city, for in that year, he was made one of the commission on Shade Trees and Public Grounds, and so continued till the Parks' Commission was organized and he naturally was included in its make up. As his special charge, he has The University Park in hand and in coming years thousands will bless the taste and wisdom which have directed the work of embellishment there.

Personally, Mr. Hadwen is a delightful man to meet. He abounds in reminiscence of the past sixty years and his extensive travels over this country have stored his mind with facts and figures that render him an authority on all matters in which he is interested. A co-laborer with Marshall P. Wilder and other notable contemporaries in Horticultural Pomology he has many very pleasant incidents to tell of their lives. When he rides to and from Boston, which he does often, he never lacks for friends with whom to converse. At the semi-social and agricultural gatherings in which the suburbs of the city abound, he is ever listened to with interest as he talks about fruit or flowers.

He clings to the Quaker principles in which he was reared. In a word, he is a man who inspires respect and esteem everywhere. Would there were more like him.

A Worcester Girl in Memphis.

The Memphis, (Tenn.) Commercial of Feb. 7, has nearly a column of matter descriptive of gymnastic or physical training work accomplished in the Clara Conway Institute of that city and in private classes. The whole is highly laudatory. Here are extracts from the descriptions which will be a source of pleasure to many friends and associates in Worcester.

"A decided novelty in the way of entertaining was the gymnasium exhibition given by the Clara Conway pupils Friday afternoon at the school gymnasium. Nothing has more entertained the large throng of ladies present, and they expressed their pleasure by enthusiastic applause. * * * * *

"The exhibition lasted two hours and a half. * * * * *

"The Fizickatt dumb bell course, a very scientific, pleasing drill to music from opera of Silvia, the teacher, Miss Murray, of Worcester, Mass., said she never saw a class do better. In it there is much striking of bells and the precision with which it was done as one huge bell, the ease with which the attitudes were taken, was remarked upon. This and the fine execution of the fancy hoop drill was largely due to the exceptionally fine music by Miss Sallie Sale.

Miss Murray introduced a little of the artistic work in hoops, clubs and fancy steps that she taught the advanced Normal classes at Chautauqua University last Summer, a compliment to the ability of the C. C. I. girls, of whose progress she is quite proud. *

"Miss Murray received hosts of compliments and congratulations from the children's friends and parents, and congratulatory messages from parents unable to be present; as to the benefit the work has been to their children."

"In every epoch of the world, the great event, parent of all others, is it not the arrival of a thinker in the world?"—Carlyle.

Dr. Jacoby, the celebrated physician, appears to be fond of a practical joke. It is related that he was walking along Broadway one day when he met an old gentleman who was very rich, but who was at the same time noted for his extreme stinginess. The old man, who was somewhat of a hypochondriac, imagined that he could get some medical advice from Jacoby without paying for it. "Doctor, I am feeling very poorly." "Where do you suffer most?" "In my stomach, doctor." "Ah, that's bad. Please shut your eyes. That's right. Now put out your tongue so that I can examine it closely." The invalid did as he was told. After he had waited patiently for about ten minutes he opened his eyes and found himself surrounded by a crowd who supposed that he was crazy. Dr. Jacoby had in the meantime disappeared.

Letter From China.

BY S. CRUIKSHANK.

In answer to an official enquiry, I signified my readiness to proceed with the expedition to China. I received a letter from Horse Guards, furnishing information as to the particulars of my voyage, and after taking a few hasty farewells in London and Portsmouth, I embarked at Greenhithe for Hong Kong, and next evening lost sight of Dover Cliffs and the French coast. The Bay of Biscay was soon passed, and its rough billows forgotten amid fairer scenes. Going ashore, however, at Cape-De Verde, we saw some things not very pleasing, such as females building houses and carrying stones and mortar up ladders. Most of the poor children were quite naked, and most of the grown people nearly so; the men did nothing but smoke. The soldiers, who were Portuguese, evidently mistook the rank of my companion and myself, for they turned out the guard, and, I think, presented arms. Of drill or cleanliness they seemed to know little. Oranges and such like fruit at Cape-De-Verde are much superior to any I ever saw in England. The popular feeling, so far as I could discover, was very good towards our people. One old man told us that the English were "best of all." "For," said he, "Francy no give money; Spaniola no give money; but Inglezs give money; Inglezs give shoe; Inglezs give shirt. Now me a Portugee, and me love Inglezs,—if Portugee here say Inglezs no good, me shut fist and strike Portugee."

The whole of the African promontory, particularly at the Cape of Good Hope, and more especially from Cape Town to Simon's Bay, looked wonderfully fine! Mountains of enormous dimensions, covered with luxuriant jungle met the eye in all directions. One of our vessels, here, captured a slave trader, giving three hundred men their liberty. Poor slaves; they had been chained up like cattle. Do not some of our "Patriots!" save the mark! write for this diabolical traffic? We coasted Borneo, Sumatra, and some Australasian islands. At Singapore, I thought it strange to see thousands of families living in boats. The country is fertile and magnificent beyond comparison. It was, then a novel sight to see gravestones, envelops of letters, etc., nearly all inscribed in the Chinese character: four-fifths of the inhabitants are Chinese, the rest are Malays, with a sprinkling of Europeans—less perhaps than five hundred. Pine apples sell at a cent each. Lions and tigers are said to practice ravages unmolested in the neighboring islands; indeed they often visit the very suburbs of Singapore by night, taking away cattle and even children—of the latter, some hundreds in the year—and often while the lazy adults are in the theaters or Pagodas. Verily, as the book of Mormon remarks so graphically and piously, "on another topic": "These things had not ought to be." The hero of a book entitled "The Irish Dragon," in the thirteenth chapter of that book, utters an exclamation about the tediousness of an eight day voyage—which entitles me to state that a voyage of one hundred and eighty days seemed tedious to me, and that I felt relieved when we dropped anchor in the harbor of Kong Kong. No matter,—we are ball proof while God bids us live: yea, invulnerable to every baneful influence from without and within! Really, in a world of uncertainty—and so much uncertainty—it is well to have something like this to be sure of. I proceed. Hong Kong then seemed as the portal of a new world! But what am I to say of its varied outlandish sights, its motley population, its gangs of chained convicts, its sable-faced constables and watchmen, its curiously worded door signs, its market stalls of sweet cakes and sugar cane and a thousand other things? Sir, your imagination must come to my aid, in the little that the limits of this rambling epistle will allow me to say, and which has nothing to recommend it but truth. This, however, depend on, if I go wrong it will be by mistake.

The Chinese luxury is a sort of curry, made principally from rice and fish. "Chow-chow" is their word for food. One species of Chinese wheat is round, like sparrow-shot or Peppercorns; the stalks are nearly as thick as bamboo, or say the barrel of an Enfield rifle. The Chinese manners and customs differ from ours in many respects.

One of them kills a Mandarin, and not only himself but all the aged members of the family suffer. Again, a Chinaman becomes meritorious, and deserving of his country, in which case he is ennobled, and also his father, grandfather, and so forth, if so be they live. When a Chinaman or a Chinawoman dies, the coffin is filled with clay, to decompose the body; in a few years the bones are dug up and cleaned, to go in a jar, which is placed behind a tree or ditch, agreeable, I believe, to some religious ceremony. I have seen many such disgusting exhibitions since coming out here. The sails of a China ship are a kind of mat made from bamboo. The resemblance of a China ship or Junk (at a distance) to a Nautilus is more striking than I could have thought. Thus China is a fossil nation, older than the empires of Babylon and Persia; some say older than the dynasty of the Pharaohs. I have no idea of the number of Pagan temples in China, but if told that they numbered a million I should not disbelieve it. By all this you will see that Chinese customs have little in common with European. Nor does the contrast end here. The Chinese have a peculiar talent for doing things the wrong way. Their badges of mourning are white, they read perpendicularly, not horizontally, they compress the feet instead of the waist; they give the place of honour to the left side, they will have it that the magnetic needle points to the south, they will shake their own hand in salutation instead of their friends, they locate the intellect in the belly not in the brain, they mark the title of a book on the margin instead of on the back of the binding, they lay their books down flat instead of setting them up, they erect temples (I fear) to the devil instead of to Almighty God.

But let us take the beam out of our own eye before bringing a railing accusation against any creature, Michael would not against Satan.

Perhaps also Chinamen have virtues; they have at least the absence of one vice, I have not yet seen one of them inebriated. And sir, is not this very handsome? Is not drink the earthly damnation of all who have anything to do with it? Is a license to sell spirits more or less than a license to ruin men, women and children? Do not judges on the bench gravely tell us that but for this curse of society, their offices would be sinecures?

Young men often say that they would not give a fig for a miser who would deny himself a pint of beer. To such I herely affectionately say—listen, my son, I respect your noble young spirit, but the Palmers and Doves will sell poison to fill gaols, workhouses, and graves—these, I guess, will not leave you many figs to eat, much less to bestow.

A Confidence.

One night, not many months ago, two men met at the door of a metropolitan newspaper office. One was coming out, the other was going in. They recognized each other with some difficulty so slight was their acquaintance, exchanged salutations, and then, up on the icomier's informing the outgoer that the purpose of his call was a visit to him, passed up the street in earnest conversation. One might not have known that one of the pair was an editor, but he never would have missed naming the other as an ecclesiastic. For two squares they strolled, the churchman doing most of the talking, the newsmen listening and throwing in an occasional word. Then, when their ways parted, they stopped, and the listener took the part of the orator. "I will tell you frankly, doctor," he said, "that there is not a newspaper in this country that would not gladly print every word that you propose to say, and not a single one of them would give you the slightest editorial support. You would be just as much liable to church discipline as if you had said it to your bishop in convocation."

"I will think it over," said the divine, and the two parted.

This was, I think, the most remarkable case of confidence in my observation. The ecclesiastic was rector of one of the largest and oldest parishes in the East. He had seen the newspaperman but twice before, yet he put before him a most tempting morsel in the way of a "religious sensation," and parted from him on a street-corner without even the perfunctory enjoiner to secrecy which men lay in imparting the most trivial bit of gossip whose paternity they do not care to own. Of course the question of conscience entered largely into this case. The newspaperman knew by reputation and admired the clergyman, and did not care to see his useful future sacrificed for a newspaper "scoop."—From "The Newspaper-Man as a Confidant," by A. E. Watrous, in March Lippincott's.

Woman.

"Thy" woman in our days is Uncertain, ever and hard to please,
And varying as the breeze,
By the light quivering aspen made,
When a new hat is blink near head
You want, of salvation seek

A project has been started for restoring the castle of Heidelberg to the condition in which it was prior to its ruin in 1689 by the troops of France.

About Folks.

Mr. C. C. Kenyon of this city was baritone soloist at Whitman, Feb. 24, with Mrs. Jessie Eldridge Southwick.

Last Thursday evening came the Commencement Exercises of the Philadelphia Dental College. Worcester is interested in the event, since one of our former High School boys, James A. Lynch was graduated and at the same time was chairman of the Executive Committee. Somehow or other our Worcester boys forge ahead.

The estate of the late James H. Wall fouts up $367,056.

Judge Thomas Mulholland of Syracuse has been elected again to the office of police justice in that city. He was once a resident of Worcester and is a life long friend of Mr. Andrew Athy.

Editors have to rest occasionally. A. P. Crisly of the Telegram has been to Atlanta, Georgia.

Herbert F. Blood of New York has had a brief visit home, 19 Madison Street.

State Agent, A. W. Edson, spoke on education, in Westboro, last Wednesday evening.

Mr. M. Frank Casey, the Summer Street druggist, but for some years residing at 9 Dix Street, has removed his family to Summer Street. While this will be handier for his business, the family will be missed from the neighborhood in which its members have dwelt so long.

Mr. J. Walter Flagg and wife have gone to the Bermudas, which according to Mark Twain is only another name for onions and early potatoes.

Our ever able and faithful City Treasurer, Mr. Wm. S. Barton, gets away from his place of labor occasionally. Last Monday he met the other treasurers and collectors of the state at Young's Hotel in Boston. Business cares were forgotten for a brief time.

Mrs. Jennie Abbott-Matton is to drill the characters in Clinton's living whist performance, soon to come off.

Miss Annie Parker's class of young ladies of Park Church Sunday School held a high tea and reception in the church Monday evening. Tea, cocoa and lemonade were served at the tables by Misses Hattie Peacock, Florence Eastman, Florence Adams, Edith Chase, Eva Burr, Alice Spaulding, Nellie Truchon, Mabel Hennessey and Carrie Brooks. There was also a short entertainment consisting of violin solos by Miss Winnie Crane and readings by Miss Edith Hardy. Quite a sum of money was realized, which will be given to the Sunday School.

The Telegram has a new member on its staff in the person of George A. Chapin, '87 at Tufts.

Mr. Edward Randall Knowles is receiving merited praise from critical reviewers for his recent volume, "Songs of Eternal Life." Mr.

and Mrs. Knowles have recently removed to Worcester, Mass., where they have a delightful home.—Boston Budget.

Mrs. Henry W. Badger and daughter, Anna, were in Boston a few days last week.

Mr. Judson B. Witherby, W. H. S., class of '90, and now learning the wholesale lumber business in Boston ran up home for a call, last Friday. In Boston, he and C. C. Milton of the same High School class came together. Milton is in the Boston University Law School.

Miss Helen L. Tew, a High School graduate of a recent year, is now teacher of drawing in the State Normal School of Lincoln, Nebraska.

Worcester is often at the State House lately. Last week a large representation was there to help and to resist the plan of Mr. H. H. Bigelow to cross the Lake with his railroad. Again, Friday, Mayor Harrington and Treasurer Barton were there to see about the proposed loan of $300,000, for Worcester's water supply.

Captain Thomas McGourty is suffering from a fractured ankle acquired while stepping off a horse car. You should wait, Captain, till the car stops.

The obliging Postman on the route, including the Burnside Building, Deacon Andrew S. Merritt, has a new title but it will not be used till that baby can say "Papa."

Mrs. John Magee of Chelsea, daughter of Mrs. Minna F. Fitch of this city, and family are going to California for an extended tour through that interesting country.

Eleventh Birthday.

Next Monday our city of Worcester has its quadrennial birthday. It was a queer circumstance, whatever it was, that placed our incorporation on a day that comes only once in four years. Just one day more like the coming one and then midway between that and the next, Worcester's Semi-Centennial will come. It must be observed Feb. 28th or March 1st. Which?

Cake.

A certain gentleman in this city says his boy, a recent comer by the way, is great on cake. He says, "Some folks prefer fruit cake, others lay great stress on sponge cake, but that boy of mine,—well his forte is stom-ach ache."

Mustered Out.

John A. Thompson, Co. C, 36th Mass., and a member of Post 10, died at his home, 20 North Ashland Street, Sunday, aged 68 years. He was a machinist by trade and worked up to Tuesday, when he was stricken with pneumonia. He was a veteran fireman also. He leaves a widow, four sons and three daughters. Two sons, Frank J. and Jesse F., are postmen.

Mr. H. H. Ames.

The funeral of Mr. Ames was held at the Church of the Unity, last Saturday, the Rev. Mr. Stebbins, conducting the services. Delegations were present from the Quinsigamond and Wachusett lodges of Odd Fellows, Order of the Eastern Star, Knights and Ladies of Honor, and the Royal Arch Chapter of Masons.

The pall bearers were P. C. G., D. N. Pratt, P. C. G., T. H. Day from Wachusett Encampment; P. G., Gilbert Hadley, P. G., John Martin, P. G., E. S. Everett and P. G., John Merrill from Quinsigamond Lodge. The Odd Fellows' service was conducted by Chaplain A. S. Smedley, with Noble Grand John W. Champlin and C. E. Slocum, Jr., as Marshal.

Many and very beautiful floral tributes were presented by friends and the numerous bodies of which he was a member. Mr. Stebbins in his remarks extolled the high character of the deceased giving him a reputation that this whole city fully agrees with. The burial was in Hope Cemetery.

"My Goodness."

The shortest temperance talk on record was condensed into the above words one week ago Friday night, while Dr. D. O. Mears was conducting his Sunday School teacher's class in the Y. M. C. A. building. It seems that some question drew from the leader, the remark, "I think it would be as inconsistent as for a temperance man to use brandy in mince-pies." At this some man in the class said, "I don't think brandy in mince-pies has anything to do with temperance." Immediately an astonished lady ejaculated, "My Goodness." Her lecture was received with loud applause, showing where the feelings of the people were.

Frank M. Wilkinson.

"The old must and the young may die." This adage is pertinent as we read of the death of Mr. Wilkinson, an event which took place last Saturday. He was a High School boy of the class of 1876 and was, at his death, 33 years, 11 months and 20 days old. His father was the late Charles Wilkinson, manager, and well known in theatrical circles. A teacher of many years of experience must have a memory gallery well filled with youthful faces and in, at least, one memory there rises the figure of a young man, in his Senior year, who was conspicuous among his fellows for his uniform disposition to oblige. In that teacher's mind, that picture will ever remain, a pleasing recollection of Frank Wilkinson whom friends followed to his grave last Monday. After graduating, he studied medicine with the late Dr. Joseph Bates, a relative, but did not complete a course, opening, instead, a drug store in New Worcester, where he continued till his death. He had been ill from pneumonia for some time, this disease being the cause of his death. He attended strictly to his business, though he had belonged to the Light Infantry. The funeral services were conducted by the Rev. F. A. Gray of All Souls Church at 3 p. m. Monday.

The singing was by the Schubert Club. The floral offerings were profuse and elegant from numerous friends. The bearers were W. H. Willard, Charles R. Kirby, Charles L. Wright and George E. Fairbanks. The interment was at Hope cemetery.

Many years have elapsed since Mr. Charles H. Carpenter took a real outing, one that would count. With his wife he is proceeding to California by easy stages. Taking the Southern Pacific route, at last accounts, he was in Texas. Doubtless, by this time he is among the orange groves of Southern California.

About Folks.

George F. Metcalf of 34 Belmont Street is having trouble with his hand as the result of a cut received while opening a tin can.

Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Wood return soon from their trip to Florida. The journey was taken for health and rest as well as for pleasure.

Miss Catherine Lincoln of Oak Avenue gave a very pleasant card party Wednesday evening. Kings and Queens occupied the time until refreshments were served and afterward the company amused themselves with Menagerie.

Miss Fannie Reed, one of the used-to-be residents of our street, spent the day with her old playmate at 5 Dix Street Wednesday.

Dr. Hull of 22 Holly wood Street, had a little gathering of young people for his niece Maud Hull on Wednesday afternoon. She is here on a visit but returns to her home in New Hampshire on Monday next. The hours were from two till six with supper at half past five.

Mr. Geo. H. Clemente, Architect, has opened an office in Walker's Building, Room 211. He is ready and competent to fill all requirements that may be made of him.

The resignation of the Rev. J. I. Miller from the pastorate of the Lincoln Square Baptist Church will remove from our midst one of the most successful ministers known in Worcester for many a day. He leaves his pulpit that he may gain needed rest.

Number one of Rev. Thomas J. Conaty's new magazine, The Catholic School and Home Magazine is received. It contains twenty-six pages of reading matter, of interest to all readers, particularly to those who belong to the Catholic Church. There are contributors from abroad but LIGHT turns with special interest to local writers as Francis P. McKeon, who furnishes "The Mission Soldiers of Faith" and Richard H. Mooney who gives sundry items on educational matters.

The selection of E. H. Warren, a Harvard Freshman, as one of the representatives in the coming debate with Yale is a high tribute to the merits of the young man, another refutation of the criticisms that, from certain sources, have come upon the debating societies of the High School of this city. Mr. Warren is one of many who have gone from these societies to the highest places in college. A very interesting list might be prepared in this line.

Mr. Luther D. Goodland can tell you all about the group, but by care and excellent nursing, he is out again as good as new.

Fifty Years

It was an exceedingly happy thought for the many friends of Dr. D. O. Means to remember the half-century anniversary of his birth to present him with a set of the Century Directory. There is, generally, a pleasant recognition of the interest of things in President Church and when it comes to appreciation of their pastor, who has held his position for fifteen years, the church is a unit.

Good to Eat.

"If wishes were horses, a beggar might ride; If wishes were turnips, they would hang at his side."

Turnip Salad.

Three sliced cold boiled turnips, three sliced cold boiled beets, one sliced cold hard boiled egg, one sliced cold raw onion, p'aced in layers; serve with mayonnaise sauce.

Extremet.—One and one-half cup cold boiled mashed turnip, one and one-half cup cold boiled mashed Irish potatoes, one cup cream, tablespoonful of butter (melted), beaten yolks two eggs, salt, pepper; pour into earthenware baking-dish; cover crumbs of toasted bread flecked with butter; bake about twenty minutes.—Table Talk.

Fruit Sago.

Draw the juice from a pound of any kind of fruit—red currants, raspberries, blackberries, plums and grapes are especially nice for the purpose—strain it off and add water to make the quantity one quart; put this in an agate saucepan, and when it boils add four heaping tablespoonfuls of small sago which has been well washed; stir this over the fire until it thickens and all the grains are clear, which will be in from ten to fifteen minutes; then sweeten to taste and fill into jelly glasses.

Scotch Tarts.

One pound of oatmeal, one-half pound of flour, quarter pound of lard or drippings, quarter pound granulated sugar, one tablespoonful of baking powder, a small teaspoonful of salt. Mix the oatmeal and the flour with the baking powder and salt sifted in it, and the sugar together. Melt the lard and pour a beaten egg in it; then add this to the dry ingredients, using sufficient cold water to make the whole into a stiff paste. Now roll a piece of the paste to about the thickness of a dollar, cut it into rounds with a small cutter, and bake on a large tin in a moderately quick oven until nicely browned. When quite cold put away in a tin box until needed for use.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Golden Quail.

This method of cooking quail produces a dish which is as good as it is sightly—and that is saying a great deal in its favor. Have ready a kettle of hot lard, or nice dripping. It must be just the heat necessary for frying fritters, that is to say, commencing to smoke. Prepare your birds as for roasting. Dip in flour, in which you have mixed pepper and salt in the proportion of half a teaspoonful of salt, and a saltspoonful of pepper, to each cup of flour. Gently drop the quail in the hot fat. They will be cooked through in five minutes. Repeat, till your quail are cooked. Put them where they will keep hot Dip large, diamond-shaped pieces of stale bread in a batter made of three eggs, two teacupfuls of milk, half a teaspoonful of salt and one-fourth of a teaspoonful of white pepper. Fry these a rich buff color in the fat in which you cooked the quail. Remove, drain, place on platter. On each slice place a bird, which will be of a uniform golden tint. Surround with green hedge of crisp, fresh parsley. Serve with currant jelly.—Good House-keeping.

REAL ESTATE AT PUBLIC AUCTION. By virtue of power of sale contained in a deed of mortgage given by Owen Finnegan, of Worcester, to the Home Co-operative Bank, a corporation legally established, and located in said Worcester, dated December 12th, 1881, and recorded with Worcester District Registry of Deeds, book 1185 page 72, and because of a breach of the conditions in said deed of mortgage contained, will be sold at public auction, on the premises, on Friday March 25, 1892, at 4 o'clock, p. m., the property conveyed by said deed of mortgage as follows:—A tract of land situated on the southerly side of Burnett Street, in said Worcester, with the buildings on the same, bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a stake, set by Benjamin James, in the southerly line of Burnett Street; thence, southerly at right angles with said Street, one hundred (100) feet; said line passes the oak on the westerly side thereof and three feet distant therefrom; thence, westerly, parallel with Burnett Street, seventy (70) feet; thence, northerly, parallel with the first described line, one hundred (100) feet; to the southerly line of Burnett Street; thence, southerly on Burnett Street seventy (70) feet to the place of beginning; being the same land conveyed to me by deed of D. H. Eames, dated October 24, 1884. See Worcester District Registry, book 1184, page 28. The stake set by Benjamin James, above referred to, is about two hundred forty-two (242) feet distant, westerly, from the northwesterly corner of the brick mill in Jamesville.

This property will be sold subject to any unpaid taxes, assessments, or liens, of whatever nature. Fifty dollars in money must be paid down at the time of the sale, and the rest of the purchase money provided on delivery of the deed, within ten days.

A Stern Reality.

"You will notice," said the manager of the company, as he stepped in front of the curtain, "that the program says that seven years are supposed to elapse between the second and third acts. In this case there will be no supposition about it. The Sheriff of this county has just taken possession of the stage, and I think it will be about seven years before we can get the matter settled. The audience is now dismissed."

Special Prayer.

An old lady who lives on the Missouri River above St. Jo, lost her little boy. He had been skating along the river bank. The good old lady bore her loss patiently and silently for a week and finally she took the burden of her grief to the Maryville Prayer-Meeting.

When she asked for prayers for her little boy's recovery, the clergyman asked her where she thought her Willie was lost.

"I dun know, Elder," she said, "I dun know, but the brothers and sisters needn't pray below St. Jo!"—Eli Perkins.

School and College.

Harvard.

The Worcester friends of Mr. E. H. Warren, '95, will be pleased to learn that he has been chosen one of the three Harvard representatives in the next debate with Yale. The question at the trial was the same which will be debated at New Haven, March 25: "Resolved, that immigration to the United States should be restricted." Mr. Warren spoke on the negative side, although Harvard will contend for the other view in the joint debate. Twenty-seven students spoke in competition before the Harvard Union. The other two successful speakers were J. S. Brown, '92, of Newport, R. I., and F. W. Dalling, '92, of Cambridge, Mass., both of whom spoke on the negative side—a rather singular fact in view of Harvard's position. The Judges, Prof. Briggs, Prof. Taussig, and Dr. Curry chose four speakers, from whom the three mentioned were elected, Mr. Warren being the favorite.

H. H. Chamberlain, '95, has been elected Secretary of the Freshman Banjo Club.

Lewis I. Prouty, '84, of Spencer, has been elected to the editorial board of the Daily Crimson, from a field of many applicants.

Yale has finally acceded to Harvard's terms in regard to baseball, and two games have been arranged—one at Cambridge and one at New Haven.

High School.

"A signal success" said the thirty-three members of the Class of '92, W. H. S., after their first banquet last Tuesday evening at the Lincoln House. The boys sat down to land-lord Tower's best supper at 8 p.m. and were not prepared to hear the toasts until nearly 10 p.m. Harry H. Hill was toastmaster and the manner in which he acquitted himself showed that he was not a new hand in the position. Mr. Hill chose men to speak who could amply fill the position among whom were Wm. B. Tower, the newly elected president of the class, who spoke of his acquaintance with the same. He was followed by Mr. Walter L. Sprague, E. C. Witherby and E. W. Goodell and D. G. Burrage, who kept the members present in a merry mood until nearly 11.30 when the party broke up with the singing of college songs. After the supper the boys repaired to the homes of Principal Wight, Mrs. Brigham, Mr. Wm. Abbott and ex-principal Roe, where the usual class yell was given. The party dispersed at "Mellor's" much pleased with the evening's pleasures.

Smith.

Our great gala day is over and the town and college are resuming their normal appearance again. For three years Washington's Birthday has been celebrated on Monday at Smith and so the festivities have really lasted three days, the hotels being crowded by Saturday night. The weather did not favor us, storming hard Saturday, and being very dubious Sunday and Monday, so that few sleighing parties were seen, yet there was so much to do indoors that few found the time heavy on their hands.

There were more men to stay over Sunday than ever before, and Saturday night there were several large private parties in town. Sunday vespers was crowded and it was a delightful service, closing with "America," which would have sounded feeble indeed with the girls' voices alone, but which made the chapel ring, as it was.

Monday was filled to overflowing every moment. In the morning there was an informal dance in the Gymnasium, which was almost more enjoyable than the evening reception. This is a new feature of the "22d," and every one seemed to think it one of the most pleasant events of the day. There was a private German also at the Burnham School Gymnasium.

At half past two the Glee and Banjo Clubs gave a concert in Assembly Hall to a large and enthusiastic audience, which thoroughly appreciated every number, especially "The Fair Transgressor" peculiarly a "22d" song.

After the concert there were numerous teas. Besides those at the Campus House, among the largest were those at Mrs. Snow's, Mrs. Southwick's, Dr. Brady's, Miss Cable's and Miss Putnam's.

The evening reception began at half past seven. There were ten numbers on the program and the lights were put out promptly at quarter before ten. President and Mr. Seelye received, assisted by the presidents of the four classes, Miss Steele, Miss Bradford, Miss Hammond and Miss Hyde, and the long line of guests moved slowly up and shook hands. It was the gayest scene Smith has ever seen, though the crush was so great sometimes as to be very unpleasant. There were over four hundred people in the rooms. Each class had a room, decorated prettily in the class colors, where the meeting-places for partners were assigned, and connections were thus made more easily. The Sophomore room, the German room, was more crowded than any other for the frappe stand was set up there, and a wall of black coats was constantly around it.

More elegant gowns on more fair maidens could not be often seen and the gentlemen all seemed to be appreciating their privileges in being invited to a "Smith 22d."

There were several dances even after the reception, the largest being at Mr. George W. Cable's home.

All college exercises went on as usual, Tuesday, outwardly, though between the number of guests yet in town and the weariness of the girls, work has only just really begun. Among the Worcester men here were Messrs. Warren of Harvard, Reed of Amherst, Higgins and Fuller of the Polytechnic, Nelson Keyes and Edward Whitney.

Tuesday evening Miss Mary A. Scott read a very interesting paper in Music Hall on Dr. Quincy.

Thursday Fraulein Von Mitzlaff gave a song recital assisted by Mr. Victor Herbert, cellist, and by Dr. Blodgett, pianist.

Polytechnic.

Last Tuesday evening the members of the Camera Club with their friends gathered at the Salisbury Laboratories to the number of a hundred or more to see an exhibit of lantern slides by Dr. Bemis of this city. It was a private affair, all the tickets being complimentary. Those who were fortunate enough to be the guests of the club, upon that occasion, spent a very enjoyable evening. There were about a hundred and fifty pictures in all, most of them taken near Worcester, besides many reproductions of paintings, statuary, etc. Of course a very large number of the visitors present were young lady "cousins" of the members, and helped to make the entertainment the success which always characterizes anything the Camera Club undertakes.

The committee appointed from the Tennis Association last Fall to arrange for repairing the courts, has obtained permission from the Trustees and is planning to lay out on the lawn in front of the shop, four first class dirt courts. This of course is only planning because the expense of such improvements would not be less than seventy-five dollars, but if this sum can be raised, the work will be pushed to completion. The present membership fee to the Association is one dollar, and an attempt is to be made to raise the funds required by subscription, thus leaving this fee the same. If this be done the members of the Association can have the use of grounds second to none in the city at an expense of about a fifth of that in the other local clubs. The situation of the courts is in a pretty spot and almost wholly in the shade during the afternoon, making them especially attractive.

Last week Saturday a large number of students interested in base ball met in the Chapel and formed a base ball Association with the following officers: President A. E. Culley, '92 Vice President, H. L. Cobb, '94; Secretary and Manager, J. H. Wallace, '92; Treasurer, N. M. Paull, '93; Directors—Southgate, '92, Stone, '93, Gordon, '94, A. H. Warren '95. Heretofore, base ball at the Institute has been managed by the Athletic Association but Saturday's meeting leaves the latter to look after track athletics alone. As a result both classes of sport ought to receive better attention. Last Fall a separate organization for Foot ball was formed.

As things look now, the average Tech will have to write home for an extra check before Spring is over. Subscription papers if not already started may be expected from the Athletic Association to pay for training the Intercollegiate team; the Base Ball Association for the support of a nine; the Tennis Association. The entertainment to be given in March will call for some cash, a trip to Springfield in May and the ever present Laboratory fee for more. This too is the season for wind up suppers of the various clubs, senior graduations and the like.

The Socialists of '92 are arranging to publish a souvenir booklet. It will contain a history of the various suppers, dances and wakes with which the dreariness of the past Winter has been whiled away by these defiers of incessant work, besides other matters of general interest and amusement, and promises to "fill a long felt want."

The regular meeting of the Art Students' Club this evening at 405 Main Street will take the form of a social tea. There will be an exhibition of water colors by Miss Harriett Thayer Durgin, Mrs. W. L. Chzalner and others. Next week the exhibition will be open to the public.

MISS MARY HOWE.

Mr. Wall and the 22d.

Mr. Wall's effort to recall the former days, last Monday, met a very hearty and appreciative response from the veterans of the hard fought campaign of 1840. A community is fortunate that possesses a man of Mr. Wall's memory and disposition to impart his treasurer. Naturally, the supporters of W. H. Harrison in 1840, will rally to the defence of his grandson in 1892.

Dr. Price.

The president of Livingstone College, Salisbury, N. C., talked entertainingly to a large audience in Plymouth vestry last Wednesday evening. President Price is a living refutation of the statement frequently made by Negro haters that he cannot excel. Dr. Price is the peer of any man, irrespective of color and he is doing a great work in his college, situated near the old prison pens. Several Worcester people have given liberally towards the college. It is doing a grand work for the colored people.

Miss Jean M. Finlay.

The Thompsonville (Conn.) Press of Feb. 18, contains an appreciative obituary of Miss Jean Marwick Finlay who was born, in this city, Nov. 26, 1870, the daughter of William and Mary McRae Finlay. Her father, a native of Scotland, was a dry goods merchant, well remembered here. Miss Finlay was educated in the public schools of Hartford, Conn., graduating from the High School in 1889, receiving the salutatorian's position. Her parents died several years ago and since then her home has been with J. P. Davis in Thompsonville, in which place she was a teacher up to a recent period. She was the principal's assistant in the High School, after one year's teaching. She had rare musical ability and was organist at the Presbyterian Church of which she was a member and whence she was buried Friday the 19th, her death having taken place, the Wednesday preceding. Her illness was consumption, against which she had fought courageously since last April. Her remains were brought to Medford, in this state for burial.

The Howe-Lavin Concert.

The lady and gentleman who are to be heard here next Wednesday night are no strangers in Worcester. Here they first met each other, beginning an acquaintance which has terminated in marriage. The fourth number of LIGHT bore a fine portrait of the charming singer and now we present her again, with her husband by her side. From that date, March 22, 1890, to the present LIGHT has repeatedly sounded her praises. If Mechanics Hall is filled as her merits deserve, there will be standing room only and not much of that. She sang here first in the festival of 1888 and her song inspired a local muse to the following flight.

"O sweet New England girl,
Thy native hills have heard
No voice so pure, so sweet, burst forth
From any native bird
It breaths the music of the rills
That in thy mountains purrl,
To welcome to her native hills,
A sweet New England girl!"

She is a Vermont woman, born in Brattleboro of long settled New England stock. She has been a faithful student and aims to study long and arduously in the future. She is now on the high road to the fame that surely awaits her. It was long said of one of America's prima donnas, Clara Louise Kellogg, that her voice lacked a something that Anna Louise Cary possessed. No one could tell what that something was till the latter's name was announced, then there was a general acclaim of "Its love that Clara Louise lacked."

Our coming singer has that element and the public will be charmed to see and hear her and her husband, wedded in so quiet and sensible a manner in Cleveland, last Fall. The following is an extract from a Washington letter of a year ago in LIGHT. In the light of subsequent events is not the juxtaposition of names peculiar.

"The soloists of the evening were Miss

MR. WM. J. LAVIN.

Mary Howe and Mr. William J. Lavin. Mr. Lavin will not be as well remembered as Miss Howe, but he sang at the Festival two years ago last Fall, when Miss Howe appeared there for the first time. I was amazed when I heard him sing here, although I should have remembered the possibilities that come with years. When Mr. Lavin sang at the Festival, he had just come from Europe (I believe Mr. Ben Hammond discovered him over there), and was raw from his studies. Now he is an artist. His voice is a fine strong tenor, and he sang with the nicest discrimination, first, the aria of Braga, Beffa del tuo Sorriso from Reginella, and, afterward, some similar songs. He deserved the recall which he got, and gave evidence of great power to please a critical audience. I, for one, would like to hear Mr. Lavin sing at our Festival again some time.

"As for Miss Howe, it is an immense satisfaction to those who recognize her wonderful ability to hear her sing outside of Worcester. She sang magnificently, her numbers being the aria of Bizea, "O Brama, Gran Dieu" from "Le Pecheurs de Braga, Beffa del tuo Sorriso," and, with the chorus, Nevin's music for Eugene Field's pretty poem, "Wynken, Hylken and Nod." She sang, too, in response to calls repeated several times, the Eckert "John Song" and "The Last Rose of Summer," whereat that frosty well audience fairly went wild. It is pleasant to see a New England girl meeting with success as Miss Howe is having everywhere—at the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York, for instance, a week or two ago. I talked with her the morning after the concert, and she is as enthusiastic, and as modest and as charming as ever—a womanly woman, whom to know well is necessarily to admire."

The future seems very bright for these young musical people and when they return from their residence abroad, wherein they will fit themselves for loftier heights in song, Worcester will gladly welcome them to her midst again.

Household.

The highest duties oft are found
Living upon the lowest ground,
In hidden and unnoticed ways,
In household works on common days.

Many a roast is made dry and tasteless from being put in an oven that was not hot enough to sear over the surface and prevent the escape of juices.

Moist bread and pies that do not stew out around the edge are due in great part to being placed in a hot oven at first, and the temperature lowered after a short time.

With a modern range the heat of the oven is easily regulated, but a great many good cooks use poor stoves. A sad-iron or tea-pot stand kept in the oven or other warm place, is excellent for placing under any dish that is liable to bake too fast. A dish of cold water will lower the temperature nicely for cake.

Fruit cake which requires to be kept in the oven four or five hours should have a thin paste of flour and water rolled out, and placed over the bottom or whole of the bake tin.

A fluid useful for removing stains of long standing and for whitening linen is made as follows: Dissolve one-quarter of a pound each of chloride of lime and common washing soda in three quarts of boiling water in an earthenware basin, strain and bottle for use. Put half a pint of this bleaching fluid in a basin and have some boiling suds ready in another. Dip the stains, for a few seconds only, in the bleach, then rinse them in the soapy water. Should the stains not have disappeared repeat the process. Afterwards wash the linen as usual. This bleach should be managed carefully, and linen must not be left to soak in it.

A very simple and efficacious cream for the hands may be prepared as follows: Take two ounces of lanoline and two ounces of glycerine, place in a small jelly can and stand in a warm oven until the lanoline is entirely melted. Then add a few drops of attar of roses, lavender or rose water, and stir the whole briskly while cooling, otherwise the lanoline and glycerine will separate.

One of your readers asks for "a good receipt for a simple spring medicine." The following is so good that I have taken time to write it out for her.

Take six or eight lemons, wash, cut up, put into a farina kettle with three pints of water; also put cold water into the outer kettle. Let it stand on a hot stove until it boils, then set it back and let it simmer all day, or, say, ten hours. Then, set away to cool, strain off the syrup into a bottle, keep it corked tight; take a tablespoonful before each meal. Use the whole of the lemons, as the seeds and skins contain a bitter medicinal quality which is essential. Put in no sugar or spirits. This is one of the best spring medicines, if not the very best, known to mankind.

The great majority of so-called cough cures do little more than impair the digestive functions and create bile. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, on the contrary, while it cures the cough, does not interfere with the functions of either stomach or liver.

What They Do.

When it is vacation they play, and the variety they have in said play would lead any older one to think we were rearing a colony of inventors on our street.

During the cold spell they tried sliding, and as they were forbidden to slide on the street they made a slide in the yard, and there they had hours of solid fun. But they soon tired of ordinary sliding, and then genius came to their aid and old pieces of carpeting were substituted for the sled. But even that made lost its charm after a while, and then mamma's new tin pans were used. One child brought out her mother's dripping pan and was so lucky as to carry it home with only one bad dent on one side. The tin pans didn't fare so well, but I think they can be used to mold blanc mange and no doubt every one who sees will wonder where the hostess obtained such a unique pattern.

Before the snow came, the rage for skating was on the children of the neighborhood, and as nobody dared to trust them on the pond Mr. B. hit upon the plan of flooding his yard at night and beheld in the morning there was a pond all ready for the fun. I don't think any of the housekeepers in that vicinity were troubled that day by any questions that all the reference libraries in the world could not answer. One small boy who had no skates got his mother's broom and running hobble horse fashion to get headway, suddenly sat down and finished with a fine slide. Then, all the twenty-second, what a time was there. Made the red flannel in the neighborhood was all in sashes, and paper hats, and toy guns, and drums were brought out and a fine parade went by that made more noise than any parade of older people could. It had this advantage, namely, that it went by on an average every half hour all day, whereas bigger parades only come once a year.

In the evening Mrs. B. opened her house and the children gave a concert of their own preparation. That it was a full dress affair need not be told those who witnessed it. Madame Paderewski wore a pink cashmere of bygone age, and Madame Rubenstein, a long trained wrapper, said dresses being brought to light after years of retirement from private life. A Chinaman took his part in perfect English, and G. Washington himself, not the father of his country, but the son of the same country, was persuaded to be present. Did the children enjoy it? So much so that they want to do it again. Don't you wish you lived on our street? Why even the High School Seniors come down our street and cheer, thus showing it to be one of the best places in the world for "A racket."

Women who suffer from nervous and physical debility find great help in the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It produces the rapid effect of a stimulant, without reaction—the result being a permanent increase of strength and vigor, both of mind and body.

New York Fashions.

Cotton goods woven in Bedford cords have special style for Spring and Summer and no better evidence can be given of their continued popularity. In view of this, numerous light wools show corded surfaces and as alterations in color are a feature, much gaiety is given by the rapid transition from one hue to another. Crinkled surfaces are, however, yet more in vogue and sometimes the inequalities become quite furrow like, even to the depth of a quarter of an inch and in lengths of more than an inch they are repeated in gradations so as to form regular designs, while contrasts or shadings in color afford much that is attractively unique. From such

Pronounced Examples

the idea is repeated until the crinkles become very small and lessen into crepon and crape surfaces that from time to time are groundworks for a display of floral and other designs. Plisse fabrics again likewise appear with renewed prestige: the tiny tucks often contrast in color and running both ways, produce plaids that are nevertheless inconspicuous and constitute no barrier to large floral patterns placed upon them. Silken embroidered dots or small sprays on light wools are another feature in dress goods and they likewise are seen in union with stripes, burs or flowers. Plaids are no longer, however, a special feature, the few seen being of no marked character, in medium size and oftener as a foundation to other patterns, than as the sole attraction. Stripes on the other hand are of constant recurrence and very great variety in width and placing, since they run from alternate codings in the class of goods first mentioned, to those of more than an inch in width. Diagonal stripes crossing perpendicular ones, are noticeable and akin to them are chevron weavings. Tan in many shades is again the leading color, with a medium of gray, but single colors are subordinate to changeable effects, which are extremely prominent, especially in silks.

Post 10's Library.

This part of the possessions of the Post was made larger last week by the following books from Mr. Charles H. Davis of 43 Cedar Street: two volumes of "Battles of the United States," two volumes of "The Southern Rebellion," and one volume each of "Our Country" and the Art Journal for 1876. Comrade James E. Dennis was the happy medium of conveyance. Mr. Davis is not a member of the Post but he was a soldier during the Rebellion and has always had a deep interest in the welfare of the organization, having always been a liberal giver to its benevolent fund. The library has become a valuable collection of matter pertaining to the war.
